Documents on the movement for independence in India

Part 2

The documents in this volume depict the political and social ferment in the Indian subcontinent between 1943 and 1944 which were the most critical years of World War II. Though the Congress had been immobilized after August 1942 by the widescale arrests of its leaders, the Raj found its credibility steadily weakened and its legitimacy repeatedly challenged. The suppression of popular unrest by the misuse of wartime emergency rules was sharply criticized by the judiciary. Journalists mounted a united stand against censorship. There was heightened consciousness and organizational activity among the peasants, the working class and the student community.

The documents in this volume highlight the activist role of judges in restraining the executive; the confidential reports on growing militant Hindu communalism and the indifference of officials to the ominous growth of communalized political parties. Here for the first time is published evidence given in camera to the Famine Commission in 1944. The political commitment of cultural organizations, artists and photographers is also graphically illustrated.

Struggle in the Law Courts

Although the documents specific to 1943 start from the one dated 4 January 1943 certain documents of 1942 have been included as being sufficiently close in time and of relevance.

In the general introduction we have high-lighted some of the main issues over which nationalists fought a battle in the Courts and how the government tried to circumvent their efforts; these were the ordinances setting up Special Criminal Courts, the right of Habeas Corpus, the facilities available to Security Prisoners detained without trial (including the facility of having access to legal advice), the practice of prolonged interrogation of prisoners in police custody, and the efforts by the Home Department to stop all government assistance to organisations like the All-India Spinners Association and the All-India Village Industries Association.

Without repeating the points made there, we would like to elucidate the significance of some of the documents in this collection.

There are a number of documents on the Ainsworth case (Docs 6-8, 9, 12, 14, 17, 52) — the case of a British police officer who was responsible for the death of a prisoner while in police custody.¹ The documents are from the private correspondence of Viceroy Lord Linlithgow with the Governor of Bihar, Sir Thomas Rutherford. They illustrate the way the Raj tried to extricate itself from an embarrassing situation. The police officer's culpability could not be denied, but to maintain the prestige of the Raj proposals were made to soften the punishment due to him. Bihar was one of the provinces most severely affected by the '42 movement. Memories of Police brutalities like this must have lingered on and played their part in mobilising anti-imperial opinion in the post-war years.

Indeed, many administrators, lawyers and judges were aware that left to itself the police force could not be fully trusted to see that justice was done according to the letter and spirit of the law. This is why the Punjab Government failed to get the other provinces and the Home Department to agree to their suggestion that 'Scientific interrogation' in police custody for an indefinite period, as practised in the Punjab (especially the Lahore fort), should be an all-India policy. There are some documents of 1942, which show that the Home Department had some doubts about the length of time a person could be kept in police custody.² The documents printed here (Nos 23, 38, 39, 40, 46, 48, 62, 73, 96) show that, notwithstanding the support given to the Punjab proposal by the D.I.B. Pilditch, the idea found no favour with seasoned imperial administrators like Governor Sir Maurice Hallett (a former Secretary to the Home Department). In the end, the idea of making the procedure in the Lahore fort generally applicable all over India had to be dropped, because of the widespread belief that it violated the spirit of the Criminal Procedure Code, section 491.³

The biggest blow to the coercive apparatus created after the Quit India movement had been launched was the setting aside of Ordinance II of 1942 by a majority of the Federal Court on 4 June 1943. (Doc. No. 35). Its repercussions have already been discussed in the main introduction, and so it will be superfluous to comment on it further. From the last week of April 1943, after the Federal Courts' verdict on D.I.R. 26 in Talpade's case (Doc. No. 27), the government was busy drafting Ordinances to strengthen its hand. However when it passed another ordinance on 5 June 1943 to save D.I.R. 26 (Ordinance XIX of 1943), it was sharply commented on in the Allahabad High Court; the strictures of Justice Bajpai¹ are worth noting (Doc. 109).

The Judiciary was unhappy at the way the government was functioning, although the Bombay High Court was less harsh on the government than the Courts in Calcutta, Patna, Nagpur and Allahabad (Docs 83, 84, 100, 109). The administration in Bengal was rattled by the legal reverses, and many of the documents relating to the months of August and September 1943 (Nos 64, 83, 85, 89, 90) show this.

Among the judgements worthy of attention are the following: Observations of Justice Vivian Bose² on the Habeas Corpus question in the Nagpur High Court (No. 5), where he quoted from the classic dissenting judgement of Lord Atkin in the Privy Council,³ and the caustic interchange between Justice A.N. Sen⁴ of the Calcutta High Court and Justice Rowland of the Federal Court over the constitutional validity of Ordinance 2 of 1942. (Docs No. 26, 34 and 45).

AIR, Vol. 30, 1943, Oudh, pp. 41-4

Criminal Revn. Appln. No. 1942, Decided on 26th October 1942, for revision of order of Sess Judge, Lucknow, dt 2nd October 1942 Ed.

Dr J.N. Misra and B.P. Chandra for applicant.

[Omitted: Two opening paragraphs giving some dates relevant to the promulgation of Ordinance of 1942 in U.P., and basic facts of the earlier trials of the appellant – Ed.]

The contention in the present application is that the said ordinance has no application to pending cases, nor has it any retrospective effect in connection with offences committed before coming into force of the said ordinance, i.e., 20th August 1942, nor has it any application to offences unconnected with the state of emergency for which it was promulgated.

Apart from these contentions two other questions were also raised in the course of arguments, the first whether the ordinance was legally promulgated under S.72, Government of India Act (Ninth Schedule) and the second whether power to promulgate ordinances is connected with the Defence of India Act. As regards the first question learned counsel for the applicant referred me to the provision which formerly existed in S.72 limiting the life of an ordinance to six months from its promulgation, but he conceded that as the section had been amended and this limiting provision deleted, he could not press this point, on the second point I am unable to see any connexion between the Ordinance and the Defence of India Act, the ordinance having been made and promulgated under S.72, Government of India Act, Ninth Schedule. A similar question appears to have been raised before the Session Judge, who observed that the argument that the power to promulgate the ordinance is derived from this Act has no basis.

I come now to the contentions advanced in the application. The first is that the ordinance does not apply to pending cases. In support of this contention certain orders passed by myself as the Judge nominated by the Provincial Government under S.8 of the Ordinance to review proceedings under the ordinance were referred to. The cases in which these orders were passed had been committed to the Court of Session before the order of the District Magistrate directing their trial by the Special Judge was passed, and the legality of this order being considered doubtful the proceedings under the ordinance were set aside and the records were returned to the Session Judge for trial under the ordinary provisions of law. These cases are clearly distinguishable from the present case, where save for the appearance of the accused in the Magistrate's Court, no proceedings preparatory to commitment to Session had taken place before the order of the District Magistrate was passed. In the orders passed in the case cited, it was said that the ordinance does not refer to pending cases. It is argued from this that cases in which the accused had appeared before the Magistrate for trial under the ordinary law should not be sent to the Special Judge for trial under the ordinance.

I do not take this view. The District Magistrate is given very wide powers under the Ordinance of directing what cases shall be tried thereunder, and I see no reason to limit these powers by holding that he has not the power to direct that a case which is awaiting trial, but in which no proceedings, other than the production of the accused in Court or the summoning of witnesses, have taken place, shall be tried under the Ordinance. Where the magisterial enquiry has been completed and the case has been committed to the Court of Session for trial by that Court I do not think that the District Magistrate has power under the Ordinance to intervene, take the case out of the hands of the Sessions Judge, and direct that it be tried not under the ordinary law, which has governed the procedure previously followed in the case, but under the ordinance. On general principles, it would appear undesirable that a different procedure should be adopted at different stages of a case, procedure under the ordinary law initially, and a change sometime thereafter to the procedure prescribed by the Ordinance. The case in A.I.R. 1931 Bom.411 was cited in support of the contention that an enquiry or trial commences with the appearance of the accused before the Magistrate to answer the charges. In that case the question was whether the accused were entitled to an adjournment under Sub-s (8) of S.526, Criminal P.C., on their informing the Magistrate under this sub-section on their appearance before him, and before any evidence had been recorded of their intention to apply for transfer of the case. The sub-section provides that the case shall be adjourned on such intimation being given at any stage of the enquiry or trial. A bench of the Bombay High Court held that the enquiry of the case was not deferred till such time as the Magistrate would begin to record evidence, but commenced, not indeed with the lodging of complaint or even with the issue of process but with their appearance (i.e., of the accused) on such processes before the Magistrate to answer the charges.

In view of the various grounds on which transfer may be applied for under S.526, most of them arising out of some circumstances not connected with the actual conduct of the enquiry or trial, it would clearly be futile to hold that some evidence must be recorded before the intimation under sub.S.(8) can be given. No such consideration arises in connexion with orders for pending cases to be tried under the Ordinance, nor is there any bar in my opinion to such orders being passed when the enquiry or trial has not commenced in the ordinary sense of the word, that is when no evidence has been recorded. The accused cannot be prejudiced in any way by such orders. As regards the contention that the ordinance has no retrospective effect so as to apply to offences committed before it came into force, it is true that there is no express provision making it applicable to such offences, but I think from the wide powers which are given to District Magistrates to direct what cases shall be tried under it, that it must be held to apply to all offences, whether committed before or after 20th August, in which the trial has not already commenced, that is in which evidence has not been recorded, under the ordinary law.

For the same reason I cannot hold that the ordinance has no application to offences not connected with the state of emergency on account of which the ordinance was promulgated. There is nothing in the ordinance itself to support this view, it is on the contrary implied in it that it is for the executive authorities to consider and decide what offence shall be tried under it. Difficulties would obviously arise if Special Magistrates and Special Judges had to consider objections that orders passed by District Magistrates directing trial under the ordinance were illegal because the alleged offences were not connected with the state of emergency referred to in the Ordinance. Being of opinion that there is no force in any of the contentions advanced I dismiss the application. Learned counsel asked me to grant a certificate under S.205, Government of India Act,¹ while conceding that the case did not fall within the terms of that section. As the case does not involve a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of that Act or any order in council made thereunder, I am unable to grant a certificate to this effect.

Application dismissed.

2. Salig Ram — (Applicant) v. Emperor [Iqbal Ahmad C.J., Collister and Bajpai J.J. Full Bench (12 Nov. 1942)]

AIR, Vol. 30, 1943, Allahabad, pp. 26-46

Criminal Revn Appln. No. 842 of 1942, Decided on 12th November 1942, from order of Special Judge, Jaunpur, dt 17th September 1942. . . .

S.C. Das — for applicant.

Asstt Government Advocate — for the Crown.

Order (27th October 1942). This is an application in revision by one Salig Ram who, along with 30 other persons was tried by a Special Magistrate for an offence punishable under S.395, Penal Code. The offence that formed the subject of charge against the applicant was alleged to have been committed on 14th August 1942. The trial was by a Special Magistrate in pursuance of the provisions of S.10 of Ordinance No. 2 of 1942. The learned Magistrate acquitted one of the accused and convicted the remaining 30 accused. He sentenced Salig Ram to two years' rigorous imprisonment and to a fine of Rs 50 and in default of payment of fine he ordered Salig Ram to undergo six months' rigorous imprisonment. Salig Ram appealed to the Sessions Judge who dismissed the appeal holding that no appeal lay to him in view of the provisions of S.13 of the Ordinance. Salig Ram then filed the present application in revision in this Court. The decision of the Magistrate has been assailed by Mr Pyare Lal Banerji on two grounds. He has firstly contended that the Ordinance is ultra vires the Governor-General secondly, he has argued that even if the Ordinance is valid, it cannot apply to offences committed before 20th August 1942 the date on which the Ordinance came into force in this province. He has also argued that the decision of the Sessions Judge that no appeal lay to him is erroneous.

All the three Judges constituting the present Bench are of the opinion that there is no force in the contention that the Ordinance is ultra vires the Governor General. Two of the Judges constituting the present Bench are further of the opinion that offences committed even before 20th August 1942 can be tried by Special Magistrates under the Ordinance, and that the decision of the Sessions Judge that no appeal lay to him is correct. This application in revision must, therefore, fail and is dismissed. The reasons for the decision will be announced on a later date. Mr Das, who appears for Salig Ram prayed that a certificate be granted for appeal to the Federal Court in pursuance of the provisions of S.205, Government of India Act, 1935. Having heard Mr Pyare Lal Banerji at length on the first question mentioned above we are of the opinion that there is no substance in his argument. We, therefore, consider that no substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Government of India Act or any Order in council arises in the present case. Accordingly we refuse to give a certificate as prayed for.

(The reasons were then given by their Lordships on 12th November 1942).

[Omitted: Judgments of the majority of the Full Bench (Chief Justice Iqbal Ahmed and Justice Collister), who said that the Ordinance 2 of 1942 was not ultra vires, that it could apply retrospectively and that the denial of the right of appeal was correct — Ed.]

Bajpai J. — Salig Ram is the applicant before this Court. He was tried for an offence under S.395, Penal Code, by Syed Ifikhar Hussain, a Magistrate of the first class, who has been invested by the Provincial Government with the powers of a special magistrate under ordinance No. 2 of 1942. Salig Ram was convicted and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for two years and to a fine of Rs 50 and in default of the payment of fine to a further period of six months' rigorous imprisonment. Salig Ram appealed and his appeal was dismissed by the Additional Sessions Judge of Benares at Jaunpur on the ground that no appeal lay. Three points were taken on behalf of the applicant, (1) that the Ordinance was ultra vires of the Governor-General, (2) that even if the ordinance was not ultra vires it had no application to offences committed before 20th August 1942 when the Ordinance came into force, (3) that the learned Additional Sessions Judge was wrong in holding that no appeal lay to him against the conviction recorded by the Special Magistrate. The contention of the applicant is that this conviction and sentence mentioned above is illegal and that we should interfere in our revisional jurisdiction. It is necessary to say something about the history of Ordinance No. 2 of 1942.

On 2nd January 1942, the Governor-General made and promulgated the Ordinance in exercise of the powers conferred by S.72, Government of India Act, as set out in sch.9, Government of India Act, 1935. The preamble says that whereas an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary to provide for the setting up of Special Criminal Courts, an Ordinance is made and promulgated.

- (1) This Ordinance may be called the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 1942.
- (2) It extends to the whole of British India.
- (3) It shall come into force in any province only if the provincial Government, being satisfied of the existence of an emergency arising from (any disorder within the province or from) a hostile attack on India or on a country neighbouring on India or from the imminence of such an attack, by notification in the official Gazette, declares it to be in force in the province, and shall cease to be in force when such notification is rescinded.

The words within brackets were inserted by the Special Criminal courts (Second Amendment) Ordinance, 1942 (Ordinance No. 42 of 1942) which came into force on 19th August 1942. Thus it was only on 19th August 1942 that it was realized by the Governor-General for the first time that a state of emergency could arise or has arisen in India by reason of internal disorder and the Provincial Governments should be given authority to declare that the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance should come into force in any particular province. By a notification published in the U.P. Gazette Extraordinary, dated 20th August 1942, Confidential Department, dated Lucknow 20th August 1942, No. 7661.C.X., the Governor of the United Provinces came to the conclusion that whereas he was satisfied that a state of emergency had arisen from disorder within the province therefore in exercise of the powers conferred by Sub-s (3) of S.1 of the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 1942 (Ordinance No. 2 of 1942), 'the Governor hereby declares that the said ordinance shall come into force in the United Provinces with effect from the date of publication of this notification in the official Gazette'. By another notification, the Governor of the United Provinces under S.1 of the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 1942 appointed all Sessions Judges, Additional Sessions Judges and Assistant Sessions Judges, as had already exercised or may hereafter have exercised powers as such for not less than two years, to be Special Judges. Under S.5 the Governor directed that the Special Judges aforesaid shall try certain offences specified in the notification. Under S.9 the Governor invested all stipendiary Magistrates of the first class in the United Provinces, who had already exercised or who may hereafter have exercised, such powers for not less than two years, with the powers of a Special Magistrate under the said ordinance to be exercised throughout the district to which they might for the time being be attached. And under S.10 the Special Magistrates aforesaid were directed to try cases in which one or more persons was or were accused of certain offences specified in the notification.

The offence in question in the present case is said to have been committed on 14th August 1942. A first information report of the offence was made the very same day and the accused was arrested on 15th August 1942. The charge sheet was submitted by the police on 30th August 1942 and the trial commenced on 31st August 1942. The first contention on behalf of the applicant is that the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance No. 2 of 1942 is ultra vires of the Governor General. My Lord, the Chief Justice, has given his reasons at length for holding that there is no force in this contention. As I am in general agreement with his views, I do not consider it necessary to burden my judgment with my own reason. I, however, find that I am not in agreement either with him or with my brother Collister on the other two points raised by the applicant and I shall therefore state my reasons with all respect to my learned brethren in detail.

At the very outset, I wish to point out that the High Court has certain powers of revision over all criminal Courts within its jurisdiction under its Letters Patent as also by the code of criminal procedure. Under S.27 of the Ordinance the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure and of any other law for the time being in force, in so far as they may not be applicable and in so far as they are not in consistent with the provisions of the Ordinance, have been made applicable to all matters connected with, arising from or consequent upon a trial by special criminal courts constituted under this ordinance. The code of criminal procedure, therefore, has not been abrogated in its entirety but only in so far as its provisions may be inconsistent with the provisions of the ordinance. Section 26 deals with the topic of exclusion of interference of other courts, and therein it is stated that no court shall have authority to revise any proceedings of any court constituted under this ordinance save as provided in the ordinance. The High court under S.435, criminal P.C., can call for and examine the record of any proceeding before any inferior criminal court situated within the local limits of its jurisdiction for the purpose of satisfying itself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of any finding, sentence or order recorded or passed, and as to the regularity of any proceedings of such inferior Court, and under S.439, Criminal P.C.,¹ the High Court can pass appropriate orders. The object of conferring these powers on the High court is to give it a supervisory jurisdiction in order to correct miscarriage of justice arising out of misconception of law and thus prevent undeserved hardship to individuals.

I venture to suggest that if Special Magistrates and Special Judges are criminal Courts inferior to us, then we can call for and examine the record of their proceedings for the purpose of satisfying ourselves as to the correctness, legality or propriety of any finding, sentence or order recorded or passed by them — but subject to this that we can look at the correctness, legality or propriety of the finding, sentence or order with reference to the ordinance only. If there has been no violation of any of the provisions of the ordinance, then, however wrong or improper the sentence or order of the Special Magistrate or the Special Judge might otherwise be this Court would be powerless to interfere. As I read the section the jurisdiction of other courts which ordinarily would have jurisdiction either under the criminal procedure code or any other law is ousted only if the proceedings are valid under the ordinance and it could not have been the intention of the Legislature nor has it been so expressed, that the Special Criminal courts have been given an unfettered jurisdiction to act even in violation of the provisions of the ordinance or to pass orders under the colour of the ordinance when they have no such power.

I have assumed that the Special Magistrates and Special Judges are inferior Criminal Courts qua the High Court. It is true that Special Judges and Special Magistrates are under the direct control of the Provincial Government in as much as they have been appointed and invested with certain powers by the Provincial Government, but they are still courts contemplated by S.6, Criminal P.C.,² which speaks of courts constituted even under any law other than the criminal procedure code, and a restricted power of revision has been reserved by S.26 of the Ordinance and again in a restricted form the code of criminal procedure has been made applicable. I hold the view that if, for instance, a Special Magistrate take cognizance of an offence which under the Notification he is not authorized to take cognizance of the High Court's right of interference is not excluded. Similarly, where he offends against the provisions of the Ordinance in any other respect the High Court can revise his order. The court must be a court constituted under the ordinance and the proceedings must be valid proceedings under the ordinance before the jurisdiction of the High Court can be ousted.

I am very loath to hold, in the absence of clear and express language, that the highest court in the province is powerless in the matter of criminal justice administered by other courts in the province — courts which under every other law not rendered entirely ineffective even for the purpose of the ordinance are inferior to the High court. The whole object of conferring revisional jurisdiction on the High court is to make it a guardian of administration of criminal justice by other courts within its jurisdiction, and so long as criminal offences are tried by any court, ordinary or special, the High court automatically gets jurisdiction to supervise their proceedings and if this jurisdiction is to be taken away, express words are necessary in a statute even in a state of emergency, and I do not find such express words of far-reaching import in S.26, more particularly when S.27 preserves in a restricted form the application of ordinary law. It may be assumed that it is open to the Governor-General to make an ordinance declaring martial law when all ordinarily constituted courts will cease to function. It may be that in the exercise of the power of making ordinance it is open to the Governor General to abrogate all law and the functions of ordinary courts and allow martial law to be administered in an area and thereby exclude the revisional jurisdiction of the High court. It may be that it is also open to the Governor-General by making an ordinance to allow ordinary courts to administer criminal law and to take away from the High court its revisional jurisdiction, but both such ordinances must contain express words and this responsibility must be taken by the Legislature, but short of this I am not prepared to hold that the powers conferred on the High court by the letters patent and the criminal procedure code have been rendered nugatory.

With these preliminary observations, I proceed to consider question 2. It is contended broadly on behalf of the Crown that nobody has a vested right in procedure and by the Ordinance nothing has been done except to regulate and alter the procedure heretofore prevalent in connexion with certain offences. This principle may be accepted, but the application of the principle presents great difficulties when questions arise as to what is a matter of mere procedure and what is a matter of substantive right—difficulties which have engaged the attention of eminent Judges in England and in India. Mere procedure can, of course, be altered, and it cannot be argued that a person who has obtained a cause of action prior to an enactment regulating procedure has a right to say that his action must be tried according to the law prevalent before the new enactment, but if an action has been instituted before the enactment of any law the action will ordinarily be regulated by the old law and it is the old law which will govern appeals, etc. Besides this, an appeal, although it is a creation of statute and although no one can say that he has a common law right of his grievance being redressed by one court, is nonetheless a matter of right if once the statute has created the right. A statute ordinarily speaks from the date from which it is specified in the Act to come into operation or from the date when it receives assent where such assent is necessary and is prospective in its operation unless it in clear terms, says that it will have retrospective effect or when such an intention can be unhesitatingly gathered, and it is only then the vested rights might be impaired, otherwise vested rights would not be affected.

The right of appeal, as I said before, is a right, similarly, the right in a criminal case to obtain bail or to apply for habeas corpus to the High Court, and if these rights have been taken away by the Ordinance then the language must be explicit or the intention must be inevitable.

In (1905) A.C. 369, their Lordships of the Privy Council were considering the effect of the Judiciary Act of 1903, and Lord Macnaghten, while delivering the judgment, observed as follows:

As regards the general principles applicable to the case there was no controversy, on the one hand, it was not disputed that if the matter in question be a matter of procedure only, the petition is well founded. On the other hand, if it be more than a matter of procedure, if it touches a right in existence at the passing of the Act, it was conceded that, in accordance with a long line of authorities extending from the time of Lord Coke to the present day, the appellants would be entitled to succeed. The Judiciary Act is not retrospective by express enactment or by necessary intendment. And therefore the only question is, was the appeal to His Majesty in Council a right vested in the appellants at the date of the passing of the Act, or was it a mere matter of procedure? It seems to their Lordships that the question does not admit of doubt. To deprive a suitor in a pending action of an appeal to a superior tribunal which belonged to him as of right is a very different thing from regulating procedure.

This authority has been quoted in numerous subsequent cases in England and in India and leaves no room for doubt that the right of appeal is a right and not merely a procedural thing. In 50 All 965 a Full Bench of this Court speaks of appeal as a right and says,

A right of appeal in a suit is governed by the law prevailing at the date of the institution of the suit, and not by the law prevailing at the date of the decision of the suit or at the date of the filing of the appeal

In 52 Mad. 361 a Full Bench of that Court held,

... that the institution of the suit carries with it the implication that all appeals then in force are preserved to it through the rest of its career, unless the Legislature has either abolished the Court to which an appeal then lay or has expressly or by necessary intendment given the Act a retrospective effect

In A.I.R. 1928 Lah. 627 a Full Bench of the Lahore High Court held as follows:

It is now authoritatively settled that the right of appeal is not a mere matter of procedure, but is a vested right which inheres in a party from the commencement of the action in the Court of first instance. If according to the law in force at the time when the action was started in the Court of first instance the ultimate decision of such Court was appealable, the right to prefer or prosecute an appeal therefrom is not affected by subsequent change of the law abolishing the appeal or modifying its forum unless it is so provided expressly in the amending statute or follows by necessary implication from its terms.

It further held:

Statute should be interpreted, if possible, so as to respect vested rights and in the absence of anything in an enactment to show that it is to have retrospective operation it cannot be so construed as to have the effect of altering the law applicable to a claim in the litigation at the time when the Act is passed.

In A.I.R. 1927 P.C. 242 their Lordships observed that in (1905) A.C. 369 it was authoritatively stated that while provisions of a statute dealing merely with matters of procedure may properly, unless that construction be textually inadmissible, have retrospective effect attributed to them, provisions which touch a right in existence at the passing of the statute are not to be applied retrospectively in the absence of express enactment or necessary intendment. Their Lordships then observed:

Provisions which, if applied retrospectively would deprive of their existing finality orders which, when the statute came into force, were final, are provisions which touch existing rights.

It is clear that this is all the more so where an order which was not final is made final by a new Act. I need not labour this point any further. I therefore pass on to the next question whether any action was pending between Salig Ram, the accused, on the one hand, and the Crown on the other, when Ordinance No. 2 of 1942, promulgated by the Governor-General was made applicable to these provinces by means of notification made by the Governor. The notification, as I said before, was made on 20th August 1942.

The offence was committed on 14th August 1942 and a first information report was made the very same day. The accused was arrested on 15th August 1942 and the police started with the investigation as provided in the Criminal Procedure Code. In a civil suit an action starts not with the accrual of the cause of action but the institution of a plaint or some similar proceeding and it is reasonable and logical to say that in a criminal case the action starts with the filing of a complaint or with the making of a report, and when, as in the present case, the accused is arrested and the machinery of law in the shape of a police investigation is started, the action has commenced, and it is not necessary that the trial with all its formalities should have commenced before a Court. Even if there were some doubt in this matter, the doubt must be solved in favour of the subject and not in favour of the Crown according to all canons of criminal jurisprudence. By the special ordinance, many vested rights which I have enumerated before were taken away, the right of appeal, the unrestricted powers of the High Court in matters of revision, the right to move superior tribunals in the matter of bail, the right to apply in habeas corpus to the High Court.

Apart from this, I cannot but take notice of the fact that by the sister ordinance No. 3 of 1942, which was also made and promulgated by the Governor-General in exercise of the powers conferred by S.72, Government of India Act, as set out in Sch.9, Government of India Act, 1935, on 2nd January 1942, penalties provided by law for the punishment of certain offences were enhanced, and although this ordinance No. 3 of 1942 did not make an innocent action criminal and punishable as a crime, it undoubtedly aggravated the crime and enhanced the punishment. By S.23 of Ordinance No. 2 of 1942, a special rule of evidence inconsistent with the Evidence Act of 1872 was enacted. Section 24 enacted a special rule of procedure for the recovery of fines inconsistent with S.386, Criminal P.C. Section 24A enacted a special provision regarding bail, and S.25 fettered to a certain extent the right of an accused in connexion with legal practitioners. These far-reaching consequences affecting rights were brought into existence by Ordinance No. 2 and Ordinance No. 3 of 1942 passed both on 2nd January 1942. I now naturally pass on the question whether there is anything in ordinance No. 2 of 1942 which in express terms makes the Ordinance applicable retrospectively or if such an intention can be necessarily gathered, and I shall confine my discussion to the case of Special Magistrates only for which provision is made in S.10 of the ordinance and the same is applicable in the case of Special Judges for which provision is made in S.5 of the Ordinance. Section 10 says that a Special Magistrate shall try such offences or classes of offences, . . . as the Provincial Government, or a servant of the crown empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf, may, by general or special order in writing, direct.

The argument on behalf of the Crown is that the moment a Special Magistrate is directed by the proper authority to try an offence, the Special Magistrate needs must try it under the ordinance. This may be so, but the question is whether the authority concerned has the power to make such a direction under the ordinance. If what I have said in an earlier portion of my judgment is correct, the action in the case of the present accused had commenced before 20th August 1942, and unless the authority was competent to direct the trial of this particular offence by the Special Magistrate the trial would be vitiated. If there is absence of power in the directing authority there is absence of special jurisdiction in the Magistrate or the Judge and even if the Magistrate or the Judge purports to act like a Special Magistrate or a special Judge he remains for all purposes an ordinary Magistrate and an ordinary Judge under the Criminal Procedure code and there is no difficulty in holding that all the powers of the High Court under S.345 and 339, Criminal P.C., remain intact, unfettered by any provision of the Ordinance. The trial and conviction by a Special Magistrate or a Special Judge under the Ordinance can only be protected and that too if they do not violate any of the provisions of the Ordinance if the Special Magistrate or the special judge assumes a valid jurisdiction under the ordinance, but, if for some reason, the assumption of jurisdiction is unjustified then the Special Magistrate or the Special Judge is only functioning as an ordinary Court under the Criminal Procedure code and no provision of the Ordinance comes into play and a fortiori the alleged bar to the revisional jurisdiction of the High Court under S.26 does not come into play.

The words in S.10 are 'shall try such offences or classes of offences'. The Crown wants me to read that these words necessarily imply the reading of certain other words, namely 'whether committed before or after the coming into operation of the Ordinance'. Words should not be read into a statute ordinarily unless the context to the scheme of the Act warrant the addition of the words. The emergency which necessitated the constitution of Special Courts in the Province was brought about by a state of disorder within the province, and to my mind acts and disorder which brought about the emergency are outside the scope of the Ordinance and the Ordinance must apply only to offences which were committed after the passing of the Ordinance, otherwise the result will be that the very acts which brought about the emergency would be caught by the Act which was passed because of those acts and the very first illegal act which along with certain other acts created the emergency would be triable under the Ordinance and not merely those acts which came into existence after the state of emergency. In other words, cause, effect and remedy should be kept distinct and not merged into one in an ordinance like this. I may make this point a little more explicit. A number of acts convinced the Governor-General on 19th August 1942 that a state of emergency had arisen in India because of internal disorder and on 20th August 1942 the Governor of this Province was similarly convinced — and of these conditions the Governor-General and the Governor alone are the sole arbiters and the Governor therefore issued a notification in exercise of the powers conferred by sub.S.(3) of S.I., Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 1942, and to my mind the inference is obvious that henceforward people are warned that if they commit certain act of disorder they will be tried in a different manner and drastic punishments will be meted out to them. The Act, therefore, does not in express terms say that the Special Magistrate shall try offences whether committed before the passing of the Act or committed after the passing of the Act, and the necessary implication, to my mind, is that the offences committed before the Act are outside the scope of the Ordinance. If the Ordinance was intended to apply to offences committed before the notification, there was nothing easier than to say so, as was done in 2 and 3 Geo. VI, Chap. 62, Emergency powers of Defence Act of 1939, where the Act was made applicable to proceedings instituted before or after the commencement of the Act in express terms. There is the authority of the highest court in England as to the principles of construction in matters like these. In (1894) 1 Q.B. 725 Lopes L.J. observed as follows:

It is well recognized principle in the construction of statutes that they operate only on cases and facts which come into existence after the statutes were passed, unless a retrospective effect is clearly intended [The italics are mine].

This principle of construction is specially applicable when the enactment to which a retrospective effect is sought to be given would prejudicially affect vested rights or the legal character of past transactions.

The learned Judge was dealing with the Bankruptcy Act where the words were 'where a debtor is adjudged bankrupt'. It was urged before him that the words 'where a debtor is adjudged bankrupt' were equivalent to the words where a debtor is an adjudicated bankrupt, but the argument was repelled by the observation that if the Legislature so meant why they did not use that form. His Lordship said.

It seems to me highly improbable that the Legislature when passing a new Bankruptcy Act creating great changes in the law, and attaching wider and graver disabilities to ba bankruptcy, would impose new and penal consequences on bankruptcies already existing.

Davey L.J. at p. 740 said as follows:

The question therefore seems to me to turn on the proper construction to be put on the words where a man is adjudged bankrupt at the commencement of S.32, Bankruptcy Act, 1883. 'Now, reading those words alone, and apart from considerations arising out of the subject-matter of the section in which they occur, I should certainly understand them (according to the ordinary use of the English language) to mean, if any man shall or may hereafter be adjudged bankrupt, and unless there be some controlling context in the Act or in the section, I hold that to be meaning of the words. It has been suggested that the words may be read as meaning where a man is an adjudicated bankrupt'. The answer seems to me to be that those are not the words before us, and that the words we have to construe are grammatically different. I think words 'is adjudged' are the verb, whereas in the paraphrase suggested the word 'adjudicated' would be an adjective.

I again wish to repeat that the words are not 'offence whether committed before or after the passing of the Act', and the scheme of the Act. I have discussed that when I was considering the question about the creation of the emergency-suggests that the statute was to operate only in cases and on facts which come into existence after the statute was passed. The principle of law laid down by Lord Coleridge C.J. and Denman J. in (1891) 2 Q.B. 145 also supports my view. Lord Coleridge C.J. observed:

The question raised in this case is no doubt very capable of argument on both sides; but on the whole I think it is safer to hold that S.26, Bankruptcy Act, 1890, is not retrospective in its operation and that where a person is accused on an offence created by that Act, as applied to Debtors Act, 1869, all the ingredients of the offence must have taken place before 1st January, 1891, upon, which date the Act of 1890 came into operation, I think that the words in S.26 'shall have effect' must mean 'shall have effect from 1st January 1891'. That conclusion is supported by the view that to give a retrospective effect to the statute would be to deprive the defendant of a defence upon which, at the time the acts complained of were committed, he was entitled to rely. It seems to me a very strong thing to hold that a defence which was open to a man at the time he did the acts complained of has been taken away by the retrospective operation of a subsequent statute.

In connexion with the present case, it might be said, regard being had to the sister ordinance No. 3 of 1942, that a defence was open to the accused that he could not be sentenced to a term longer than that provided by the Penal code in respect to the offences which he had committed, and looking at ordinance No. 2 of 1942 itself he could say that he was entitled to appeal and to apply for bail or habeas corpus under the criminal procedure code and all these rights which are in the nature of defences could not be taken away by the retrospective operation of ordinance No. 2. I have, therefore, in respectful disagreement with the opinion of my Lord the Chief Justice and my brother Collister, come to the conclusion that the offences committed before 20th August 1942 could not be directed to be tried by the special Magistrate.

The third contention on behalf of the applicant is that the learned additional Sessions Judge was in error in holding that no appeal lay to him against the conviction recorded by the Special Magistrate. This is, of course, on the assumption that the Special Magistrate could try the present accused of the offence with which he was charged. In this connexion I need not repeat what I have already said that under the provisions of SS.435 and 439, Criminal P.C.,³ this court has the power to revise the orders of Special Judge and Special Magistrates where they have acted in violation not merely of any rule enunciated in the Penal code or the Criminal Procedure Code, but where they have erred in construing or interpreting a particular provision of the Ordinance and have acted contrary to its provision. The right of appeal has been given to an accused under the Ordinance by S.13 which reads as follows:

Where a Special Magistrate passes a sentence of transportation or imprisonment for a term exceeding two years an appeal shall lie to the Special Judge having jurisdiction in the area, or, if there is no Special Judge for the area, to the High Court in a presidency town and elsewhere to the Court of Session.

The Additional Sessions Judge before whom the appeal came up for hearing in the present case was a Special Judge, and the question that I have got to decide is whether the Special Magistrate passed a sentence of transportation or of rigorous imprisonment for a term exceeding two years. Salig Ram has been convicted by the Special Magistrate under S.395. Penal Code, and sentenced to a term of rigorous imprisonment for two years and a fine of Rs 50 and in default of the payment of fine to a further term of rigorous imprisonment for six months. The question is whether the Special Magistrate in the present case has passed an appealable sentence. Am I stretching the language of S.19 at all, or in any event, am I stretching it to an extent to which a subject is not entitled as against the Crown in matters of penal law, when I say that S.13 can be read as follows after omitting unnecessary words.

Where a Special Magistrate passes a sentence which is in excess of a sentence of rigorous imprisonment of two years.

If I am right in this connexion than, to my mind, it is obvious that the learned Special Magistrate did pass a heavier sentence than the sentence of rigorous imprisonment for two years. The sentence of fine is also a sentence, and the combination of the two sentence, namely, a sentence of fine of Rs 50 and a sentence of rigorous imprisonment for two years, is a sentence in excess of what the Special Magistrate was competent to pass, if he intended, the sentence to be a non-appealable sentence. The matter becomes all the more obvious when we find that in default of the payment of fine the accused has a right not to — (and in any event there is the possibility of not being able to) pay the fine, and in that case, the needs must suffer rigorous imprisonment for another six months. The special judge was therefore, in error in holding that the sentence passed by the Special Magistrate was a non-appealable sentence, and I would, therefore, have in my revisional jurisdiction not ousted but reserved by S.26 of the Ordinance, sent back the appeal to the Special Judge for disposal on the merits and according to law, for I hold the view that even under the Ordinance the High court has the power to revise the orders of the special Courts when they act in contravention of the provisions of the Ordinance itself.

By the Court – As already ordered on 27th October, 1942, the application is dismissed.

Application dismissed.

- 1 Section 439 of the Cr. Proc. Code laid down that the High Court had powers of revision.
- 2 Section 6 of the Cr. Proc. Code described the five classes of Criminal Courts in India – Court of Sessions, Presidency Magistrates, Magistrates of First Class, Magistrates of Second Class, Magistrates of 3rd Class.
- 3 Section 435 of the Cr. Proc. Code gave the High Court the power to call for the records of inferior courts. The judge of any superior court 'may call for and examine the records of any proceeding before any inferior Criminal Court within the local limits of its or his jurisdiction . . . [to satisfy himself] as to the correctness, legality or propriety of any findings. Sentence or order recorded or passed by such inferior courts'.

3. Banwari Gope and others (Petitioners) v. Emperor [Harries C.J., Fazl Ali and Varma J.J. Full Bench (20 Nov. 1942)]

AIR, Vol. 30, 1943, Patna, pp. 18-23

Criminal Revn. Applns. Nos 638 and 640 of 1942. Decided on 20th November 1942, from order of Special Magistrate, Dinapur, D/7th September 1942 and Special Magistrate, Patna City, D/8th September 1942.

Rajeshwari Prasad and G.P. Sahi (in No. 638) and S.M. Gupta and S.C. Chakravarty (in No. 649) – for Petitioners.

Advocate-General – for the Crown.

Fazl Ali J. – These are two revision applications by certain persons who have been tried and convicted by Special Magistrates appointed under Ordinance 2 of 1942 and the point which has been urged on their behalf is that the Special Magistrate had no jurisdiction to try them inasmuch as before the Ordinance came into force the Subdivisional Officers of Dinapur and Patna city respectively had taken cognizance of the offences said to have been committed by them and the criminal proceedings against them had started under the ordinary law. Ordinance 2 of 1942 as amended by Ordinance 42 of 1942 empowers the Provincial Governments to constitute Special Courts of criminal jurisdiction on being satisfied of the existence of an emergency arising from a hostile attack on India or a country neighbouring on India or from the imminence of such an attack or from any disorder within the province. The provisions relating to the Special Magistrates, with whom alone we are concerned at present, are to be found in SS.9 to 14 of the Ordinance. These sections provide that any Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class who has exercised powers as such for a period of not less than two years may be invested by the Provincial Government with the powers of a Special Magistrate under the Ordinance and that these Magistrates shall try such offences or classes of offences or such cases or classes of cases other than offences or cases involving offences punishable under the Indian Penal Code with death, as the Provincial Government, or a servant of the Crown empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf, may, by general or special order in writing, direct. The Special Magistrate, after he is appointed, is to try cases which are placed before him according to the procedure laid down in S.6 and may pass any sentence authorized by law except a sentence of death or of transportation or imprisonment exceeding seven years. Where, however, he passed a sentence of transportation or imprisonment for a term exceeding two years, an appeal lies to the Special Judge having jurisdiction in the area or, if there is no Special Judge for the area, to the High Court in a presidency town and elsewhere to the Court of Session.

It appears that the Ordinance 2 of 1942 was declared to be in force in the Province of Bihar on 21st August 1942 and after the Special Courts were duly created, the District Magistrate of Patna, who was presumably the Crown Officer empowered by the Provincial Government to direct what classes of cases were to be tried by the Special Magistrates appointed under the Ordinance, first passed an order on 23rd August 1942 authorizing all the Special Magistrates in the district to try such cases as were specified in the order and then on 27 August 1942 directed certain offences answering the description to be found in S.10 of the Ordinance to be tried by them. The language of these orders was subjected to certain criticisms, but as those criticisms are of a very minor nature and will not affect the decision of the present case, I will not refer to them but proceed at once to state the relevant facts of the two cases which are before us. The petitioners in criminal Revision No. 638 are four in number and they have been prosecuted for contravening R.56 and 35, Defence of India Act, by taking part in a procession which had been banned by the order of the District magistrate and by causing damage to the telephone line within the compound of one Mr Bashir, a Group Warden, on 13th August 1942. In regard to these offences which are said to have been committed by these petitioners on 13th August 1942, the Subdivisional Officer of Dinapur recorded the following order in the ordersheet on 14th August.

Received complaint under S.56 of the Defence of Indian Rules. Cognizance taken. The accused Banwari Goala, Jagernath Halwai, Girdhari Chamar and Janki Halwai are produced in custody of Dinapur police. They do not complain of maltreatment by the escorting party. They are committed to custody till 28th August 1942.

The next order which was recorded on 28th August 1942 is to the following effect: 'Put up before Special Magistrate on 1st September 1942.' Then comes a third order which is dated 29th August 1942 and it reads as follows:

I.O reports that the accused (1) Jagernath Halwai, (2) Banwari Gope, (3) Girdhari Chamar (4) Janki Halwai be prosecuted under S.56, D.I. Rules. Cognizance has already been taken on the previous report. Put up on 1st September 1942, before the special Magistrate.

After this date the case was sent to a Special Magistrate for disposal on 1st September 1942 and on 4th September 1942 the Magistrate in question framed a charge not only under R.56 but also under R.35 of the Defence of India Rules. On 7th September 1942, the Special Magistrate found the petitioners guilty on both the charges and sentenced them to undergo rigorous imprisonment for three years under R.35, cl. (4) but he passed no separate sentence under R.56 (4). The point which has been emphasised in this case is that the sub-divisional officer of Dinapur had, as was expressly stated in the order-sheet, taken cognizance of the case on 14th August 1942, that is to say, before ordinance 2 was brought into force in the province. The petitioner in Criminal Revision No. 640 is Lachmi Narain Tamoli who has been convicted by a Special Magistrate of an offence under S.411, Penal Code, and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for the twelve months. It appears that this man was arrested on 15th August 1942 on the charge that he had committed theft in respect of a cap belonging to a soldier attached to a British Regiment stationed at Patna. Five days later, that is to say, on 20th August 1942 the police submitted a charge-sheet against him and the sub-divisional officer of Patna city sent the case to Mr T. Hossain for disposal. On 21st August the sub-divisional officer finding that 'Mr Hossain's file was congested' transferred the case to another Magistrate named Mr Ghosal for disposal and on that very day Mr Ghosal summoned certain witnesses for 26 August 1942. On the latter date, one of the two prosecution witnesses was examined by Mr Ghosal and the other being absent the case was adjourned to 28th August 1942. On that very date, the Subdivisional Officer withdrew the case to his own file on the ground that the case was triable by a Special Magistrate and after proceeding with the trial as a Special Magistrate convicted and sentenced the petitioner as already stated on 8th September 1942. The petitioner there upon preferred an appeal to the Special Judge, but his appeal was summarily dismissed on the ground that no appeal lay under the Ordinance as the sentence passed by the Special Magistrate did not exceed two years. Thereafter he preferred this criminal revision. At this stage it seems necessary to refer to S.26 of the Ordinance which reads as follows.

Notwithstanding the provisions of the Code, or of any other law for the time being in force, or of anything having the force of law by whatsoever authority made or done, there shall, save as provided in this Ordinance, be no appeal from any order or sentence of a Court constituted under this Ordinance and, save as aforesaid, no court shall have authority to revise such order or sentence, or to transfer any case from any such court, or to make any order under S.491 of the code or have any jurisdiction of any kind in respect of any proceedings of any such Court.

Upon this provision there can be no doubt that if the Ordinance is found to be applicable to these two cases so that the petitioners could have been properly tried under it, this court can have no jurisdiction to revise the order of conviction and sentence against which these applications are directed. The point, however, which is raised in both the cases is that the Ordinance was not applicable to these two cases and the Special magistrates by whom the petitioners have been tried had no jurisdiction to try them. The main ground which is urged in support of this contention is that the Ordinance cannot be given retrospective operation and is not applicable to those cases in which the criminal proceedings had started before it came into force.

[Omitted: Judge's observations, citing cases and legal principles, on how far a statute could be given retrospective effect, and on various aspects of the Criminal Procedure code, including the right of appeal — Ed.]

The next point to be decided is what power can be exercised by the High Court in these cases. It seems to me to be plain that the High Court cannot revise the order of conviction or sentence passed by the Special Magistrates concerned under SS.435 and 439, Criminal P.C., because this power of revision can be exercised only as against orders passed by Magistrates exercising jurisdiction under the code of Criminal Procedure. As the Special Magistrates derived their jurisdiction from the ordinance, they cannot be properly described as 'inferior criminal Courts' and the High court cannot revise their order. It does not however necessarily follow from this that the High court is entirely powerless in the matter. Under S 491, Criminal P.C.,¹ the High court may direct that a person illegally or improperly detained in public or private custody within the limits of its appellate criminal jurisdiction be set at liberty. It seems obvious to me that if the ordinance under which the petitioners were tried was not applicable to their cases, then their trial was no trial at all in the eye of law and they cannot be detained in a prison, because they should be deemed to have been committed to prison without a trial and because the Magistrates who have sentenced them to imprisonment had no power to send them to prison.

These facts, in my opinion, are sufficient to attract the jurisdiction which this Court undoubtedly possesses under S.491, Criminal P.C., and this court is accordingly competent to order the petitioners to be set at liberty in exercise of such jurisdiction. It is true that S.26 provides among other things that no Court shall make any order under S.491 of the Code or have any jurisdiction of any kind in respect of any proceedings of any Special Magistrates or Special Courts constituted under this ordinance, but this prohibition applies only to those cases to which the ordinance is applicable and which can be tried under the ordinance. As the cases before us could not be tried under the ordinance, they stand outside the ordinance and S.26 or anything contained in the section does not apply to them. I would therefore direct that the petitioners in both the cases be set at liberty at once. It is hardly necessary to add that it will be open to the authorities concerned, if they are so advised, to take such action against the petitioners as the law permits.

Harries C.J. — I agree and have nothing to add.

Varma J. — I agree.

Judgment

The prosecution case briefly is as follows: on the 20.9.42 at about 2. p.m. about two thousand persons, consisting of Santi Senas or congress Volunteers and other villagers males and females, came from the east and assembled in front of the Dhakiajuli Police station with a view to trespass into the thana compound and hoist Congress flag there. Accused Kamala and absconding accused Bapuram with four others holding congress flags in their hands forcibly entered the thana compound in the first instance. S.I. Mohindhar Bora, o/c Dhakiajuly P.S., warned them several times and asked them to desist from entering into the thana compound but they did not pay heed to it. S.I., Mohindhar Bora then ordered the unarmed constables to disperse the crowd by a lathi charge but the Santi senas and others attacked the Police, accused Kamala Kanta ordered the mob to attack and arrest the Police and take charge of the thana. The crowd attacked and injured the unarmed constables, the A.S.I. and the S.I. when the latter ordered the armed constable to open fire. The armed force opened fire but the mob attacked them and snatched away their rifles and injured the Head constable and seven armed constables. As the firing was continued the mob ultimately dispersed leaving 6 dead and 6 injured persons amongst them in the thana compound. The rioters took away three rifles some ammunition and certain other properties at the time of their dispersal. As S.I. Mohindhar Bora was lying on bed with injuries on his person, an A.S.I. lodged an ejahar and took cognizance of the case. The investigation of the case was subsequently taken up by S.I. Brajabashi De.

Charge sheet u/s 147/379/353 I.P.S. was submitted against the present seven accused and 22 others including two absconding accused. Of the 27 persons placed on their trial 11 persons were discharged and 2 persons were acquitted u/s 194 I.P.C. on the prosecution withdrawing the case against them; 6 persons were discharged u/s 253 (1) Cr.P.C. for want of sufficient evidence against them. The remaining seven persons are awaiting judgment in this case.

The defence is that the processionists were peaceful that just as they entered the thana compound with flags the o/c, Dhakiajuli P.S. ordered the armed constables to open fire and after the fire was opened some members in the crowd got unruly and assaulted the police officers that the firing was premature and unnecessary and that none of the present accused assaulted any member of the police force and that none but Kamala Kanta had at all gone with the crowd. Kamala admits having gone with the processionists but denies having entered the thana compound or having assaulted S.I. Mohindhar Bora or any other police officer. Accused Kalicharan says that he had gone to Dhakiajuli hat and had nothing to do with the procession and did neither enter the thana compound nor assault A.S.I. Hiranmay Purkayastha. Accused Jiban says that on the date of occurrence he was attending the Sradh ceremony at parbatha in the house of the near relation of his, Bhedaswar says that he was too ill to go out and was at home on that day. Gobardhan says that he was never known by the name of Rupdhan and was lying ill at home on the date of occurrence. Accused Bhaba says that he had gone to Dibru-Darrang hat on that day and did not go to Dhakiajuli. Accused Bhogram says that he was at home on that day.

The prosecution has examined the complaint (P.W.1), the Officer-in-Charge of the Police Station (P.W.2) unarmed constables Chandra Kanta (P.W.4), Bhunidhar Saikia (P.W.5) Dimbeswar Koch (P.W.6), Girija Dhanuk (P.W.12), armed Head Constable Thanuram Kachari (P.W.7) three outsiders Rebat Kumat Tamuli Mauzadar (P.W.3), Surya Ram Brahmin (P.W.8) and Prabhat Chandra Bora (P.W.11) and two medical officers, sub-Assistant Surgeons of Dhakiajuli Dispensary (P.W.13) and Assistant Surgeon of Tezpur (P.W.14) and an Assistant Sub-Inspector (P.W.9) and investigating police officer (P.W.10).

Accused Bhadreswar Jiban Mohanta, Bhaba Kanta and Gobardhan have, each of them examined one witness in support of the defence plea of alibi.

At the instance of both the prosecution and the defence I had been to the Dhakiajuli Police Station to make a local inspection and a memorandum of Local Inspector has been placed on the record.

The points for our determination are:

- (1) Whether the crowd that went to Dhakiajuli police station on the 29th September 1942 formed itself into an unlawful assembly and, if not whether some members of the said assembly used force in the furtherance of their common object.
- (2) Whether the accused were members of such an unlawful assembly.
- (3) Whether accused Kamala Kanta assaulted sub-inspector Mohidhar Arora in the execution of his duty as a public servant.
- (4) Whether accused Kali Charan assaulted Assistant Sub Inspector Hiranmay Purkayastha in the execution of his duty as a public servant.

Let us proceed to discuss the evidence on the first point. My task has indeed been made very easy by the learned pleaders for the defence by their suggesting to P.W.8 in his cross examination that some members of the crowd got unruly after the order for opening fire was given and these people assaulted the police officers.

This suggestion is a clear admission of the fact that the assembly was an unlawful one. Even if the assembly were not unlawful in its inception it became unlawful as soon as its members trespassed into the thana compound and assaulted the public officers. But the assembly was unlawful from its very inception. There is overwhelming evidence to show that the assembly was headed by certain persons holding flags and that they wanted to enter into the thana compound to hoist the said flags. There is thus abundant evidence to show that the common object of the assembly which consisted of about 2000 persons was to trespass into thana compound and hoist congress flag to cause annoyance to the police officers in occupation thereof. The assembly must therefore be designated unlawful under section 141 I.P.C. Third clause as to using force the defence suggestion itself admits that force was used at a later stage. There is no doubt that force was used in prosecution of the common object of the assembly. If so every member of the assembly would be guilty of rioting in view of the provisions of section 146 I.P.C. The learned pleader for the defence who argued the case so ably, commented on the numerous discrepancies in the prosecution evidence, Discrepancies have been too numerous as to the number of persons composing the procession. The number of females, number of each row, number on the culvert of females and of males, position of police officers and constables and of the female and male processionists and on similar points. The learned Public Prosecutor in their arguments asked me to read the evidence as a whole; and reading the evidence as a whole I have no doubt in my mind that the processionists numbering about 2000 came to Dhakiajuli police station with a view to hoist Congress flag there and that some amongst the crowd assaulted the police officers and snatched away lathis from the unarmed constables and also hat, pugrees, etc. This broad fact have not been denied by the defence and I have no hesitation in coming to this conclusion on a consideration of the evidence on record. The learned pleader for the defence has admitted that P.W.8 was nearer the truth than any other P.W. and that he was least biased in favour of the police. I propose to quote his statement about the occurrence to show that the conclusion arrived at by me in this respect is justified on the Evidence on record. He says 'I went to the thana compound and took my stand near the gate. The crowd stood quiet for sometime and then shouted 'Bandemateram'. Those who had flags in their hand — some had garlands also in their hands — came in the front and talked to Daroga. Daroga asked them not to create trouble adding that if they did so then fire would have to be opened. Then one man at the back blew a whistle immediately after the crowd forcibly entered the thana compound and surrounded the four unarmed constables in the front and caught the chhoto Daroga by his throat, the crowd then attacked the bara Daroga and threw him down. They also surrounded the armed constables, baradaroga then ordered the armed constables to open fire. The crowd had thrown down all armed constables except two who were still standing. At Daroga's orders the said two constables opened fire. at this time I was standing at a distance of about 5 cubits to the East of the thana building'. The occurrence as stated above apart from discrepancies on minor details have been broadly corroborated by every other eye witness. I have therefore no hesitation in holding that the crowd that came to the thana formed itself into an unlawful assembly and that some members thereof in prosecution of the common object of the assembly used force and as such every member thereof was guilty of rioting.

Before proceeding to discuss the evidence another point, I think I should briefly discuss the evidence on the point of justification or otherwise of the firing resorted to by the police force at the time of the occurrence, this point if not directly at issue of adjudication but nevertheless evidence was adduced on the point and was referred to at the time of the argument. Six out of the eight armed constables, 6 unarmed constables and the S.I. and the A.S.I. were all injured, some severe, some slight, three bayonets, leather pouch containing a quantity of ammunition were taken away. Lathis were snatched away. Constables pugrees, A.S.I.'s felt hat and one constable's shirt were taken away, as stated by P.W.8 all but 2 armed constables were thrown down by the mob. Whether with greater tact and courage the catastrophe could have been averted is another question, but circumstances assumed such a proportion that S.I. Mohindhar could reasonably get apprehensive that the force at his disposal would be overpowered by the mob and his order to the armed constables to open fire could not be said to have been unjustified or even premature, but it was the subsequent stage in the drama that was most pitiful, the firing resorted to by probably two constables — the other constables were almost simultaneously with the order to open fire overpowered and it is doubtful if actually any of them could open fire at all — was uncontrolled and ruthless, that the civil constables were overpowered before they could use their lathis and that the majority of the armed constables were overpowered and some of their rifles snatched away would go to show that they were not well prepared for the eventuality and that they lacked in courage. The large number of persons assembled on the road made them nervous and they were easy prey, and perhaps to some extent willing victims to the fury of the mob. Their lack of courage was more than compensated by the ruthlessness of the two constables who could not be overpowered by the mob, they fired and fired even at the back of the fleeing crowd and aimlessly and probably some one also chased the fleeing crowd by the road to some distance. A dead body was found in the Hatkhola to the south of the thana building, one was found to the south of the thana culvert and another that of a young girl near the culvert over the road in front of Satish Biswas's shop (a dead boy was found later on near the Gandnajuli river at a distance of more than a mile from P.S.) there were injured persons picked up from outside the thana compound; the man found dead in the hatkhola was a beggar. These facts go to prove that the firing as resorted to by the constables was indiscriminate, uncontrolled and cowardly but for this the S.I. or even O.C. Thanura could hardly be blamed. It is unnecessary to discuss the evidence on this unhappy episode resulting in the death of 11 persons further.

I propose to discuss the evidence on the next three points together.

Let me take up the case of Jiban Mohanta first he was identified by A.S.I H. Purkayastha (P.W.1) and S.I. Mohindhar Bora (P.W.2), P.W.1 saw him when 500 to 600 men entered the thana compound from the eastern side of the culvert P.W.2 saw him when 150 men entered in from the culvert at the first instance and he also saw him as some men surrounded him, the accused being in that crowd, accused name does not appear in the ejahar. P.W.S. 1 & 2 deposed against this accused in another political case sometime back when they saw him in Court P.W.1 is a cousin brother of the accused, he says that Jiban went to their village on 19.9.42 and was in his house the whole of the next day and till 4 p.m. of the day following (21.9.42) in connection with the Sraddha ceremony of his father. Prosecution evidence itself does not seem to be free from doubt and then I see no particular reason to disbelieve this P.W. I therefore hold that accused Jiban Mohanta was not a member of the unlawful assembly.

Let us than take the case of Gobordhan, P.W.1 & 2 have identified him. P.W.1 saw him with 500 to 600 men that entered the thana by the eastern side, according to P.W.1 & 2 at first about 150 men attacked them from the side of the culvert, after that about 500 to 600 men trespassed into thana compound. According to P.W.1 Gobardhan entered the thana with the first batch of 150 persons and that he was also one of those who had surrounded him. Apart from this discrepancy the most damaging part of the evidence is that P.W.1 asked constable Dimbeswar (P.W.6) as to the name of Gobordhan when entered the thana with 500 to 600 men and P.W.6 told him that his name was Rupdhan and that as such P.W.1 could know this accused but P.W.6 does neither identify this accused nor corroborate the statement of P.W.1 in this respect, then P.W. at first identified accused Jiban saying that he was Rupdhan. The name Rupdhan appears in the ejahar but in view of the circumstances disclosed in evidence it is extremely doubtful if accused Gobordhan was at all seen in the crowd either by P.W.1 or by P.W.2, a neighbour of this accused says that on the date of occurrence accused was lying ill of swollen feet, swollen face and swollen arms at his home, he also says that he never heard the accused called by anybody by the name Rupdhan. I see no particular reason to disbelieve this witness and I am sure that this accused's case is one of mistaken identity P.W.3 who knew him from before did not also see him in the crowd. I therefore, hold that accused Gobordhan was not a member of the unlawful assembly.

Let us now consider the case of Bhaba Kanta. His name does not appear in the ejahar, but he has been identified by both P.W.1 and P.W.2 P.W.1 saw this accused when struggle for rifles was proceeding. P.W.2 says that soon after Kamala and Bapuram struck him Bhaba and others also seized him. P.W.1 does not corroborate him. P.W.1 and 2 deposed in certain other political cases against this accused and had seen him there, this may also have been a case of mistaken identity. P.W.4 a co-villager of this accused, says that on the day of occurrence he went with Bhaba to Dibru-Darrang hat to sell rice and they returned also from there together and that they did not go to Dhakiajuli to join the procession on that day. The prosecution evidence itself is discrepant and then I see no particular reason to disbelieve the P.W. In these circumstances I am unable to hold that this accused was a member of the unlawful assembly.

I propose to take up the case of accused Bhadreswar next he has been identified by P.Ws

1, 2 and 12. Bhadreswar's plea of alibi has not been substantiated. P.W.1 did not see the accused after the first week of September 1942 and as such he cannot say about the accused's ability to walk up to Dhakiajuli on 20.9.42. There is however some discrepancy about the part taken by Bhadreswar in the statements of P.Ws 1, 2 & 12. P.W.1 saw him on the road 50 or 60 cubits to the East of the culvert. P.W.12 saw him on the culvert, but P.W.2 says that Bhadreswar also seized him after he was attacked by Kamala and Bapur, there is no corroboration of this statement. P.Ws 1 and 2 deposed against Bhadreswar in some other political case, so his name must have been known to them, his name appears in the ejhar. But the question remains when he was seen; P.Ws 1, 2 and 12 were together but they put Bhadreswar in widely different places. Bhadreswar is well known to P.Ws.3 and 11. P.W.11 is a relative of P.W.2 and could survey the whole of the thana compound from the place where he was standing, he says that he did not see Bhadreswar. P.W.3 who was also near P.W.2 until he was attacked also says the same thing, it appears rather improbable that he could not have seen this accused if he were either on the culvert or at the place where P.W.2 was attacked. In these circumstances a reasonable doubt arises if this accused was really recognised by the P.Ws or this was also a case of mistaken identity, whatever that may be, this accused also is entitled to the benefit of doubt.

Accused Bhogram alias Daffla has been identified by P.Ws.1 and 2. P.W.2 says that he saw the accused when he also seized him after the attack by Kamala and Bapuram P.W.1 him when the struggle for the rifle was going on. He is not named in the ejhar, nor has any other witness identified him, there is no evidence either that any other accused knew him from before, it is quite probable that P.W.2 saw him as the accused came to seize him and P.W.1 saw him at a later stage of the occurrence when struggle for rifle was going on. Accused says that he was at home on that day, but he has not adduced any evidence in support of his statement. I have considered the evidence on record as against this accused and I see no reason to discard it as unreliable. I therefore hold that accused Bhogram alias Duffla was a member of the unlawful assembly.

Kamala has been identified by all the eye witnesses (P.Ws.1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 11 and 12) except P.W.8, he was the leader of the party; he engaged himself in altercation with P.Ws.2 and 3 and it was he who ordered the crowd to attack the police force and gave signal by blowing a whistle, he with others then attacked S.I. Mohindhar Bora and struck him on the head with a lathi, the first part of this statement has been proved by all the P.Ws named above. The assault on S.I. Mohindhar Bora has been proved by P.Ws.1 and 2; P.Ws.3 and 7 speak of assault on P.W.2 by the crowd. There is no reason why P.Ws.1 and 2 should have falsely implicated accused Kamala in the matter. More than any body else P.W.2 could not have made any mistake about it, he was arguing with the accused and all on a sudden as he ordered civil constable to disperse the crowd by use of lathi this accused with others came forward and made him their first target. I have no hesitation in holding that accused Kamala was the leader of the unlawful assembly and assaulted the officer in charge of the police station o/c who was undoubtedly there to discharge his duty as a public servant by preventing the mob from entering the thana compound and in the discharge of his said duty he was assaulted by the accused. I therefore, hold that accused Kamala was a member of the unlawful assembly and had also assaulted. P.W.2 while he was engaged in the discharge of his duty as a public servant.

Accused Kali Charan says that he did not join the procession but went to Dhakiajuli hat. P.Ws.1, 2 and 12 have identified him. P.W.1 further says that this accused had caught him by the neck; P.W.1 received an injury on the neck; presumably this was caused by this accused.

I see no particular reason to doubt the identification of this accused by P.Ws.1 and 2; P.W.1 must have been able to recognise his assailant clearly, in any case I see no reason to discard his statement in this respect as unreliable. I also see no reason to discard the statement of P.W.2 so far as the presence of this accused in the crowd is concerned, P.W.12 says that this accused snatched away his lathi. I see no reason to discard his statement either. I therefore, hold that accused Kalicharan was a member of the unlawful assembly and had assaulted P.W.1 and A.S.I. of Police while engaged in discharging his duty as a public servant.

In view of the findings arrived at above I find accused Gobordhan, Jiban, Bhaba Keot and Bhadreswar not guilty u/s 147 I.P.C. and acquit them accordingly u/s 258 (1) Cr.P.C. I find accused Kamala kanta and Kali charan guilty u/s 147-353 I.P.C. and convict them accordingly. I find accused Bhogram alias Daffla guilty u/s 147 I.P.C. and convict him accordingly. As to sentences, Kamala deserves severe punishment. He was the leader of the crowd and was mainly responsible for egging the crowd to resort to violence and thus inductly for the loss of so many lives. I, therefore, sentence him to undergo R.I. for a period of one year and six months u/s 117 I.P.C. and to undergo R.I. for a period of one year u/s 353 I.P.C. The sentences to run concurrently with each other and with the sentence he is already undergoing. I sentence accused Kali Charan Thukuria alias Mayakishore Nath to undergo R.I. for a period of six months u/s 117 I.P.C. and to undergo R.I. for a period of three months u/s 353 I.P.C. the sentences to run concurrently with each other and with the sentence he is already undergoing. I sentence accused Bhogram Keot alias Daffla to undergo R.I. for a period of four months u/s 147 I.P.C.

[Omitted: Introductory s' tements about the position taken by both sides on the right of Habeas Corpus, stressing the importance attached to it in British and Indian legal practice — Ed.].

Now, as I have said, this is one of the most fundamental rights known to the Constitution and the most highly prized, but it does yield place to another matter even more fundamental — the safety of the realm. No one doubts the right of the Legislature, or of such power as takes its place in emergencies, or when it is not functioning, to modify the rights of the subject or even to suspend or take them away altogether, and this in times of peace. No less than war, for under the Constitution the Legislature is supreme. But, be it observed, it is the Legislature which is supreme, not the Executive and so, before the Executive can claim the power to override those rights, it must show that the Legislature has empowered it to do so, and under the constitution the Legislature can only act in particular ways. All empowering must therefore be done properly and formally, deliberately, in the manner laid down by the Constitution. The Executive cannot suddenly step in and claim the right to wield absolute and arbitrary power-not even in war time. For, as Lord Atkin said in his dissenting judgment in (1941) 3 All. E.R. 338 (Lords Macmillan and Wright agreeing as to this in principle — there was no difference of opinion on this point).

In this country, amidst the clash of arms, the laws are not silent. They may be changed, but they speak the same language in war as in peace, it has always been one of the pillars of freedom, one of the principles of liberty for which, on recent authority, we are now fighting, that the judges are no respecters of persons and stand between the subject and any attempted encroachments on his liberty by the Executive, alert to see that any coercive action is justified in law.

I may add that these principles of liberty to which Lord Atkin refers apply as much to India as elsewhere, and it is as relevant for a judge in India to take judicial notice, in a matter of this kind, of repeated allied pledges that justice will be done after the war and that those of the enemy found guilty of excesses and abuse of power will be brought to book and tried and punished, as it was for the learned law Lords in (1941) 3 All. E.R. 338 to take judicial notice of the existence of Quislings and Fifth Columnists, of Lord Atkin to take notice of the principles of liberty for which on high authority we are now fighting. I gather that the necessities of war will not be a sufficient excuse or an abuse of power committed by the enemy. I cannot think it is intended that they should be here. Therefore the Courts must enquire into such allegations if they are made. All these considerations weighed heavily with the learned law Lords in (1941) 3 All. E.R. 338 when they construed provisions similar in many respects to the one we have here — in fact the learned Advocate-General contended that this is the only case really in point and that it is decisive. In my opinion, such considerations are as relevant and should weigh as heavily with us here. It is my view that the rights conferred under S.491 subsist and will continue to subsist until either the section is expressly, or by necessary and express implication, abrogated, or the rights are expressly taken away.

The learned Advocate-General admitted that the Section has not been expressly repealed, but he contended that the effect of the Defence of India Act and the rules made under it was to render it nugatory, and he contended that in consequence the applicants had no right of audience. I refuse to accept this contention. I refuse to accept a similar argument in I.L.R. (1940) Nag. 1 at page 11 when an abuse of power by the Congress Government of the Province was in question. The Earl of Birkenhead refused to accept something similar in (1923) A.C. 603 at p. 610 and in (1928) A.C. 459 at page 467 Lord Hailsham said that would be a 'startling result'. Such fundamental rights, safeguarded under the constitution with elaborate and anxious care and upheld time and again by the highest tribunals of the realm in language of the utmost vigour, cannot be swept away by implication or removed by some sweeping generality. No one doubts the right and the power of the proper authority to remove, but the removal must be express and unmistakable, and this applies whatever Government be in power, and whether the country is at peace or at war.

I do not for a moment deny that the canons of construction are not the same in respect of war measures as those passed in times of peace: see Lords Macmillan and Wright in (1941) 3 All. E.R. 338 and 6 Halsbury's Laws of England, Hailsham Edition, p. 627. Far greater latitude is allowed to the executive, and presumption in favour of the liberty of the subject are weakened — indeed, that is expressly provided for in S.3 Defence of India Act, but those canons and those rights do not disappear altogether. In my opinion, some limit must be placed upon claims to the arbitrary exercise of absolute power in matter connected with the restraint of a man's liberty, and unless such powers are unmistakably conferred either expressly or by necessary implication — and by 'Necessary' I mean when no other construction is reasonably possible — they must be taken, at the very least, to be subject to the right of a person detained to come before his Court under S.491 and complain of that detention and demand that he be either dealt with according to law or be set at liberty; and this notwithstanding that the Act we are considering is a war measure. In my opinion, Lord Macmillan's observations in (1941) 3 All. E.R. 338 apply here. He said:

It is important to have in mind that the regulation in question is a war measure. This is not to say that the Courts ought to adopt in war time canons of construction different from those they follow in peace time. The fact that the nation is at war is no justification for any relaxation of the vigilance of the Courts in seeing that the law is duly observed, especially in a matter so fundamental as the liberty of the subject. Rather the contrary.

This, in my opinion, is particularly so when the very arbitrary powers, for which claim is made here are exercisable not only by the Provincial Government or by some responsible Minister, or Member of Council, or Adviser, but by any District Magistrates in this province and indeed, so far as the Act is concerned, by 'any officer or authority' not subordinate to the Central Government whom that Provincial Government may choose to appoint: see S.2 (5). It must be remembered that in (1941) 8 All. E.R. 338 the learned law Lords, who answered Lord Atkin's powerful dissenting judgement, were careful to give prominence to the fact that one of the reasons which prompted them to decide as they did was that, in the case of the measure before them, the person exercising the wide powers, which were upheld, was a Minister of the Crown, responsible to a removable executive and to Parliament, a Secretary of State himself.

[Omitted: Quotations from the Judgments of Lords Wright, Maugham and Macmillan in the case Liversidge vs. Anderson — Ed.]

I look in vain for any similar safeguard in the Indian measure—quite the contrary. These applicants have not even been allowed to see counsel. They have not been allowed to have legal advice. They have not been allowed to come before us in person, nor have they been given any reasons for their detention. There is also another powerful reason which weighed in (1941) 3 All. E.R. 338 but which is absent here. I quote Lord Wright:

But if the sense of the country was outraged by the system or practice of making detention orders, or indeed of any particular order, it could make itself sufficiently felt in the Press and in Parliament to put an end to any abuse and Parliament can always amend the Regulation.

That does not apply here. Indeed I gather that the applicants before us were arrested, in the first instance, for their temerity in trying to exercise those very rights of protest which the law Lords in (1941) 3 All. E.R. 338 regarded as the residuary safeguard. Now what are the provisions on which the learned Advocate-General relies for his contention that S.491 has been abrogated by implication? First of all, he turns to S.2, Defence of India Act, which provides as follows.

The Central Government may, by notification in the official Gazette, make such rules as appear to it to be necessary or expedient for securing the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community.

Stopping there I find it difficult to see how any of those objects can be endangered just because some obscure person in a district jail is allowed legal advice and is permitted to place his case properly before this Court under S.491. I am not concerned to see whether these persons are desirable or not. The law is no respecter of persons, and, as Scrutton L.J. said in (1923) 92 L.J.K.B. 797 (I quoted him in I.L.R. (1940) Nag. 1 at p. 10 also) it is one of the tests of belief (and I may add of sincerity), to apply principles to cases in which one has no sympathy at all. As I see it, this refusal is an abuse of power. I cannot believe that things have reached such a pass that the safety of the realm is likely to be endangered if these persons, meritorious or otherwise, are allowed a little legal advice. Things cannot be as bad as that; and yet, though the learned Advocate-General did not say so, that is the logical conclusion to which one is driven if this section is relied on in justification of the order of refusal. But that aside S.2 in my opinion, in nowise abrogates, S.491, either expressly or impliedly, nor indeed does the Crown really contend that. What the learned advocate-General says is that S.2 must be read along with R. 26 (f). The rule is as follows:

- (1) . . . the Provincial Government, if it is satisfied with respect to any particular person that with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner pre-judicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order (His Majesty's relations with foreign powers of Indian States, the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas), or the efficient prosecution of the war it is necessary so to do, may make an order.
- (f) Imposing upon him such restrictions as may be specified in the order in respect of his . . . communication with other person . . .

This sweeping provision is said to abrogate S.491 by implication. It is admitted that the rule does not say that the person detained may not apply but it is said that Government can say that he may not come before this Court to present his case in person and that he may not hold any communication with any person whom he desires should represent him. That, in my opinion, results in what Lord Wright called a 'travesty of a trial' -- not indeed a regular trial as ordinarily understood but of a trial by this Court of the issues which arise under the habeas corpus provision of the Criminal Procedure Code. I have no hesitation in rejecting such a contention. If the right to apply is not taken away, and I think I have made it plain that it is not, then the Executive cannot arbitrarily nullify the exercise of that right by making the proceedings in this Court a farce, and, in my opinion, that is what occurs if it be held that the man may neither come in person nor instruct another who is prepared and free to come, that he may not even receive proper and adequate legal advice. In my opinion, not only does S.2 read with R.26 (f), not abrogate S.491 but quite the contrary, and quite apart from general rules of constitution, S.14, Defence of India Act, lays down: that:

Save as otherwise expressly provided by or under the Act, the ordinary criminal and civil Courts shall continue to exercise jurisdiction.

Admittedly the jurisdiction of the Court under S.491 has not been expressly taken away. Therefore, it remains in force, and so long as this jurisdiction is there, the judges must, in my opinion, be alert to see that the full effect of that jurisdiction is not whittled away or rendered ineffective by such orders as these. There is also another point against the contention of the Crown. Even R.26 (f) does not give a carte blanche right of refusal. It says that the provincial Government has to be satisfied in respect of each particular person. But what is the position here? The joint Secretary to Government sends a memorandum to the Registrar stating that security prisoners as a class are not entitled to interviews except on the written orders of Government and copies of the relevant orders are enclosed. But these orders are general orders. They have no reference to the particular persons before us, and they were passed before these persons were even arrested. Government has nowhere stated that the safety of the realm, or any one of the other matters referred to in R.26, will be imperilled if the applicants are permitted to interview their legal advisers. As I have said, this attempt to keep these applicants away from this Court under the guise of these rules, is an abuse of power and warrants intervention by this Court. In my opinion, the Provincial Government should be directed to permit interviews with legal advisers on such terms and subject to such conditions as it thinks desirable. I must not be understood as saying that anybody and everybody can be permitted to interview these persons nor do I mean to imply that no restrictions can be imposed. Of course, Government can say that A, B and C may not interview the detainees or even X, Y and Z. But to say that no legal adviser can be found in the whole of this province or indeed in the whole of India, fit to be given the right of an interview for this purpose would be an abuse of power under the present state of the law and should not, in my opinion, be permitted.

It is relevant to point out here, as Lord Atkin pointed out in (1941) 3 All. E.R. 338, that it is difficult to see how the trial of a habeas corpus petition can present greater difficulties than the trial of a spy or of a traitor for treason. Also, it seems anomalous that while spies and traitors can be allowed, and are allowed, all reasonable facilities for placing their cases fully before the Courts, particularly in the shape of interviews with counsel, those against whom no charge is preferred are told on the one hand, as, in my opinion, the law tells them, that their right to apply in habeas corpus has not been taken away and still subsists, and on the other that they will nevertheless be refused every facility which tends to make that right a living reality if they try to exercise it. I can see the regrettable necessity for detaining and segregating persons who hamper the war effort or endanger public safety. I can see the desirability of arming the executive with weapons which necessitate the utmost secrecy. I can fully understand, as I believe the decision in (1941) All. E.R. 338 to be, that Government is not bound to disclose reasons for an arrest and detention under these special powers. But even when all that is accepted, there is in my opinion still left a residue into which the Courts can and must enquire; and that enquiry cannot be frustrated by executive claims to wield absolute and arbitrary power in this way.

That brings me to the next point. It was urged on behalf of the Crown that there would be no point in allowing the applicants to present their case in the ordinary way because in the result they must fail in any event. I gather the implication was that S.491 confers a discretionary power which the Courts can exercise or not as they choose, very much as in revision, and that no Court would accept a petition for hearing if it is clear on the face of it that it cannot succeed. I cannot agree. The right conferred by S.491 is a right which it is intended that the subject should be free to exercise without let or hindrance. It is just as much a right as a right of appeal, nay much more so because it is the most fundamental right known to the constitution bar one, and in my opinion, the Courts are bound to hear the petitioner fully and fairly and bound to see that he is given proper opportunities of placing his case before the Court freely and unhampered. It may be that he will lose in the end but the Court cannot decide that until he has been heard. Under the British law, the practice of condemning a man unheard (unless he has been afforded the opportunity to appear), or of deciding an issue behind his back is so repugnant and repellant to be characterized by the highest tribunals in the realm as opposed to 'natural justice' and as amounting to a 'denial of justice'. See. A.I.R. 1936 P.C. 242 at pp. 246 and 196 I.C. 692 at p. 693. To use the language of their Lordships in another connexion, this amounts to 'an invasion of liberty and a denial of his just rights as a citizen, see 18 C.W.N. 98 at p. 103.

But to examine this contention more closely. Must the applicants necessarily fail, that is to say, is there nothing left into which the Courts can enquire? The learned Advocate – General, relving on (1941) 3 All. E.R. 338 says No. He says it is enough for the Crown to produce the order of detention. Thereafter, there is nothing left for the Courts to do but to dismiss the petition. Again I do not agree. I hesitate to enter upon this ground in the absence of the other side (in my opinion the other side is not really here), and so I do not intend to give a final opinion. I will only venture upon a tentative one. As I understand (1941) 3 All. E.R. 338 the House of Lord's do not hold that the jurisdiction of the Courts is wholly barred and that there is nothing left for them to investigate. It is true they hold that a lot is cut away and that very little is left but I understand them to hold that there is a residue and that residue must be investigated when the issue is raised.

My conclusions are that (1) S.491, Criminal P.C., has not been abrogated in any respect, (2) that any person aggrieved has a right to apply to the High Court and that he has a right to be heard: (3) that though the Provincial Government is entitled to take all proper precautions in the matter of granting interviews, even to legal advisers, it has no power to shut these detained persons off altogether from reasonable and proper legal advice; (4) that the Provincial Government has no power to prevent such issues as I have indicated from being tried in this Court in the ordinary way, if they are raised, subject of course to such reasonable safeguards as the Provincial Government may desire to have observed, that is to say, the trial, despite all safeguards, must be according to what the Privy Council call canons of natural justice, or according 'to the fundamental rules of practice necessary for the due protection of persons and the safe administration of criminal justice', or, I would observe, of any justice; (5) that in so far as these applicants have been refused access to all legal advice there has been an abuse of power, (6) that the jurisdiction of the Courts is not wholly ousted by the Defence of India Act and that there remains a residue of matter into which the Courts can and must enquire; (7) that it is doubtful whether Farquhar has the power to make these orders of detention – that, in my opinion, required further consideration before us. The Order I would therefore in this case is that the Provincial Government be directed to afford these detained persons all reasonable facilities for obtaining such legal advice as they desire, subject to such safeguards as may reasonably be necessary; that the applicants should then be permitted to place their grievances before the Court in petitions properly and legally drawn up; and that they should be allowed, subject again to such safeguards as may seem reasonably necessary, to press these petitions in the usual way, if not personally, at least through counsel in whom they have reasonable confidence. I observe that the applicants cannot insist on seeing counsel A, B or C any more than Government can say that only X shall be allowed. There must be reasonableness on both sides.

I agree with much though not with all what my learned brother has said and with his conclusion that a person detained under the rules has a right to apply to the High Court under S.491, Criminal P.C., challenging the validity of the order of detention on the ground that the person passing the order had no authority to pass it and on the ground that he was not in fact satisfied that it was necessary to pass such an order and acted in bad faith. If the person passing the order had authority to pass it and was in fact so satisfied, then this Court cannot go into the grounds on which he was satisfied and the order cannot be called in question in this Court. It is therefore necessary, in my opinion, that the persons detained should be granted access to legal advice so that their cases may be properly represented in this Court.

6. Viceroy to the Governor of Bihar (extracts) (case of Ainsworth)

Ianlithgow Collection

New Delhi, December 18th 1942.

To
Stewart, Governor of Bihar

Thanks for your letter¹ dated 8th December No. 892 G.B. about the Ainsworth case

In the light of the facts now elicited there is evidently all the more reason for caution in holding that Ainsworth himself took any part in, or even had knowledge of the injuries that caused the death of Kailaspa. Singh.

. . . Further enquiry seems necessary . . . as the enquiry by the local Magistrate did not succeed in establishing a case against anyone . . . suggests departmental enquiry. . . . We must accept that if the Departmental enquiry did not result in any criminal proceedings, we might be accused of having used such an expedient to hush up the case. On the other hand, it might help materially in preventing the police from following false trails or vexing innocent persons (including possibly Ainsworth himself); and if it were established that the death was really caused by the treatment given to the deceased by the British troops who were present, the matter could be dealt with by a military court and not by the ordinary civil courts. I should welcome your view.

It is too soon to discuss the question of Ainsworth's transfer to the North-West Frontier Province.

Yours Sincerely
Linlithgow.

My dear Lord Linlithgow,

I have given my further anxious consideration to the Ainsworth case in the light of the observations made in Your Excellency's letter of the 18th December.¹ In view of the importance and complexity of the issues raised by this most unfortunate affair, I thought it proper, to obtain (informally) legal advice. The result confirms Your Excellency's view that the magisterial enquiry held by the local Magistrate, Mr Ahsan, does not establish a case against anybody under section 302 I.P.C. (murder) or under section 304 I.P.C. (culpable homicide not amounting to murder) in as much as it appears to disclose neither intention nor knowledge nor likelihood that the injuries caused would result in Kailashpati Singh's death. On the other hand it does establish a strong prima facie case against Ainsworth and some of his men under section 330 I.P.C. (voluntarily causing hurt for the purpose of extorting information which might lead to the commission of an offence) and probably under section 331.149 I.P.C. as well. So far as Ainsworth is personally concerned, I am advised that, if he were prosecuted under section 330 I.P.C., the case would almost certainly end in conviction, having regard to the statement made by himself before the Magistrate.

2. I enclose a copy of the relevant portion of the report submitted to the District Magistrate by Mr Ahsan. It is not I think, necessary to trouble Your Excellency with copies of the statements of all the witness examined in the course of this enquiry, but a copy of Ainsworth's own statement is enclosed. It will be seen that he admits having given 'strokes to Kailash with a thin stick on the buttocks', and it is evident that the beating of the other men was done under his orders. The evidence of the Mounted Military Policemen fully confirms this, and I do not for a moment believe that Ainsworth's sense of honour or pride would permit him to resile from his original statement in the course of a trial. In the eyes of the law an offence under section 330 is a very serious one. It is triable only by a Court of Sessions and is punishable with anything up to seven years imprisonment.

3. The immediate question with which we are faced therefore is not so much whether a regular police investigation might not bring to light certain facts which are not at present on record officially, or whether it would establish against any particular person a prima facie case of having caused the fatal injuries to Kailashpati Singh. Rather, we are apparently confronted with the fact that a regular police investigation — or even a further judicial enquiry — would inevitably lead to Ainsworth and some of his men being placed in the dock on a lesser, but still very serious, criminal charge.

4. After full consideration I am convinced that (on the facts as we at present know them) every effort should be made to prevent this from happening. Ainsworth may have acted foolishly, or worse. But he undoubtedly believed that he was doing his duty as he saw it and that he was acting in the best interests of Government. I am now more than ever convinced that his prosecution would have a disastrous effect on the morale, not only on the whole of the police force in Bihar but also on Government Servants in other services as well.

5. Whether or not we can prevent a criminal prosecution appears, however, to be open to considerable doubt. At first sight section 197 Cr. P.C. read with section 271 (2) (b) of the Government of India Act, appears to afford some protection to Ainsworth himself (but not to his men). I am advised, however, that the words 'while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty' do not, according to a number of judicial rulings, bear the meaning which the ordinary layman might attach to them. It has been held, for example, that a public servant's official duty does not permit him to do anything in the nature of causing hurt to persons confined by him lawfully or under pretext of law, and that he cannot claim to have so acted under colour of his office. My attention has been drawn in particular to a case (Gonapathy Goundan vs. Emperor, reported in A.I.R., 1932, Madras (24), where a village Magistrate had held in confinement certain persons whom he had suspected of having committed murder and had tortured them in order to extort a confession. He was charged with committing an offence under section 330 (voluntarily causing hurt to extort confession), section 343 (wrongful confinement for three or more days) and Section 348 (wrongful confinement to extort a confession). It was held in that case that sanction under Section 197 Cr. P.C. was necessary to prosecute the Magistrate under sections 345 and 348 but not under Section 330.

6. The position then is that, even if Government do not set the law in motion, it may be set in motion, by somebody else. This could be done in a variety of ways. For example, an aggrieved party or someone acting on his behalf may move the High Court to exercise its revisional jurisdiction in the matter of the magisterial enquiry which has already been held under section 176 of the Cr. P.C. If this were done, there seems to be little doubt, in view of the definite finding of the Magistrate who conducted that enquiry, that the High Court would at least direct the District Magistrate to proceed further in the matter, with the inevitable result that cognizance would eventually have to be taken. Again, apart from any action that the High Court might direct, it will always remain open to any person considering himself aggrieved, or to someone acting on his behalf, to institute criminal proceedings against Ainsworth and his men by lodging a complaint before a Magistrate in the usual way or by lodging an F.I.R. before the police. So far there has been no sign that anybody proposes to do this, but it may well be that they are waiting until they consider that circumstances are more favourable to the prosecution of such a case than they are now. Delay in the institution of proceedings is normally a serious handicap against their success, but in this case the magisterial enquiry is on record and there is no getting over it.

7. If criminal proceedings were in fact instituted in one way or another, the Provincial Government might of course hold that they could not go on as against Ainsworth without their sanction under Section 179 Cr. P.C., but this dictum would probably be challenged in the High Court and might well be overruled there. In any case Section 179 gives no protection to the subordinate policemen concerned and their prosecution would be almost as damaging to morale as that of Ainsworth himself.

8. In short, I am driven to the conclusion that there is no way in which we can be certain of preventing the ventilation of this affair in the criminal courts except by an Act of Indemnity which is framed in sufficiently wide terms to cover the facts of the case. I would ask Your Excellency to bear this in mind in considering the general question whether such an act is or is not necessary. I do not for a moment suggest that Ainsworth's case by itself could possibly justify such an Act. But we have no assurance-particularly if a successful prosecution were brought against him and or his men-that it would not be followed by others. And it would almost certainly be impossible to invoke Section 179 Cr. P.C. to protect (e.g.) an officer who was accused of burning houses.

9. Meanwhile, an Act of Indemnity, apart, if Your Excellency is in agreement with the view that the law should not be set in motion by Government in this case, it remains to decide whether we should do anything at all or should proceed departmentally. I am in favour of the latter. In my opinion we are not justified in passing the whole matter over without notice. I would also accept Your Excellency's view that, if a departmental enquiry revealed with sufficient definiteness the identity of the person responsible for causing the fatal injuries, it would be necessary to re-examine the propriety of criminal proceedings against such person. In the first instance, however, I would propose to direct the Inspector-General of Police himself to hold a departmental enquiry into the whole incident. I should prefer at this stage not to draw up formal departmental 'proceedings' with definite charges. This might be necessary later on if the result of the enquiry showed that some punishment more serious than that of 'censure' was called for.

10. I need not say that, if any action at all is to be taken, there should be as little further delay as possible. I should therefore be very grateful if Your Excellency would inform me whether you are in agreement with the course proposed.

Yours Sincerely,

T.A. Stewart

Enclosure 1

District Magistrate

As ordered I have held an enquiry into the cause of the death of prisoner Kailashpati Singh and also regarding the injuries on the persons of the some of the demonstrators who were arrested on 28th September 1942 for shouting slogans in the office, asking people not to pay Government revenue and 'Government Raj' had ended, &c.

In all 31 witnesses have been examined. I shall first discuss the case of deceased Kailashpati Singh.

Before discussing the evidence I may submit that on that date 3 batches of demonstrators were arrested in the Court Compound. Four of them, namely, Baleshwar Nath, Bishwanath, Gulabchand Lal and the deceased Kailashpati Singh were arrested by the M.M.P.'s² Sawars at about 1 o'clock.

Another batch of 8 persons was arrested in the Court Veranda under my orders by the S.P. of Arrah Mofasil. These were Ramjee, Kesho Pd. Singh and Chandraman Singh little before 4 o'clock, the third batch including Ramesan, Ramraj and Nausing Narain Singh was arrested by the S.P. and his men.

So far as the assault on the deceased Kailashpati Singh is concerned 17 witnesses including the S.P. (witness No. 1), the A.S.P. (witness No. 2), Civil Surgeon (witness No. 20) and the second Medical Officer (witness No. 21) of the Sadr Hospital, 4 constables (witness Nos 5 to 18) on duty at the court premises, the Officer In charge, town P.S. (witness No. 5) and 3 demonstrators (witness Nos 22, 23 and 25) who were arrested with him besides M.M.P.'s Sawars (witness Nos 3, 4, 10, 11 and 12) and junior S.I., Lakshmi Narain Singh, who held post (witness No. 31) have been examined.

It appears from the evidence given before me that the 4 demonstrators Baleshwar, Bishwanath, Gulabchand and Kailashpati Singh were shouting slogans against payment of revenue and other anti-Government slogans near the Treasury at about 1 o'clock. They were pushed out by some of the constables on duty towards the Ramna side.

As these men persisted in their attempt to shout slogans and to distribute leaflets, they were arrested by driver Abdul Karim of the M.M.P. and his companions Abdul Gafoor Sawar No. 3 and Mohanmmad Nazir Khan M.M.P.'s recruit who took them to the A.S.P. informed the S.P. and obtained permission from him to question these persons as to where they had got the leaflets from. As in spite of all persuasion and inducement they proved stubborn and on their refusal to disclose their sources the A.S.P. ordered that they be given strokes with stick on their buttocks. The deceased Kailashpati Singh on receiving about a dozen strokes disclosed that these leaflets were given to him by Raghubans Narain Singh of Pipra. This led to a raid on the house of Raghubans Narain Singh and a Duplicator Machine was discovered, the blocks of which were identical with the prints on the leaflets found in the possession of Kailashpati and his companions.

The A.S.P. has admitted that he gave strokes to Kailashpati Singh on the buttock with a thick stick and he is unable to say which of the M.M.P. Sawar assaulted which of the prisoner but he is definite that the blows were given on the buttocks only.

The driver Abdul Karim and other M.M.P. Sawars admitted having assaulted the prisoners under the orders of the A.S.P. but all of them have stated that they gave the strokes on the buttocks only. They have denied having given any blow on any other part of their body. Karim has admitted that the old man had sat down on the way and that he slapped him on his neck.

The 4 constables on duty in the court premises have all denied any knowledge of assault on them. Only 1 of them Deomun Singh (witness No. 16, stated that he saw the M.M.P. men taking away the 4 demonstrators. The 3 prisoners who have survived stated that they were taken to military Camp (A.S.P.'s bungalow) and were assaulted with sticks, with boots and slaps by the M.M.P. men and some white men (Goras). They are unable to say how and who assaulted the deceased. One of them Gulabchand Lal has made exaggerated statement of assault regarding branding with hot iron and kicking on his testicles by the A.S.P. but this has not been proved by the medical evidence. The officer in charge and the jail doctor found the deceased in an unconscious state when he was brought to the thana in the police bus and as his condition was very low, on the advice of the jail doctor the deceased was sent to the Sadr Hospital. He was brought to the thana at about 3.30 p.m. The deceased was sent to the Hospital some time after 4 p.m. but when he reached there he was found dead by the second Medical Officer in charge at about 5 p.m. when he was sent to the morgue for post mortem examination. Junior S.L. Lachminarain Pd., held inquest on the dead body. The Civil Surgeon held post mortem examination on the dead body of Kailashpati Singh at 9 a.m. next morning and found on the dead body contusion with ecchymosis with fracture of the third rib on the left side of the chest $1 \times 3\frac{1}{4}$ caused by the thrust with the end of lathi, contusion with ecchymosis 3×4 on the right flank with fracture of the ninth and tenth rib caused by a first blow and contusion with fracture of 2 metacarpal bones caused by some hard blunt substance. There were about 11 marks of lathi blows on the buttocks from 5×1 in length (largest). The injuries were recent ones.

According to doctor death was due to syncope from shock as the result of multiple injuries received. The Civil Surgeon further states that the man was otherwise healthy, excepting that the pleura on both side was adherent to the lungs.

It will appear here that it has been admitted by the A.S.P. and M.M.P. men, that the deceased and his companions were assaulted with sticks at the bungalow of the A.S.P. under his orders, but they have all denied that the deceased or his companions were given blows on any other part of their bodies. But the prisoners have themselves stated that they were beaten by sticks, dantas, boots and slaps.

The Civil Surgeon found injuries on the buttock of the deceased which were very much swollen and discoloured bluish black. There was much extravasation of blood besides contusions on the left side caused by end of a lathi and contusions with fracture on the left flank with fracture of the rib caused by kick.

The reason given by the Civil Surgeon for his opinion is that the injuries on the left side were circular which could be produced by a lathi thrust while that on the right flank had irregular marks 3×4 which show that they could have been inflicted by kicks with booted-foot.

The only conclusion one can therefore arrive at is that the deceased received these injuries with sticks in the manner described by the Civil Surgeon while he was in the custody of M.M.P. probably at the A.S.P.'s bungalow although it is not possible to say which particular man was responsible for these injuries for there were 15 M.M.P.'s Sawars and recruits and the deceased's companions are themselves unable to say how and at whose hands the deceased received these injuries.

There can be no doubt that his death was due to shock and syncope which were the result of these injuries.

S.K. Ahsan,

Sadr Sub-divisional Officer, Arrah.

Witness No. 2 – Mr T.M. Ainsworth on S.A.

On 28th September 1942 at about 1.30 p.m. one Abdul Karim driver, M.M.P. Sawar No. 3, Abdul Ghafar Khan, and Mohammed Nasir Khan No. 198 brought four men to me at my bungalow. They were dressed in Khaddar, had Congress Flag and were garlanded with flowers. Karim and Ghafoor gave me the information that as they were returning from the bazar they saw these four men shouting slogans 'Government Raj Nash Ho', and other slogans and were distributing leaflets and the two districts police lathi constables drove them out of the Court but when they got towards the Ramna side, the constables left them and that they were still shouting their slogans and throwing leaflets about. So the M.M.P. men chased them across the Ramna and after a brief scuffle arrested all four of them and brought them to me. I informed the S.P. by phone and he instructed me to try to find out where the leaflets came from. I questioned them and they answered they came from Senapathi. I asked who the Senapathi was and they said 'Mahatma Gandhi'. They refused to give the real name of the men who had handed over the leaflets. In order to frighten them into doing so I took one man 50 yards behind some trees and fired a pistol shot into the air and came back and told the others he was dead. They still refused to speak. Then one by one they were beaten with thin sticks on the buttocks. One Kailashpati after a dozen strokes on the buttocks confessed that the leaflets had been given to them by Raghubans Narain Singh of Village Pipra. Then they were all taken to the Police Station and F.I.R. recorded. Later that evening I and M.M.P. raided Raghubans' house and recovered 'duplicating machine' and various papers and accessories. The block of the machine was identical with the leaflets recovered from Kailashpati Singh's party. Raghubans escaped.

I gave strokes to Kailash with a thin stick on the buttock. There were a number of M.M.P. men present and I am unable to say which of them beat him. They beat him on the buttock only. Kailash was an old man about 55 years. He might have received injuries on the other parts while being hustled out of Court or while there was a scuffle in which he received blows.

The S.P. did not give me any order except to find out where the leaflets came from.

January 4th 1943.

My dear Lord Linlithgow,

I write in continuation of my letter of the 27th December¹ on the subject of an Act of Indemnity. I have since been in communication with Hallett who I understand is addressing Your Excellency separately. Hallett and I are in agreement that some form of indemnity is necessary. It may be true, as was argued in Council, that there have been very few instances of redress being sought in court against Government officers for acts done in the course of the rebellion. It is however important to remember that most of those who are likely to seek to victimize our officers are at present in jail and that whatever present circumstances may be, a Damoclean sword is suspended over the heads of the Services. I would particularly invite Your Excellency's attention to my letter of today's date² on the Ainsworth case, for it illustrates the extreme difficulty rather, the impossibility - of affording adequate protection by any other means to officers who had recourse to extra-legal action in suppressing the recent disturbances.

2 Like Hallett I should prefer a Central Act on the lines of the Draft ordinance enclosed with Your Excellency's letter of the 23rd December¹ and, if it would facilitate the acceptance of such an Act by Council, I would agree to jettison the 'prospective effect' idea. Indeed, although I realise the force of Maxwell's arguments,³ I am myself in considerable doubt as to the justification for giving prospective effect to an Act of Indemnity. It savours too much of the blank cheque.

3 As between a Governor's Act and an attenuated Central enactment even with a provision for trial by Selected Courts I strongly favour the former. It would be inevitable that in a selected Court as much as in the ordinary courts the question of 'good faith' would cause us great difficulty. The same principles would be applied in either case. Moreover the setting up of Selected Courts would lay us open, however unjustly, to the criticism that we were packing our tribunals in order to pervert justice in the interests of our officers. I am very sensible of the shortcomings of a Governor's Act and I recognise that it would arouse much hostility and criticism. But, as Your Excellency observes, it would serve at any rate as a moratorium and, given a new section 270-A in appropriate terms before the resumption of Ministerial Government, I consider that we should have done all that is reasonably possible for the Services.

1. If Governor's Acts have to be passed it is desirable that they should be in identical terms. I propose therefore to attempt a Draft on the same lines as the Home Department Ordinance and to send it to Hallett for acceptance or criticism. When we have arrived at an agreed formula, I shall submit it for Your Excellency's consideration. In the meantime I have in mind 2 possible emendations of the Draft Ordinance. The first is the substitution of 'the Governor in his discretion' for the 'provincial Government' as the authority competent to grant previous sanction under Clause 4. (In practice this change would of course only be of consequence if the present Section 93 administration gave way to a Ministerial Government while the Act still remained in force. Should this development occur, it would acquire great importance). The second modification which I should like, if possible to introduce is the addition of a rider to the effect that, if any question arises whether previous sanction under Clause 4 is or is not necessary, the decision of the Government in his discretion shall be final. Even though no mention is made in Clause 4 of 'good faith' or 'reasonable belief', the judicial rulings mentioned in my letter about Ainsworth indicate how precarious a business it may be to leave the Courts to decide whether in fact an act was or was not done, or purporting to be done, 'for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order'.

Yours sincerely,

T.A. Stewart.

My dear Stewart,

Many thanks for your secret letter of 4th January,¹ No. 1 (G.B., about the Ainsworth case. As I said in my interim reply to you, the position is an unfortunate one, and it has taken me some little time to consider here the new information which you have been kind enough to let me have.

2. I now write to say that in the light of your careful examination of the position, for which I am grateful, I agree with your proposal that the minor case (i.e., the beating of the deceased on the buttocks) should be dealt with by way of a departmental enquiry on the understanding that if the enquiry throws further light on responsibility for the fatal injuries that case will be followed up properly. I think it is clear that your own feeling is that, apart from the fatal injuries, the minor case should not be tried in Court and that it should be covered by any Act of Indemnity, and I accept your view on that point.

3. I hope to be writing to you shortly in the light of your own views, and Hallett's about the Act of Indemnity issue generally, and I will not enter into greater detail on the subject now Let me however say that I note the suggestion made in the last paragraph of your letter under reply and the reasons for which you recommend provision of this nature: and while I am advised that on a reasonable interpretation of the words there is far less danger of a Court intervening on the point whether an act was done 'for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order' than there is under Section 197, Criminal Procedure Code, there is nothing to be lost by closing all possible loopholes.

4. Reverting to the specific case of Mr Ainsworth, if the departmental enquiry reveals no more than that he was responsible for the minor beating I think that, in the light of the advice I have received here, departmental reprimand and perhaps transfer to another Province would sufficiently meet the case considering all the circumstances in which the action took place.

Yours Sincerely,

Linlithgow

No. 77-G.B.

My dear Lord Linlithgow,

In paragraph 3 of your letter dated the 16th January¹ (which dealt primarily with the Ainsworth case) Your Excellency mentioned that you hoped to be writing shortly about the proposed Indemnity legislation. This letter may therefore cross one from you; but, in case Your Excellency has not already written, I felt that it may be of some help to let you know at the earliest possible moment how far Hallett and I have progressed in our discussion of this subject. I am therefore forwarding for Your Excellency's information copies of the letters' that have passed between us, viz.:²

My No. 3-G.B., dated the 4th January 1943.³

My No. 45-G.B., dated the 11th January 1943,⁴ and its enclosure.

Hallett's letter dated the 21st January 1943.⁵

2. You will see from this correspondence that we have reached a large measure of agreement. In fact, I would say that there is no difference of opinion at all as to what is the ideal objective, for I entirely accept Hallett's view that Central Government Servants (including soldiers) should, if possible, be covered by the indemnity. But it still seems to me that there may be some difficulty in securing this by means of provincial legislation-and particularly by means of provincial legislation which does not make the Central Government (rather than the Governor in his discretion, or even the Governor-General) the sanctioning authority so far as their own servants are concerned. But I very readily fall in with Hallett's suggestion that these questions should be put before Your Excellency for your advice and decision.

3. As I see it, the specific questions for consideration are as follows:

- (a) Having regard to section 271 (or indeed to any other Section) of the Constitution Act, is there any objection on the ground of vires or constitutional propriety to clause 4 as drafted in the Bill enclosed with my letter of the 11th January to Hallett?¹ (As it stands, that clause purports to make the Governor in his discretion the sanctioning authority in respect of all Government Servants, including servants of the Central Government and it also makes him the deciding authority if any question arises as to whether previous sanction is or is not necessary.
- (b) If it be held that clause 4 as drafted is open to objection; would that objection be removed by the substitution of (i) the Central Government or (ii) the Governor-General for the Governor in his discretion : the sanctioning and deciding authority respectively in sub-clauses (a) and (b) of clause 4 so far as servants of the Central Government are concerned?
- (c) Whether or not the Central Government or the Governor-General were substituted for the Governor in his discretion in the manner contemplated in (b) above, would it be either necessary or proper for the Provincial Governments concerned to make an official reference to the Central Government with a view to obtain their executive concurrence before proceeding with legislation which thus affected Government Servants under their control? If so, would such a reference be likely to cause embarrassment?
- (d) If Your Excellency's conclusion is that the scope of the Bill must be confined to servants of the Provincial Government, do you accept the amendment proposed in paragraph 5 of my letter to Hallett?
- (e) Is the draft Bill otherwise in order?
- (f) Does Your Excellency agree that it should not be circulated to elicit public opinion?

4. When these questions have been resolved and the terms of the Bill settled, I would propose to reserve it formally for Your Excellency's consideration. Meanwhile Hallett and I will discuss the terms of the explanatory statement which would be published alongwith the Act.

5. One other minor point occurs to me, which it may be just worthwhile to raise at this stage. If it is decided that the Governor-General is to be the statutory authority to accord previous sanction to proceedings against Central Government Servants and to decide whether such previous sanction is or is not necessary, through what channel should his orders on these points be sought? Presumably the Secretary to the Government (not the Governor) of the United Provinces/Bihar would address an official letter to Your Excellency's (Public) Secretary?

6. I am sending a copy of this letter to Hallett.

Yours sincerely,

T.A. Stewart

10: In reg. Dondapati Ellappa and others (Appellants) Mockett J. (29 Jan. 1943)

AIR, Vol. 30, 1943, Madras, pp. 454–66

Criminal appeal No. 650 of 1942, decided on 29th January 1943, against order of Special Judge, Chittoor Division, in ordinance Case No. 2 of 1942.

V.T. Rangaswami Ayyangar and A.B. Viswanatha Ayyar for accused.

Public prosecutor – for the Crown.

Judgment - The appellants were convicted before Mr W.O. Newsam sitting at Chittoor as a Special Judge under Ordinance 2 of 1942. They were charged with various offences under the Defence of India Rules. In short, they were charged with sabotage of the railways by removing rails and fish-plates on the permanent way. I am not concerned in any way with the facts. They were convicted and sentenced each to five years' rigorous imprisonment except in the case of accused 4 who was sentenced to five years' simple imprisonment. They have appealed against their conviction to this High Court and the public prosecutor takes the point that no appeal lies. I am quite satisfied that the point is a good one.

[Omitted: Judge summarizes the clauses of the Ordinance as he understood them]

The original note to that clause is 'Exclusion of interference of other Courts'. Rao Bahadur V.T. Rangaswami Iyengar has argued that in spite of these provisions, it cannot be said that the right of appeal from a Special Judge has been expressly taken away, that the right of appeal being precious for the liberty of the subject cannot be taken away by implication and that whatever the framers of the Ordinance may have intended, they have in fact not achieved their purpose of preventing an appeal from a conviction by a Special Judge being heard by the High Court in the ordinary manner, under the Criminal Procedure Code. As this is a matter of considerable importance, I listened for some time and with all attention to Mr Rangaswami Iyengar's arguments. But I have not the slightest doubt that it is as clear as it can possibly be that Ordinance 2 of 1942 expressly deprives a person convicted before a Special Judge of the right of appeal in the ordinary way. The necessary meaning of the wording of cl. 8 must be that the right of appeal is abrogated and that only in certain cases can convictions be reconsidered at all and that too not by the High Court as such but by a person designated by the provincial Government, namely, the High Court Judge sitting under the provisions of the Ordinance.

But cl. 26 makes any argument by inference unnecessary, because that clause expresses comprehensively and as clearly as is possible the intention of the Ordinance to exclude every form of appeal by any person convicted under this Ordinance unless such appeal is expressly provided for and examples of those are to be found in cl. 13, appeal from the Special Magistrate – and cl. 19, appeal from a Summary Court. There is no appeal from a special Judge. Instead, the provisions with regard to review are provided cl. 8 and then only in certain cases. In this particular case, the sentence being less than seven years, it will be seen that the provisions of cl. 8 are not applicable for the purpose of review by the Judge chosen for that purpose by the provincial Government. I am told that there is no previous decision on this point. That may well be because the provisions of the Code and the Ordinance are so clear that no one has thought of arguing otherwise. In the result I hold that no appeal lies which disposes of what is now before me purporting to be an appeal.

Order accordingly.

File 44/6/43 – Home Poll (I)

[NAI]

Subject: Treatment of persons detained without trial in connection with the Congress movement.

In a letter of August 2nd¹ laying down the plan of campaign against the Congress, we asked provincial Governments to arrest under D.R. 26 all individuals whom they considered competent and likely to attempt to organize and launch a mass movement. We informed the Bombay Government that Gandhi and the Members of the working Committee should be allowed no newspapers, letters or interviews or any other form of communication with the outside world, for at least the first month of their detention; and we recommended that all other provincial Governments should adopt a similar procedure with regard to all important leaders and organizers who might be arrested within their jurisdiction. The action was to be regarded as preventive in character.

2. On August 20th we relaxed these orders, so far as Gandhi and the working Committee were concerned, by allowing them to see certain newspapers and to correspond with the members of their families on domestic matters. This relaxation was communicated to Provincial Governments and we believe that they have all followed suit to this extent.

3. It subsequently came to our notice that certain Provincial Governments were making further relaxations in the rules regulating interviews, and the question, therefore, arose whether we should lay down a uniform policy and, if so, what it should be. On December 11th we asked for the considered views of all Provincial Governments in the matter.

4. While no Provincial Government has challenged the desirability of uniformity, and the C.P. Government has specifically asked for it, the replies to our letter of December 11th show that variations of practice have arisen. Four Provincial Governments, including three Ministerial Governments, namely Bihar, Bengal Orissa, and Assam, have relaxed the orders to a greater or less extent in the matter of interviews. Sind, which was perhaps the least affected Province, originally proposed to do so, but has agreed to fall into line with the majority. The remaining six Provinces – Madras, Bombay, U.P., Punjab, Central Provinces and N.W.F.P. – are all strongly in favour of maintaining the present orders forbidding interviews and allowing no correspondence except with members of the family on domestic matters. Security prisoners (i.e. persons detained without trial under D.R. 26) are ordinarily allowed to have one interview per fortnight and to write four and receive eight letters per week if in Class I, while those in Class II are allowed to have one interview per month and to write two and receive four letters per week. All interviews and correspondence are censored but there is no particular restriction on the classes of person whom they may see or write to or from whom they may receive letters. An ordinary convicted prisoner placed in the lowest class is allowed one interview per 2 months and may also write and receive one letter per 2 months. Convicted prisoners in higher classes have increased privileges in these respects. The Government of India have in the past exercised a certain degree of control over the Provincial treatment of security prisoners in matters of principle, but have allowed considerable discretion to the Provinces in matters of detail.

5. The Home Department consider that there can be no question of allowing any further relaxation at present in the case of Gandhi and the Members of the Working Committee. They also consider it difficult to discriminate between security prisoners and prescribe one treatment for the more important and a different, and a more generous treatment for the less important. It follows, therefore, that there can be no question of recommending any relaxation in the rules to those provinces which desire to keep the existing restrictions in force. The main difficulty is with regard to those provinces which have already permitted some relaxation. Their reasons for doing so, at any rate so far as the three Ministerial Provinces are concerned, are probably based on the fear of popular criticism, while the Bihar Government contends that denial of interviews constitutes a 'grievance', the removal of which makes jail administration easier. This Government also points out the real difficulty of denying to persons detained without trial the privileges which are allowed even to convicted criminals. (It appears that the Punjab Government does not allow interviews to persons convicted in connection with the Congress movement, as well as to those detained without trial; but there is no evidence that any other Provincial Government has gone so far as this).

6. Considering the grounds on which denial of interviews was originally recommended and the present state of the movement, which can no longer be called a mass movement, the Home Department are inclined to think that a certain degree of discretion must be allowed to Provinces, especially Ministerial Provinces, provided that the results of their action cannot be shown to be dangerous. We must recognize the fact that the withdrawal of privileges already enjoyed may lead to difficulties such as hunger — strikes, and also that it is not easy to deprive some security prisoners of privileges which are allowed to others. We may express the view, therefore, that, since letters to relatives are already allowed, interviews with such relatives would do no more harm except on the assumption that the jail administration is slack and the interviews would not be properly supervised. While we should have no objection to this degree of relaxation in any province which wished to adopt it, we should suggest to all the four provinces which now permit interviews the importance of regulating such interviews on the same lines as letters, i.e. restricting them to members of the prisoner's family. So far as Bihar and Bengal are concerned, we might go further and suggest that the latitude already allowed has, in fact, been misused; that escapes of prisoners have taken place; and that the behaviour of their security prisoners points to the need for tightening up jail discipline and would, therefore, provide strong grounds for withdrawing some or all of the concessions already allowed.

7. A further aspect of this matter is the question of the numbers and classes of persons who have been detained without trial in connection with the movement. The Provincial returns gave the figure at over 11,000 on December 1st; and there are some grounds for thinking that too free a use may have been made of D.R. 26 for the detention of persons who would hardly come within the category of important leaders and organizers referred to in our letter of August 2nd. This, however, is a different and a wider problem; and it is proposed to take it up separately.

8. The case is submitted to H.E. for orders whether the line of action proposed in para 6 may be approved.

12 The Viceroy to the Governor of Bihar (case of Ainsworth)

[NAI - Acc. No. 2385]

To, H.E. Mr T.G. Rutherford, C.S.I., C.I.E., Governor of Bihar.

*The Viceroy's House, New Delhi,
February 4th, 1943.*

[125 (25-A)-G.G.-42].
[Confidential].

My dear Rutherford,

You will have seen the papers about this unfortunate case of Mr Ainsworth ending with Stewarts' confidential letter to me of 28th January, No. 82-G.B.¹ I agree entirely that the new facts therein disclosed give the case a difficult turn, and I am glad to see that definite instructions have already been given to the Commissioner of the Division to hold an enquiry. It goes without saying of course that until we know the results of that enquiry, it is difficult to know what situation may arise. But I am a little surprised, as clearly Stewart was, that we should not have heard earlier of the complaint made to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate on the 7th October; while the particulars given by Stewart are not sufficient to enable me to judge exactly what the situation is. It is not clear for instance whether the complaint is one of causing the death of Kailashpati Singh or relates only to the beating. In any case I am advised that under the provisions of section 197 of the Criminal procedure Code it does not appear that the Court could have taken cognizance of the complaint in the absence of sanction, and it is not apparent whether the present stage is that the Magistrate has refused to receive the complaint without sanction or that the complainant has formally applied to the Bihar Government for sanction under section 197. Stewart seemed to be doubtful how far the case was covered by section 197. I am advised on this that section does not prima facie extend to Mounted Military Police who could only be protected by an Act of Indemnity, but that Ainsworth should be protected under the terms of the section since any offence which he is alleged to have committed was certainly committed 'while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty' viz., the duty of arresting and examining Kailashpati Singh and committing him to custody. I agree however with Stewart that it will be desirable not only from Ainsworth's point of view but also from that of the Mounted Military Police to get the Act of Indemnity passed before further proceedings develop. I have just had the Secretary of State's concurrence in our going ahead on a provincial basis with the Act of Indemnity; and I shall be writing to you separately on that matter.

Yours Sincerely,

Linlithgow.

File No. 44/6/42 — Home Poll (I)

I approve generally the policy proposal in para 6 above.² But I think its application should in some regard be postponed until we are 'out of the wood' and there remain no real risk of any widespread recrudescence of this mischief. We are at war, the rebellion was the most formidable uprising since that 1857 [sic]. We shall be well advised to take no risks.

2. I agree that provinces must be left with some discretion, though the virtues of uniformity are patent. Thus I recognise that it may be unwise in certain circumstances to withdraw privileges already granted. That above practice can be tightened up without undue likelihood of trouble, I think Provinces should be encouraged to do so. I have, I must admit, very slight confidence in the way in which, in many jails, interviews are supervised. Nor can there be any doubt that visitors offer a ready opportunity for the conveyance of clandestine communications into and out of jails.

3. I continue to be anxious about the position in BIHAR and we have no cause to feel much confidence in the conditions obtaining in the jails of the province. I judge, therefore, that Bihar should be encouraged to tighten up practices and jail discipline. About Bengal, I am for a variety of reasons less uneasy. But, as Sir R. Tottenham observes above, we know that there also jail discipline is not up to the mark. If therefore we can persuade the Bengal Ministry to withdraw certain concessions already allowed, it would be well to do so, and jail discipline should evidently be stiffened up.

(Confidential)

No. 113-G.B.

My dear Lord Linlithgow,

I have written separately on the general subject of the proposed Indemnity legislation. This letter relates to the particular case of Ainsworth and is in reply to your Excellency's letter of the 4th February.¹

2. Stewart spoke to me about this matter before he left and of the astonishment with which he had learnt only a few days previously that a private complaint had in fact been lodged against Ainsworth as long ago as the 7th October 1942. The facts appear to be as follows. The brother of the deceased man, Kailashpati Singh, filed a petition before the District Magistrate, Arrah (M.S. Rao, I.C.S.), on the 5th October. This petition, which was not in the form of a regular criminal complaint and bore no court-fee stamp (but in a charge of murder no stamp is necessary), alleged that his brother had been beaten to death by four sowars under the orders of Ainsworth and that these men were therefore guilty of murder; and the petitioner went on to pray that in the interest of justice the District Magistrate would hold an enquiry into the matter. On the 6th October this petition was simply endorsed by the District Magistrate to the Sadr Sub-Divisional Officer. On the 7th October the Sub-Divisional Officer examined the petitioner on solemn affirmation and recorded his statement in the form in which such statements are ordinarily recorded when a regular criminal complaint has been lodged. He then passed an order on a Magisterial order-sheet to the effect that he had examined the 'complainant' on solemn affirmation, that a magisterial enquiry had already been held into the matter (here he was clearly alluding to the enquiry under Section 176, Criminal Procedure Code), and that the case should be put up on a date about a fortnight ahead. When that date came, he recorded another order to the effect that the complainant was present, and that the case should be put up again when orders had been passed on the magisterial enquiry report. The order-sheet contains an order to take on file under any Section of the I.P.C. and no case number has been given. This may of course be a clerk's omission and I have given instructions to ascertain unobtrusively whether it has been entered in the Complaint Register. There the matter stands. Apparently the District Magistrate and the Sub-Divisional Officer were of the opinion that, as the report of the magisterial enquiry was already before Government, it was unnecessary for them to bring to anybody's notice the fact that this petition had been filed

and that certain action had been taken on it. Stewart visited Arrah early in December and, I understand, made particular enquiries about this case both from the District Magistrate and from the Superintendent of police. But by that time M.S. Rao had been transferred and his successor (D.H. Crofton) had never been told about the complaint. Nor did the Superintendent of police know anything about it, although the Sub-Divisional Officer had given a direction (which apparently was never carried out) that copy of the complaint and the original order passed by him thereon should be sent to the Superintendent of police. Ainsworth himself was in complete ignorance of this development until a couple of weeks ago. Meanwhile, the complainant has made no further move in the matter, and I am given to understand that there is reason to believe that he may not be anxious to go on with a regular prosecution. (One of his near relations is said to be a Sub-Inspector of Police in this province.) Both he and the deceased were according to his petition formerly in the Rajput Infantry. We shall be in a better position to decide how to deal with the complaint (it comes to active life before the Indemnity legislation has gone through) when I have found out whether the Magistrate has actually got the case on his file.

3. Your Excellency states that you have been advised that the court could not have taken cognizance of this complaint (as against Ainsworth himself) in the absence of the sanction of the provincial Government under Section 197, and that any offence which Ainsworth is alleged to have committed was certainly committed 'while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty'. As soon as Stewart heard about that complaint, he felt that he should take the precaution of obtaining the formal advice of the Legal Remembrancer here on this point. I enclose a copy of the minute recorded by the Legal Remembrancer (S.K. Das' who as Your Excellency will remember, is also Secretary to Government in the Jails Department), and you will see from this that he takes a directly contrary view. If it comes to a pinch, I shall not hesitate to disregard his advice and to act on the advice which Your Excellency has received. But, as you point out, Section 197 does not help the mounted Military Policemen, and we certainly do not want the case to proceed against them while invoking the provisions of Section 197 in Ainsworth's favour.

4. The Commissioner has got down to the enquiry which Stewart ordered him to make, and I have impressed on him that it should be pushed through as quickly as possible. Meanwhile he has raised the question (which might turn out to be one of no little importance) whether a criminal court would hereafter have the right to call for the record of his enquiry and whether the complainant in any criminal case which might be instituted against Ainsworth or his subordinates would be entitled to obtain copies of the statements made by persons (including the 'accused' persons themselves) in the course of the enquiry. The advice which I obtained on this question indicates that there is at least considerable doubt whether either the proceeding or the statements could be withheld. I have therefore given instructions that the Commissioner should be told to make full notes only of all the statements made to him both of witnesses and accused. No statements would be signed. He would make use of the notes in preparing his report to Government, and would then destroy them in much the same way as an investigating police officer destroys his notes after writing up a case diary. The Commissioner's actual report to Government would, I think, be a confidential State document which would be absolutely protected by section 123 of the Indian Evidence Act.

5. I shall keep Your Excellency informed of further developments. I should however like to take this opportunity of expressing complete agreement with Stewart's view that we should spare no effort to prevent this distressing affair from being ventilated in the criminal court, and that the only way in which we can be perfectly sure of preventing this from happening is to get the Act of Indemnity on the Statute Book at the earliest possible moment.

Yours Sincerely,

T.G. Rutherford.

(Enclosure)

The point on which my advice is sought in this case is whether sanction under section 197, Cr. P.C., is necessary in this case. The facts of the case have been given in the report of the S.D.O., dated 1st October 1942,² at pages 2-6c. I would not repeat those facts. The offence, if any, was committed on 28th September 1942. This is after the relevant date as explained in Sub-section (3) of the Section 270 of the Government of India Act, 1935. Therefore, the protection provided under Section 270 of the Government of India Act, 1935, is not available. Section 270 of the Government of India Act, 1935, applies to acts committed before the relevant date.

2. Then comes the question of Section 197, Cr. P.C. As far as M.M.P. Sowars are concerned, I take it they are not public servants who cannot be removed from office 'Save by or with the sanction of the Provincial Government or some higher authority'. I believe they can be removed from office by an authority subordinate to the Provincial Government, and without the sanction of the Provincial Government. If that be so, no sanction for their prosecution under section 197, Cr. P.C., is necessary. As to Mr Ainsworth, he is no doubt a public servant who is not movable from his office save by or with the sanction of the Provincial Government or some higher authority. The words italicized are important. Therefore, Mr Ainsworth comes within the category of public servants described in section 197, Cr. P.C. The question, however, is whether the offence alleged to have been committed by him was committed while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty. The words italicized above are taken from the section itself and are very important. These words have given rise to various decisions in different High Courts in India all of which are not uniform. I need not invite attention to the different cases on the subject which have been referred to at pages 554-558 of Mitra's Cr. P.C. (9th edition). The question was recently considered in the Federal Court in the case of Hori Ram Singh v. Emperor (A.I.R. 1939 F.C. 43). I am quoting below the following extract from the leading judgment of Varadachariar J.:

The reported decisions on the application of S 197, Cr. P.C. are not by any means uniform. In most of them, the actual conclusion will probably be found to be unexceptionable, in view of the facts of each case; but, in some, the test has been laid down in terms which it is difficult to accept as exhaustive or correct. Much the same may be said even of decisions pronounced in England. On the language of similar statutory provisions; see observation in (1851) 11 C.P. 827. It does not seem to me necessary to review in detail the decisions given under Section 197, Cr. P.C., which may roughly be classified as falling into three groups, so far so they attempted to state something in the nature of a test. In one group of cases, it is insisted that there must be something in the nature of the act complained of that attaches it to the official character of the person doing it; of 33.I.C. 648, O Mad. 754, A.I.R. 1929 Cal. A.I.R. 1935, Rang. 263 and A.I.R. 1939, Bom. 63. In another group more stress has been laid on the circumstance that the official character or status of the accused gave him the opportunity to commit the offence. It seems to me that the first is the correct view. In the third group of cases, stress is laid almost exclusively on the fact that it was at a time when the accused was engaged in his official duty that the alleged offence was said to have been committed: see 52 Mad. 602 at p. 605, quoting from Mitra's Commentary on the Cr. P.C., The use of the expression 'while acting', &c., in section 197

Cr. P.C. (particularly its introduction by way of amendment in 1923), has been held to lend some support to this view. While I do not wish to ignore the significance of the time factor, it does not seem to me right to make it the test. To take an illustration suggested in the course of the argument, if a medical officer, while on duty in the hospital, is alleged to have committed rape on one of the patients or to have stolen a jewel from the patients' person, it is difficult to believe that it was the intention of the Legislature that he could not be prosecuted for such offences except with the previous sanction of the local Government.

The extract given above shows the view of the Federal Court is regarding the interpretation of Section 197, Cr. P.C. The test which the Federal Court applies is that there must be something in the nature of the act complained of that attaches it to the official character of the person doing it. In this particular case the allegation is that Mr Ainsworth and the M.M.P. Sowars beat a person who had been arrested for committing a certain offence in order to get some information from him. The offence is, in my opinion, clearly beyond the official character of the person doing it. Mr Ainsworth does not claim that he had any authority to beat the person or that he was empowered to do so during investigation of the case. There is a very similar Madras case which is referred to in the Federal Court judgment at page 570 the report cited above (A.I.R. 1932 Mad. 214). In that case, a Village Magistrate held in confinement certain persons who were suspected to have committed a murder, and also tortured them in order to extort a confession from them. The Magistrate was charged for committing offences under sections 330, 343 and 348, I.R.C. Wallace J. held that sanction to prosecute the Magistrate under sections 343 and 348 was required under section 197, Cr. P.C., but not for prosecuting him under section 330. The present case is, I think, similar to the Madras case referred to above. On Mr Ainsworth's own statement he was guilty of an offence under section 330, I.P.C., if not of a graver offence. Following the Madras case and the Federal Court case which has approved the Madras case, I think no sanction is necessary for the prosecution of Mr Ainsworth for the offence which he committed by beating the man. The beating was not an act which Mr Ainsworth committed while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty. The evidence of Mr Verma (the Superintendent of police) clearly shows that Mr Ainsworth was under no duty to beat the man to get the required information.

3. I must, however, say that the question whether a person committed an act while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty is a question of fact and must be determined in the circumstances of each particular case. The proper procedure in such a case is for the aggrieved party (i.e. the complainant in this case) to ask for the sanction of the Provincial Government, if he considers that sanction is necessary. The learned Magistrate before whom the complaint has been made has to decide this question juridically. If he considers that sanction of the Provincial Government is necessary it is his duty to dismiss the complaint for want of sanction; because he cannot take cognizance without such sanction. If on the contrary, he thinks that no sanction is necessary, then he ought to pass an appropriate order on the complaint filed before him. I do not think he can or should wait for Government orders on the subject. The cognizance which a Magistrate takes on a complaint is a judicial act, and it cannot depend on executive orders passed by the provincial Government.

4. I have given above my personal view that sanction is not necessary in this case. If, however, the provincial Government think that the case is of such a flagrant nature that sanction should be given in order to remove all doubt, there can be no objection to the grant of such sanction. The grant of sanction is merely an executive act and does not mean that the Provincial Government have come to any definite conclusion as to the guilt or otherwise of the accused.

It merely indicates that there is a prima facie case for which sanction should be given. There is no provision of law empowering the Provincial Government or an officer or Government to hold a judicial enquiry in order to ascertain whether or not sanction ought to be given. Any enquiry which may be held for the purpose will be merely and departmental enquiry. Even if the provincial Government do not give any sanction, the private complainant can press his complaint and prove to the satisfaction of the Court that no sanction is necessary in this case.

5. I must add that on Mr Ainsworth's own statement he has committed an offence for which he is liable under the law. It is for consideration whether in such circumstances there are any reasons for withholding sanction, if the complainant asks for such sanction from the Provincial Government.

6. I have also considered Section 42 of the Police Act in this connection. In my opinion that Section has no application in this case. The act which Mr Ainsworth committed was not an act done or intended to be done under the provisions of the Police Act or under the general police powers.

16: Emperor v. Parmanand Rai and others (Opposite Party) [Iqbal Ahmad C.J., Allsop, Bajpai, Mohd Ismail and Hamilton J.J. — Full Bench (9 March 1943)]

AIR, Vol. 30, 1943, Allahabad, pp. 233-8

Criminal Revn. Nos 847 and 840 of 1942, Decided on 9th March 1943, from order of Special Judge, Azamgarh, D 10th September 1942.

Government Advocate — for the Crown.

Shiva Prasad Sinha — for Opposite Party.

Iqbal Ahmad C.J. — This and the connected application in revision No. 840 of 1942 are two criminal applications in revision by the Provincial Government and arise under the following circumstances; On 14th August 1942, a mob set fire to the Notified Area Office at Mau with the result that the records and the building were destroyed. Two separate cases arising out of this occurrence were sent up by the police under S.136, Penal Code. There were ten accused in one case and one accused in the other. Both the cases were tried by Mr Masudul Hasan ostensibly acting as a Special Magistrate under Ordinance No. 2 of 1942. He convicted all the accused in both the cases and sentenced each of them to two years' rigorous imprisonment, and one of the accused, Radha Raman, was also ordered to pay a fine of Rs 500.

Two appeals were filed by the convicted persons 'in the Court of the Sessions Judge exercising the powers of Special Judge at Azamgarh and the appeals were headed as appeals 'under S.13 of the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 2 of 1942'. The learned Judge allowed the appeals, set aside the conviction and sentences of all the appellants in both the appeals and directed that the accused be committed to the Court of Sessions for trial 'after regular commitment proceedings have been held'. The two application in revision before us are directed against this order of the learned Judge. The learned Judge while signing the judgment described himself as 'Sessions Judge' and not as a special Judge. The appeals before him, however, purported to be under S.13 of the Ordinance and were preferred to him in his capacity as a Special Judge. It is, therefore manifest that he entertained, heard and decided the appeals as a Special and not as a Sessions Judge, and the cardinal question that arises for consideration is whether this Court is competent, in the exercise of its revisional jurisdiction, to interfere with the order passed by the learned Judge.

It appears that Mr Masudul Hasan had exercised the powers of a Magistrate of the first class for less than two years and, as such could not, in view of the provisions of S.9 of the Ordinance, be invested with the powers of a Special Magistrate under the Ordinance. The learned Judge, therefore, held, and rightly held, that the whole trial was ultra vires and illegal. The appeals by the convicted persons were, however, filed after the expiry of the period of seven days prescribed by subs (2) of S.13 of the Ordinance, and the Government Pleader accordingly raised a preliminary objection to the hearing of the appeals by the learned Judge on the ground that they were barred by time. The learned Judge overruled the preliminary objection on the ground that as Mr Masudul Hasan was not legally 'a Special Magistrate' S.13 of the Ordinance had no application to the cases. He held that the cases should be 'treated as having been disposed of by an ordinary first class Magistrate' and therefore the appeals were within time. He then proceeded to determine the question as to 'what further proceeding should be taken in the cases'. He held that, as the offence with which the accused persons were charged was committed before the Ordinance was put into force in these Provinces, the accused persons could not be tried under the Ordinance. This view of the learned Judge was opposed to the view taken by this court in the Full Bench case in A.I.R. 1943 ALL. 26 and was clearly erroneous. Having arrived at the conclusion just mentioned, the learned Judge passed the order for the commitment of the accused as stated above. In the full Bench decision in A.I.R. 1943 ALL. 26 I held that the words of S.26 of the Ordinance are very wide and completely bar the revisional jurisdiction of this Court in cases tried and decided by Special Magistrates or Special Judges, and I still adhere to that view. Section 26 runs as follows.

Notwithstanding the provisions of the Code, or of any other law for the time being in force, or of anything having the force of law by whatsoever authority made or done, there shall, save as provided in this Ordinance, be no appeal from any order or sentence of a Court constituted under this Ordinance and, save as aforesaid, no Court shall have authority revise such order or sentence, or to transfer any case from any such Court, or to make any order under S.491 of the Code or have any jurisdiction of any kind in respect of any proceedings of any such Court.

As the Court of a Special Judge is constituted under the Ordinance, this Court has no authority to revise the order of a Special Judge howsoever erroneous or unjust it may be. The learned Judge was clearly wrong in holding that the accused could not be tried in accordance with the provisions of the Ordinance and his order that they should be committed to the Court of Session after regular commitment proceedings was, therefore, also contrary to law. But as the revisional jurisdiction of this Court has, by words of clear and unambiguous import, been barred, this court cannot assume jurisdiction to correct an erroneous order passed by a Special Judge. As I read S.26 of the Ordinance, it appears to me that this Court cannot, in any manner whatsoever, interfere with the orders passed by a Court validly constituted under the Ordinance, be it a Court of a special Magistrate or a Court of a Special Judge. To this effect is the full Bench decision of the Patna High Court in A.I.R. 1943 Pat. 18 and I am in full agreement with that decision to this extent that the High Court cannot, in the exercise of its revisional jurisdiction, interfere with the orders passed by Special Magistrates and Special Judges. The Patna High Court, however, went further and held that if the Ordinance under which the petitioners were tried was not applicable to their cases, then their trial was not trial at all in the eye of law and they cannot be detained in prison, because they should be deemed to have been committed to prison without trial and because the Magistrates who have sentenced them to imprisonment had no power to send them to prison and that the High Court may direct under S.491, Criminal P.C., that the petitioners who were illegally detained be set at liberty. With all respect, I am unable to agree with this view. Section 26 explicitly prohibits the passing of an order under S.491, Criminal P.C., in cases taken cognizance of by Special Magistrates or Special Judges and this prohibition is, to my mind, absolute. For the reasons given above, I would dismiss both the applications in revision.

Allsop J. — The Local Government have made two applications to us for the revision of orders passed by the Sessions judge of Azamgarh on two appeals in the course of one judgment. The two cases arose out of a single occurrence. There were ten accused in one case and one in the other and they were all convicted by Mr Masudul Hasan of offences punishable under S.436, Penal Code. Mr Masudul Hasan purporting to act as a Special Magistrate under Ordinance 2 of 1942 sentenced the accused each to rigorous imprisonment for a period of two years and one of them to a fine of Rs 500 in addition. The learned Judge found that Mr Masudul Hasan was not competent to act as a Special Magistrate because he had not been exercising first class powers for a period of two years. The Ordinance allows the Local Government to appoint as a Special Magistrate only a person who has been exercising first class powers for this period. The appeals were to the Sessions Judge acting in his capacity as a Special Judge under the Ordinance. It was urged by the Government Pleader that the appeals were barred by limitation because they had not been presented within seven days after the date of the Magistrate's order. The learned Judge, however, overruled this point upon the ground that the Magistrate had acted ultra vires and that the whole trial was void. He set aside the convictions and sentences and directed that the accused should be committed to the Court of Session for trial after the required commitment proceedings had been held provided that the Magistrate who conducted those proceedings was satisfied that a prima facie case was made out. In the ordinary course an offence punishable under S.436, Penal Code, can be tried only by the court of Session.

It is not clear whether the learned Judge intended to pass this order in his capacity as a Sessions Judge or in his capacity as a Special Judge under the Ordinance. It seems to me that he was probably not very clear upon this point himself. The Ordinance has set up certain Special Courts which are not amenable to the jurisdiction of the High Court and it is purely a matter of coincidence that persons who preside over Special Courts at the same time preside over ordinary Courts which are subject to such jurisdiction. These persons should be careful to distinguish between their functions as presiding officers of these different Courts. If the learned Judge intended to pass orders in his capacity as a Sessions Judge those orders are subject to revision by this Court. In the case, I should say that the orders do substantial justice and that there is no reason why this Court should interfere with them. On the other hand, if the learned Judge intended to pass these orders in his capacity as a Special Judge under the Ordinance I am satisfied that this Court has no jurisdiction whatsoever. Section 26 of the Ordinance makes the matter perfectly clear. It lays down without any manner of doubt that this Court must not interfere with any order passed by a Court of a Special Judge or a Special Magistrate constituted under the Ordinance. Whatever the position of the Magistrate may have been the learned Judge was undoubtedly presiding over a Court so constituted. When the section speaks of a Court constituted under the Ordinance it no doubt means a Court properly so constituted and this Court could go into the question of the proper constitution of the Court but once it has held that a Court has been properly constituted I consider that it cannot interfere with any order passed by that Court. If the section spoke of an order passed under the Ordinance, this Court could doubtless consider whether the order could be said to have been passed under the Ordinance and if it dealt with some matters which were not within the purview of the Ordinance it could act accordingly, but that is not the wording of the section. In my judgment, once a special Court has been properly constituted under the Ordinance this Court has no jurisdiction to interfere with any order passed by that Court whether that order comes within the purview of the Ordinance or does not do so. The person aggrieved or any other person interested may possibly, at his own risk, ignore an order which he considers is passed without jurisdiction, but this Court cannot interfere with such an order in appeal or in revision or for that matter under the provisions of S.491, Criminal P.C., which is specifically mentioned in the section. I hold that there is no force in these applications and I would dismiss them both.

Bajpai J. — This is an application in revision on behalf of the Provincial Government and is headed as a revision under Ss. 435 and 439 read with S.423, Criminal P.C., against the order passed by W. Broome Esqr. I.C.S., Sessions Judge of Azamgarh, dated 10th September 1942. It is connected with Criminal Revision No. 847 of 1942 where also the heading of the Criminal revision is similar. I have emphasised the heading because I think it is of some importance that the Provincial Government treat the proceedings as a revision under the Code of Criminal Procedure against the order of a Sessions Judge, and I have little doubt that the revision in spirit and in letter is as indicated above. The facts are that the opposite parties in the two revision petitions were tried by Mr Masudul Hasan, a Magistrate of the first class, for an offence under S. 436, Penal Code. The Magistrate tried the offences under Ordinance No. 2 of 1942 arrogating to himself the capacity of a Special Magistrate constituted under the Ordinance. It is, however, clear that he had been exercising first class powers only since 23rd November 1940, and thus did not possess the necessary qualification laid down by S.9 of Ordinance No. 2. He must, therefore, be deemed to be an ordinary first class Magistrate and as such Magistrate he was not empowered under the Criminal Procedure Code to try an offence under S.436, Penal Code. The question which arises is that if a Magistrate usurps jurisdiction which he does not possess can his action be questioned before a superior tribunal — superior to an ordinary Magistrate, but not superior as not possessing appellate jurisdiction to a Special Magistrate? It may be conceded that when in the present case if Mr Masudul Hasan was a Special Magistrate the learned Sessions Judge entertained the appeal, the appeal was time barred by virtue of S.13 of the Ordinance because it was presented more than seven days after the date of the sentence passed by Mr Masudul Hasan. but the said officer was, as pointed out above, not a Special Magistrate and he could not, therefore, have tried the case under the Ordinance and the trial must, therefore, be deemed to be an ordinary trial under the Criminal Procedure Code which, as once again pointed out before, could not have been conducted by an ordinary Magistrate in as much as an offence under S.436, Penal Code, is triable exclusively by a Court of session and Mr Broome therefore rightly entertained the appeal.

I have little doubt that the order passed in the present case by Mr Masudul Hasan could be questioned in appeal before the learned Sessions Judge. It is true that the appeal before him was headed by the opposite parties as an appeal against a decision under S.13 of the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance 2 of 1942, in the Court of the Sessions Judge exercising the powers of a Special Judge, but it was also said that Mr Masudul Hasan had been exercising the powers of a First Class Magistrate for less than two years and Mr Masudul Hasan was not described as a Special Magistrate. What then is the result of the entire proceedings from beginning to end: Mr Masudul Hasan was not a Special Magistrate; he tried the case as a Special Magistrate; he usurped jurisdiction which he did not possess; he was therefore an ordinary Magistrate following a procedure which he was not competent to follow and as an ordinary Magistrate he could not take cognizance of an offence under S.436, Penal Code, in the sense that he could not himself convict the accused, and the Sessions Judge as a Sessions Judge — not as a Special Judge — was authorized to pass orders in appeal and a revision against the decision of the Sessions Judge lay to this Court under the provisions of Ss. 435 and 439, Criminal P.C. The complications of the revisional powers of the High Court under S.26 of the Ordinance do not arise in the present case. My views about the revisional powers of the High Court in cases under the Ordinance are stated at length in the Full Bench case in A.I.R. 1943 ALL. 26 at p. 39, etc., and even if it be held that the revisional powers of the High Court under the Ordinance have to be considered, this Court has the power in the circumstances of the present case to entertain the revision.

I have thus now to see whether the order of the learned Sessions Judge is right or requires interference. The learned Sessions Judge has pointed out that Mr Masudul Hasan could not act as a Special Magistrate and that as an ordinary First Class Magistrate he could not try a case under S.436, Penal Code. There can be little controversy on the above two points. The learned Sessions Judge further points out that the particular offence with which the accused were charged was committed on 14th August 1942 before the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance was brought into force in the United Provinces by the notification issued on 20th August, and therefore the present case could not be tried by Special Courts which were not in existence in the United Provinces at the time when the offence was committed. This opinion is in keeping with my own views expressed in A.I.R. 1943 ALL. 26 but this opinion is not in conformity with the opinion of the majority in that case, but as a member of this Bench, I am not bound by the aforesaid Full Bench and I am free to express my own individual opinion, unfettered by anything that might have been said in the earlier case. In my view, the order of Mr Broome is correct on all points. For the reasons given above, I hold that there is no force in this revision and I would therefore dismiss it.

Mohd. Ismail J. – The two connected revisions arise out of the same incident, which occurred on 14th August 1942. Radha Raman and nine others were tried together in one case and Parmana J Rai was tried separately in another, by Mr Masudul Hasan as Special Magistrate under Ordinance 2 of 1942. The trial ended in the conviction of all the accused, who were sentenced to two years rigorous imprisonment each. Radha Raman was awarded a fine of Rs 500 in addition to the sentence of imprisonment. The convicted persons appealed to the Special Judge under S.13 of the Ordinance. The appeal was made beyond time, that is after the expiry of seven days allowed by S.13 (2). As the sentences imposed upon the appellants do not exceed two years, no appeal lay from the order of the Special Magistrate.

The Special Judge has set aside the orders of the Special Magistrate on several grounds. He held that the cases could not be tried under the Ordinance because the offence was committed before the enforcement of the Ordinance. The opinion of the Special Judge is in conflict with the majority view in 1942 A.L.J. 686. The Special Judge further held that the Magistrate was not competent to try the cases under the Ordinance because his appointment itself was illegal, as he had not exercised the powers of a Magistrate of the first class for a period of two years. Some other reasons were given by the Special Judge, which need not be enumerated. Eventually, upon setting aside the convictions and sentences of all the accused, the Special Judge directed the Magistrate to commit the accused to the Court of Session for trial under the Code of Criminal Procedure. The Provincial Government has now come to this Court in revision. It is conceded that Mr Broome enjoyed the powers of a Special Judge; but it is argued that the orders passed by the Special judge were illegal and improper and therefore should be set aside. In my opinion, the revisions are incompetent and cannot be entertained by this Court. Section 26 of the Ordinance provides.

Notwithstanding the provisions of the Code, or of any other law for the time being in force, or of anything having the force of law by whatsoever authority made or done, there shall, save as provided in this Ordinance be no appeal any order or sentence by a Court constituted under this Ordinance and save as aforesaid, no Court shall have authority to revise such order or sentence . . . or have any jurisdiction of any kind in respect of any proceeding of any such Court.

As the cases were tried under the Ordinance and no appeal or revision is provided under the Ordinance to this Court, it is manifest that the applications must be dismissed. Our attention has been drawn to a Full Bench decision of the Patna High Court in A.I.R. 1943 Pat. 18. In that case it was held:

As the Special Magistrates derive their jurisdiction from the Ordinance, they cannot be properly described as 'inferior criminal Courts' and the High Court cannot revise their orders but the High Court is not entirely powerless in the matter. Under S.491, Criminal P.C., the High Court may direct that a person illegally or improperly detained in public or private custody within the limits of its appellate criminal jurisdiction be set at liberty. If the Ordinance under which the petitioners were tried was not applicable to their cases, then their trial was no trial at all in the eye of law and they cannot be detained in a prison, because they should be deemed to have been committed to prison without trial and because the Magistrates who have sentenced them to imprisonment had no power to send them to prison.

The facts of that case are entirely distinguishable and therefore I do not consider it necessary to express any opinion with regard to the observation of the learned Chief Justice of Patna High Court. In the present case we are asked to revise the orders of Special Judge. No one has been illegally detained in or sent to prison by him. The orders of the Special Judge may be erroneous, but in my judgment, we have no power to revise those orders. For the reasons given above I would dismiss the applications.

Hamilton J. — I agree with the judgment of Allsop J. and I would reject these applications for the reasons which he has given.

By the Court. — These two applications are dismissed.

Application dismissed.

17. Governor of Bihar to the Viceroy (case of Ainsworth)

Linlithgow Collection

[NAI — Acc. No. 2385]

From, H.E. Mr T.G. Rutherford, C.S.I., C.I.E., Governor of Bihar.

No. 187. G.B.

March 13th, 1943.

Dear Lord Linlithgow,

I enclose a copy of the Commissioner's report on his enquiry into the Ainsworth case. Beyond establishing the fact that some soldiers of the Wiltshire Regiment took part in the affair, I fear that it does not add very much to our stock of positive information. The Commissioner's anxiety to safeguard the statements made before him by the persons whom he examined doubtless accounts for the general impression given by his report that he has concerned himself with probabilities more than with actual evidence; but I understand that in fact his conclusions are based on a careful consideration of the statements recorded by him. We have now at least the definite finding of a responsible and impartial officer that the injuries were inflicted 'not with the intention of causing death, and without the knowledge that the injuries inflicted were likely to cause death'. From this finding I see no reason to dissent, although, on reading the Commissioner's fuller account of what transpired that day at Ainsworth's bungalow, I confess that I am far from happy about the callousness which was displayed by everybody concerned in their treatment of the deceased and his companions. I recognise, however, that it is easy enough at this point of time and in cold blood to criticise what was done in the heat of the moment by men who were grappling to the best of their ability with a rebellious outbreak and who had been assured of the support of Government in any action which they considered necessary to deal with it; and I am reluctant to apply the ordinary standards in sitting in judgment on them. In the case of Ainsworth himself, I feel this the more strongly because of the admirable work he did throughout the disturbances in Shababad District. General Wakely has recently brought to my notice the names of various civilian officers who from the military point of view acquitted themselves with distinction during the Congress rebellion. Among these officers Ainsworth takes a high place, and the remarks made about him are as follows:

This Police Officer did outstanding work in Shababad area during the recent disturbances. It was due to his drive and energetic co-operation with the Military at all times that the Company of I Wilts stationed at Arrah was able to reopen, rapidly, communications in this District, thereby enabling villages harbouring saboteurs to be visited, loot recovered and arrests made.

This officer lived at the Headquarters of the above Company and during the first three weeks went on all operations with them. His tireless energy, devotion to duty and cheerful manner at all times was a splendid example to all ranks who accompanied him. His knowledge of the District and his subordinates, and the assistance he gave to the military, proved invaluable.

Wakely has repeated his commendation to me personally when, in talk with him, I expressed doubt whether it was wise to keep him in Bhagalpur area for the special operations now ordered. The officer under whom he has been serving in that area sent his name up recently for a 'gallantry' Indian Police Medal on grounds which I should ordinarily have had no hesitation in endorsing but which, as things stand, I have naturally had to hold over for the present. I must also reiterate once more my view that, if Ainsworth were 'broken' over this incident, whether departmentally or by means of a criminal prosecution the effect on the whole Police Force in Bihar would be disastrous.

2. The Commissioner's report makes no mention of the criminal complaint which was filed by the brother of the deceased. He ascertained, however, that after the record of the case had been called for by Government, it was entered in the Complaint Register by the Sub-divisional Officer's Bench Clerk. It must therefore be regarded as being 'on the criminal file' and in due course it will have to be disposed of formally. But the complainant, who was seen by the Commissioner, evinced no particular anxiety to take the matter further.

3. My conclusion is that this unfortunate incident should be disposed of on the lines indicated in paragraph 4 of Your Excellency's letter, dated the 16th January, viz., 'departmental reprimand and perhaps transfer to another Province'.¹ I believe the North West Frontier Province would be glad to have him. I feel, however, that it is impossible to record any order on the Commissioner's report until we are finally secured against the possibility of further development in the criminal courts. And, as Your Excellency has pointed out, an Act on Indemnity is the only solution of this particular problem. So far as Ainsworth is concerned, I should be prepared to refuse sanction under Section 197, but there can be no assurance that the High Court would not hold such sanction to be unnecessary; and in any case the Military Mounted Police and the soldiers are definitely outside the scope of this protection. I was disappointed to learn that developments in Bengal looked like holding up the enactment of this indemnity legislation in Bihar and the United Provinces, and, unless this difficulty can be resolved very soon, I would most earnestly ask Your Excellency to allow us to go ahead without waiting for Bengal.

Yours Sincerely,
T.G. Rutherford.

Report on the Commissioner's Enquiry into the death of undertrial Prisoner Kailaspati.

Part I

In September 1942, while conditions in Arrah were still disturbed, 4 satyagrahi demonstrators were arrested by 2 sowars of the mounted police, and taken to the bungalow of their Commanding Officer (who is also A.S.P.) for his orders. Before handing them over to the district police, the A.S.P. obtained permission to question them so as to find out where they had got the pamphlets they were distributing. Admittedly, force was used to extract the information. Shortly after, one of the four prisoners collapsed and died.

2. This report supplements the enquiry made by the S.D.O., Arrah, S.K. Ahsan, on September 30th/October 1st, a few days after the death of the under-trial prisoner Kailaspati. I have questioned all the relevant witnesses of the first enquiry and visited the scene of occurrence. I have also prepared a rough sketch of the compound of the A.S.P.'s bungalow, and attach a trace of the Town Map showing the locality and surroundings.

3. The finding of the S.D.C. is as follows:

The only conclusion one can therefore arrive at is that the deceased received these injuries with sticks and the manner described by the Civil Surgeon while he was in the custody of the M.M.P. probably at the A.S.P.'s bungalow although it is not possible to say which particular man was responsible for these injuries, for there were 15 M.M.P. sowars and recruits, and the deceased's companions are themselves unable to say how, and at whose hands, the deceased received these injuries.

4. My enquiries follow 3 main lines:

- (a) At what time and place were the injuries received?
- (b) How were they inflicted?
- (c) By whom were they inflicted?

During my enquiry some important facts came to light. When visiting the bungalow of the A.S.P. I was shown the place where the arrested men were interrogated. This was in the open air, adjoining the back verandha. On the day in question, in fact from August to October, the A.S.P.'s bungalow and compound was occupied by a detachment of the Wilts regiment, consisting of British Officers and men with motor transport. The tents, in which officers and men lived, were close to the place where the prisoners were questioned. This explains the references to gora log made by the prisoners at the S.D.O.'s enquiry. Further, there is good reason to believe that the gora log were not only present at the time and place of questioning, but also took part in the proceedings.

5. To consider the first question, viz. the time and place. The custody of the M.M.P. extended from the time of arrest near the Collectorate to the time of making over the prisoners to thana hayat at the Arrah Town P.S. The injuries were certainly received while the deceased was in custody of the M.M.P. The question is, whether (a) at the bungalow or (b) in transit to or from the bungalow.

Transit to. I regard this as improbable. In the first place, the other prisoners emphasise that they were satyagrahis, and consequently offered no resistance. Police constables on duty near the Collectorate all deny that they even touched the prisoners. The M.M.P. sowars were returning from the bazar in mufti, with swagger canes (known as hunters). It can safely be assumed that, beyond one or two cuts with the swagger canes, no injury was inflicted at this stage.

Transit from the A.S.P.'s bungalow to the town thana, in the Police lorry.

The distance is just over a mile, and the transit time would be roughly 5 minutes. The first half of the route is alongside the open maidan, but the second half is through bazar.

In favour of the theory that injuries were inflicted on Kailaspati during transit are

- (i) The same set of sowars, in the same lorry, later in the same afternoon, ill treated another batch of satyagrahis, inflicting severe injuries on one man, and minor injuries on others.
- (ii) The lorry had a tarpaulin cover hiding the interior from view. The noise of the engine is sufficient to drown any cries of distress.

Against the theory are the following points.

- (a) Out of the second batch, who travelled in this lorry on the second trip, only one prisoner Ramasan mentions kicks, or prod with a stick. The rest (witnesses 26, 27, 28 and 30) mention slaps, blows with swagger canes and the throttling hand grip.
- (b) According to the A.S.P., who travelled in the lorry, the sowars were wearing chappis, not boots.
- (c) According to prisoner Balesar, the sowars in the lorry on the first trip were barefooted. In either case, the sowars can hardly have put sufficient force into kicks to break a rib. Their weapons were swagger canes and their bare hands.

Finding – My finding on question (a) is that the fractures of ribs and bones of the hand were not received while in transit, but in the A.S.P.'s compound.

Question (b) – How were they inflicted? The deceased was at least 50 years old, and evidence states that, with advancing years, bones become more friable.

The injuries on the deceased may be compared with those on his companions, vide the Charts A & B. Taking the injuries on Kailaspati, one by one:

Injuries to –

- (1) Buttocks: were admittedly due to blows with sword sticks. Medical evidence agrees.
- (2) Back: eleven lathi marks. Injuries are consistent with the previous explanation above.
- (3) Fracture of rib 3, on left side. The surface showed a bruise $1 \times 1\frac{3}{4}$ described as circular. The position is high, well above the nipple of the breast. If it was actually caused by a lathi, there is no evidence on record of poking with a lathi.

- (4) Fracture of ribs 9 and 10 on right side. The bruise was measured by Civil Surgeon as 3 × 4 inches. The Civil Surgeon, questioned by me, demonstrated a position midway between the armpit and the hip joint, and crossing the ribs obliquely. He gave the opinion that it was caused by a kick.

The size of the bruise is hardly consistent with a single kick, and there is no evidence of repeated kicks. The arguments in favour of the kick theory are:

- (i) A suggestion put to me by Ainsworth (A.S.P.) that the injury might have been caused by a stray kick from the soldiers when he wasn't looking;
- (ii) Compare Chart B evidence of the prisoner Gulab Chand that the A.S.P. knocked him down, and kicked him in the testicles;
- (iii) Vide also Chart B where prisoner Balesar alleges that he was knocked down by 'one of the goras' (not the A.S.P.) who then kicked him in the ribs.

The difficulty of this theory is that on the other prisoners there is no medical evidence of kicks, either in the ribs or testicles.

7. An alternative suggestion, which occurred to me when I examined the police lorry, is this. The fracture of ribs 9 and 10, with a bruise 3 × 4 in the side, would be consistent with the theory that Kailaspati was swung and pitched into the lorry, but accidentally landed with his side against the projecting edge of the floor, which is at chest-height from the ground. The sketch below illustrates the idea.

8. Points which support this theory are:

- (i) A.S.P. Ainsworth, in describing how Kailaspati had to be put into the lorry after the beating, revealed that there were some soldiers there, who picked him up and gave him a 1-2-8 swing' inside.
- (ii) Compare also Chart B and Balesar's account of the loading at the A.S.P.'s bungalow and the unloading at the thana.
- (iii) Compare also Chart B and Gulab Chand's account of how 4 men seized his extremities, hand and feet, swung him in the air, and pitched him to a distance, during the questioning. Against the swing theory (a) vide the Chart B, and Balesar's account given to Commissioner of how they moved upright to the lorry, after questioning. But he goes on to say that they put us in with a shove and a lift (b) the 3 M.M.P. sowars and driver Abdul Kaum all assert that the prisoners had no help in getting into the lorry, using the foot-holes in the tail-board.

9. Finding. — My findings on the second question are:

- (1) The bruises and surface injuries were due to blows with sword-sticks. It is also possible that the deceased was subjected to swinging and pitching, as described by Gulab Chand
- (2) The fracture of the third rib. There is no evidence of the use of a lathi, or any poke or prodding blow. If, in the course of pitching, the deceased landed face downwards on a brick or hard-pointed object, the impact might have been sufficiently violent to cause a fracture.
- (3) The fracture of the 9th and 10th ribs is attributed by Civil Surgeon to a kick with a booted foot. This is a clear statement of opinion by a medical man which is entitled to respect. It can be supported by other references to kicks in the course of the enquiry

For example (vide Chart B) the companions of the deceased, Balesar and Gulab Chand both claim to have been knocked down and kicked in the ribs and testicles though medical examination does not mention any such injury. But as regards Kailaspati and his injuries no prisoner can say how he came by them. None of the witnesses mention that Kailas was kicked. If this injury, and its attendant bruise size 3×4 inches, is really the result of a single kick, it must have been exceptionally violent. The alternative theory, for which there is good evidence, would better explain the violence of the blow, and the size of the bruise. I regard this theory as the more probable.

10. Question (c) - By whom were the injuries inflicted? Weals, bruises and surface injuries were admittedly the result of beating. The beating was admittedly under the direction of the A.S.P. Sowars have stated that their instructions were to take care not to damage the prisoners, so much as to frighten them. The A.S.P. has asserted that, so far as possible he supervised the questioning and beating, though he does not claim to have seen each stroke as given to the four men. He adds that some men from the Regiment tried 'to interfere with rough stuff' but that he stopped them. This interference by soldiers of the Wiltshire Regiment is mentioned again by the A.S.P. When asked whether, later at the thana he noticed any prisoner bleeding from the nose, his reply was that there may have been one prisoner bleeding from the nose, possibly it was the one hit in the face by a Tommy, who was checked by his officer Avery.

11. As regards the kick theory, the A.S.P. is emphatic that no injury with a booted foot can have been due to him or to the M.M.P., as he was in slippers and M.M.P. were wearing chappis. I have examined this statement along with the evidence, and find that it is consistent. At the lunch hour, in the heat of September, it was not unlikely that the A.S.P. would be at his house in slippers; and he notes at one stage in his story that, before leaving to join the lorry, he went indoors for his hat. The place where the questioning was done was just outside the A.S.P.'s bungalow, and there was no need for him to be in any uniform except undress.

The sowars (according to one prisoner) who were in the lorry had bare feet: but of course the entire party engaged in beating did not enter the lorry. The recruits were left behind at the bungalow. From what I have seen of the frontiers men who recruit in the M.M.P. they prefer their chappis country shoes to the army ammunition boot, and they would probably discard boots when off duty. I believe therefore that if the fractures were due to a kick (or kicks) with booted foot, they were not kicks given by the A.S.P. or the Mounted Police sowars.

12. Taking the alternative theory, viz., that Kailaspati deceased landed with violence on the sharp corner of the lorry flooring, when being pitched in horizontally, the question is, who pitched him in. On this question the evidence is conflicting. We have the A.S.P.'s version, that Kailaspati was pitched in by the soldiers. Against this is the remark of the prisoner Gulab Chand that the gora log 'were not doing (saying) anything' near the lorry.

It may well be that each prisoner was dealt with separately, at a distance from his fellow, and had little chance of seeing what happened to others beyond his own group. For example the sowar Abdul Ghafar described to me how 'each prisoner got about 10 or 12 strokes in all. Not regularly. At intervals, with question in between. There were not four groups under questioning at one time. It went on separately and in turn, now this one and now that one.'

A recruit Abdul Shakur, asked by me why the man whom he was beating did not run away, replied naively that the gora log were holding the prisoner. Out of the four prisoners two were held by soldiers, and two by sowars. Thus there is nothing improbable in the remark of the A.S.P. that it was soldiers who pitched Kailaspati into the lorry. There is already evidence to show that they assisted in the beating on the buttocks, and (as A.S.P. asserts) they tried to go further and 'interfere with rough stuff'.

Out of the various versions before me, and on the inadequate evidence available, I can only record a finding that soldiers unknown of the Wiltshire Regiment took part both in the beating and in the loading of the prisoners into the lorry. The chief part was played by Abdul Karim, Abdul Ghafar and other sowars of the mounted police, acting under the instructions of the A.S.P. Mr Ainsworth.

I believe that the injuries were inflicted with the intention of forcing a confession, not with the intention of causing death, and without the knowledge that the injuries inflicted were likely to cause death.

Illegible,

Commissioner.

Rough sketch of A.S.P.'s bungalow at Arrah. The compound of A.S.P.'s house formed the camp of a detachment of officers and men of the Wilts Regiment with their M.T. Lorries. I visited the camp more than once in August-September 1942. The sketch is not to scale. The distance 30 yards from the entrance of A.S.P.'s room to the lorry stand was paced.

A spicemen sword stick, as used by the M.M.P. for dispersing crowds, was examined. It is roughly the shape and dimensions of a sword, except that the blade is made of springily cane, leather covered, diameter 3/4 inch.

21: Governor of Bihar to the Viceroy

Linlithgow Collection

[NAI - Acc. No. 2385]

From H E. Sir Thomas Rutherford, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., Governor of Bihar.

April 4th, 1943.

Dear Lord Linlithgow

I enclose a copy of the Chief Secretary's report¹ for the first half of March 1943; that for the second half of March is not ready yet. When at Delhi I mentioned to you personally anything of importance for the period from the 5th March. The day after my return from Delhi I proceeded to Bhagalpur and thereafter to Monghyr.

2. Although the operations in the Bhagalpur division against dacoits started on the 15th of last month, I regret to say that there has been a number of further dacoities and outrages – almost a counter-offensive in fact-but a number of dacoits have been already rounded up including one important leader for whose apprehension a reward of Rs 3,000 had been offered. Rs 1,500 of this goes to the police and the other half to informers. I saw Creed who is in charge of the operations when at Bhagalpur and he reported that there were signs of returning local confidence, information was coming in and some absconders were giving themselves up to Magistrates, but there were indications of the 'rebels' moving into new areas. At the Darbar held at Bhagalpur a number of rewards were given for good work during the disturbances including the Station Master of Kiul who personally saved a number of ammunition wagons from destruction. I took the opportunity to emphasise that these outrages in the Bhagalpur division were an aftermath of the Congress rebellion, that I was determined to put down disorder and that we must have more co-operation from the public if Police Forces were not to be so increased as to seriously interfere with expenditure on such things as medical relief and I attempted to bring home to my audience that the Police were not an alien force but their own organised for their protection against anti-social elements and the rogues among them such as occur among all Police Forces-were their own rogues and it was up to them to give unbiased and unexaggerated information if they misbehave.

3. I inspected the Camp Jail and the Central Jail at Bhagalpur. The Bihar Public Works Department are to be congratulated on the rapidity with which they have got this Camp Jail constructed, done I understand by commandeering every brick in the town; it was started in November and accommodation for a thousand prisoners was ready by 1st March. Completion of accommodation for 3,000 prisoners in all held up by failure or inability of the Controlling Officer to let us have wagons for coal for burning more bricks. In the Central Jail I again found a number of prisoners for whose detention there seemed to be no legal basis and was rather startled when the Superintendent of Police innocently remarked that they were still trying out of the mass of reports and records 'to fit cases to accused'. I found a number of young boys of 11 to 13 years age amongst the political prisoners who had been jailed for minor offences and ordered their immediate release. I was surprised to find amongst the women prisoners some quite young and well-brought up girls sentenced for sabotage; one woman had been 8 months without trial. No attempt had so far been made to exact any kind of labour from the so-called political prisoners sentenced to rigorous imprisonment. It is a problem with jails so crowded but they can at least be made to grind their own atta and do their own 'chores' except the scavenging which in any jail is usually done by the lowest class of ordinary prisoners. District Magistrates and Superintendents of Police seem still to be too busy to thoroughly overhaul this question of under trials and people without charge-sheets and as I have nobody I can spare for special duty to go round the jails I have ordered the Commissioners of divisions to do it for the jails in their areas. I found here also progress of cases before the Special Judges very slow partly due to investigating officers being held to their stations by current work and partly perhaps to the judges themselves.

Detenue in Vellore, C. Jail.

Through the Superintendent Central Jail Vellore.

1. I am detained in this jail under rule 26 (D.I.R.) for an indefinite period and without trial since August last.

2. No. 27343, I received a summons from the High Court of judicature at Madras, ordinary original Civil jurisdiction in C.S. No. 15 of 1943. Shri Lall Govind Das Krishnadas Varu and others Vs Shri Satyamurti and others including myself, in which a sum of Rs 14000 is claimed as damages against the defendants.

3. This summons wanted me to submit my defence along with relevant documents within two weeks approximately by 11.4.43. In reply I wrote to the High Court requesting it to grant me facilities for engaging lawyers and instructing them for the defence, specially as all interviews are denied to me. The High Court has, by its letter dated 2.4.43, which I received on 11.4.43, directed me to address my request to you.

A very big amount is involved in this suit which relates to an incident alleged to have taken place 3 years ago. In order to defend my case properly I shall be required to have frequent interviews with my lawyers and relatives, and consult the documents which will not be easily available under the conditions, in which I am detained here. I am not liable for the claim, if proper facilities for contesting it are not allowed to me, I am afraid, a big sum of Rs 14000 along with costs and interest will be decreed against me. I therefore request as follows.

- a) To permit me to see my lawyer and relatives and give them necessary instructions for my defence.
- b) To permit me to correspond with lawyers and relatives in connection with case and also all papers and documents connected with the case.
- c) And in the meantime to request to the High Court to postpone for a temporary period of 15 days, for the reasons referred to in the above paragraphs so as to enable me to adequately prepare my defence and thus to save me from the risk. I am quite prepared to give the necessary security for the parole.

I have the honour to be,
Sir

Yours obediently,

P.M. Audikesavalu Naicker.^{*}

23 Official Notings on interrogation methods (14.4.1943–25.4.43) (extracts)

File No. 44/2/43 – Home Poll (I)

[NAI]

In our letter No. 44/2/43 political (I) dated February the 13th¹ we left it to Provincial Governments to decide the question whether person detained under Defence Rule 129 should be left in police custody for purposes of interrogation and, if so, for what periods. Since then H.E. the Governor of the Punjab has drawn attention to the valuable results secured by police interrogations conducted by a qualified and expert staff in that Province and has suggested that more use might be made of these methods in other Provinces. I have had some discussion with H.M. and think we might send a further communication to provincial Governments, other than the Punjab, in continuation of our letter of February the 13th. We do not wish to encourage the extortion of information from persons detained under Defence Rule 129 by dubious methods, but I think we could suggest that the interrogation of such persons by a properly qualified staff may be regarded as a normal procedure when persons are detained on suspicion, if only to confirm the grounds for that suspicion. Apart from this judicious examination of important persons so detained may often result in the acquisition of valuable information provided that it is conducted by trained officers on reasonable lines. We might, therefore, enquire what the practice in each province is, whether they do possess special staffs for the purpose and, if not, whether they would consider the possibility of bringing such a staff into existence. I imagine that the personnel of such staffs would need very careful selection and considerable training and experience would be required, not only in the methods of interrogation but also in the selection of persons to be interrogated, before satisfactory results can be expected. A draft might be prepared on these lines and D.I.B. might be consulted on the subject generally and also on the point whether a suitable memorandum could be prepared on the correct methods of interrogation or whether it would be possible to arrange for other provinces to depute police officers of their own to receive instruction from the Punjab.

A draft is put up.² D.I.B. should see with reference to the last sentence in Ad. Sec's note of 14.4.43. If the replies to the queries in that sentence are in the affirmative we could perhaps add the information in the draft.

We have no memorandum suitable for Home Department's purposes and it is doubtful if one exists. G.S. Branch issued some instructions on the subject of interrogation to Forward Examination Centres and this case was held up while the relevant G.S. Branch papers were obtained and examined. They have not been found to be suitable for Home Department's requirements.

The fact of the matter is that interrogation is not a new method in police work and there is little doubt that most police organizations such as C.I.D.'s would be offended if it was suggested or, even implied, that they did not know how to do their job. Their offence would decrease and probably vanish altogether if a treatise on the subject was made available to them which they accepted as being of real value. It is difficult, however, to think of anyone who is capable of compiling such a work. It is true that some police officers are far more expert than others in making suspects tell the truth against their inclinations. Their power in this respect is derived from a knowledge of human nature resulting from years of police experience which enables them to pitch unerringly on the weak spots in the subjects' armour. It is doubtful, however, if even the best interrogators would be able to put much on paper which would be of vast assistance to others who have not their own knack.

Although in recent years the best interrogation result have been obtained by the Punjab C.I.D. other Provinces, e.g. Bengal and the United Provinces, also derive benefit from the same procedure. For this reason, and also because Punjab methods are (unjustly we think) criticised in certain quarters, it might be advisable not to hold the Punjab up as an example. If all the provinces will make an honest effort to make interrogation undoubtedly can be, it is within the competence of them all to attain success.

AIR, Vol. 30, 1943, Patna, pp. 245–78

Criminal Revns. Applns. Nos 654, 662, 663, 770, 785, 786, 669, 717, 664, 666, 655, 715, 716, 701, 670, 718, 752, 802, 707 and 1942 and 73, 72 and 71 of 1943, Decided on 20th April 1943.

Meredith J. — I propose to deal with these applications in the order in which they have been argued. In the interests of brevity, and in view of the fact that so much has been already said in other decisions of this and other High Courts, I assume a knowledge of the terms of the Ordinance, its amendments, and the circumstances of its promulgation.

I take first a batch of cases, Criminal Revisions Nos 654, 662, 663 and 770 of 1942, which all arise out of the same decision of Mr N. Huda, Special Magistrate, who is also Sub-divisional Magistrate of Samastipur in the Darbhanga district. These applications have been argued upon different points by Mr Manuk and Mr S.C. Chakraverty.

The first point argued by Mr Manuk is one which has already been dealt with by a Division Bench of which I was a member. The present petitioners were arrested by the police on 3rd September 1942, under R. 132, Defence of India Rules, and sent in custody to the Sub-divisional Officer, who remanded them to hajat (police lock-up — ed.) up to 17th September. (On the 17th the police report had not been received, and the Magistrate postponed the case to the 25th, asking the investigating officer to produce the prosecution witnesses on the date fixed. Similar orders were passed on 25th and 28th September and on 3rd October. On 5th October, the Magistrate recorded this order:

Police report received. The case is ready. To my file. Two prosecution witnesses present. Examined and cross-examined two prosecution witnesses. Charge framed. Tomorrow for defence.

Next day he examined the accused and some defence witnesses, and on the 7th he delivered his judgment, convicting the accused persons under R.56 (4), Defence of India Rules, and sentencing them to rigorous imprisonment for two years and a fine of Rs 500 each. The orders on the order-sheet up to and including the order of 3rd October were signed 'N. Huda' over the initials 'S.D.O.' From 5th October onwards the orders were simply signed 'N. Huda, Special Magistrate.'

Special Magistrates are constituted under S.9 of the Ordinance. The Ordinance came into force in Bihar on 21st August and the order of Government constituting Mr Huda, amongst others, Special Magistrate was made on 22nd August.

[Omitted: Meredith's judgment on 7 Criminal Revision appeals where the appeals are rejected. Many points of Criminal procedure connected with the jurisdiction of Special Magistrates are discussed — Ed.]

The next case (Criminal Revision No. 72 of 1943) comes from the Bihar Sub-division of the Patna District. On 24th September a charge sheet was received against the petitioners, whereupon the Sub-divisional Officer passed an order: 'To Second Officer for disposal as Special Magistrate.' The latter tried, and on 2nd October convicted the petitioner under S.395, Penal Code, and imposed sentences of six or four years' rigorous imprisonment. In this case there are two orders under S.10, which must be considered. On 23rd August, before the charge sheet was received, Mr Archer, the District Magistrate, had authorized all Special Magistrates in the district of Patna to try certain specified offences; but the offence under S.395 of the Code does not figure in the list. It is conceded, therefore, by the learned Advocate General that this order could not confer jurisdiction upon the Special Magistrate to convict the petitioners in the manner he did.

On 27th August, however, there was a second order in these terms:

In exercise of the powers conferred on me by Notification No. 395 - C (P), dated 22nd August 1942, I hereby direct that all offences not punishable under the Indian Penal Code with death and which in the event of their resulting in a conviction, a sentence of not more than seven years' rigorous imprisonment will meet the ends of justice, shall be tried by Special Magistrates. (2) Offences punishable under the Indian Penal Code with death or which in the event of their resulting in a conviction, a sentence of more than seven years' rigorous imprisonment will be necessary for the ends of justice, shall be referred to me by the Sub divisional Officers for orders.

It is argued by Mr N C Ghosh for the petitioners that this order was so defective that it could confer no jurisdiction upon the Special Magistrates. The order is certainly a very badly drafted one. Apart from anything else, it ignores the fact that in many cases it might be impossible for the Special Magistrate to decide whether a sentence of seven years' imprisonment would meet the ends of justice until he had heard all the evidence. In other words, the Special Magistrate might well have to try the case before he could decide whether or not he had jurisdiction to try it.

There is, however, an even more serious defect. The order makes the Special Magistrates themselves judges of their own jurisdiction. It leaves them to decide in each case whether they have jurisdiction to try. This amounts to no less than a delegation to the Magistrates themselves of the power of passing the necessary order under S.10. This as I have already indicated, the District Magistrate had no power to do. It must be held therefore, that every Special Magistrate purporting to assume jurisdiction and try a case under this order really did so without any valid order under S.10 by the District Magistrate. This being so, the conviction of the petitioners by the Special Magistrate was without jurisdiction. It is quite true that in this particular instance it was the Sub-divisional Officer who actually selected the case for trial by a Special Magistrate, and directed the Second Officer to try it as such. That however, makes the position worse, not better. I would accordingly allow this application, make the rule absolute, and under S.491 direct that the petitioners must forthwith be released or brought to trial in accordance with law.

I now come to a batch of cases argued by Mr M.N. Pal, namely, Criminal Revisions Nos 670, 718, 752 and 802 of 1942 and 71 of 1943.

[Omitted: Review of these six cases, only one of which succeed - Ed.]

For convenience of reference I now summarize the decision of the Court.

Out of the 23 applications before us the following are successful:

Numbers 669, 701, 707, 753 of 1942, 71, 72 of 1943, while the remainder, namely the following, fail: of 1942 Nos 654, 655, 662, 663, 664, 666, 670, 715, 716, 717, 718, 752, 770, 785, 786, 802; of 1943 No. 73.

Fazl Ali C.J. — These are a number of applications arising out of convictions by Special Magistrates constituted under Ordinance 2 of 1942. Owing to the number of such applications that are coming before the Court and the fact that many points keep arising over and over again, I thought it desirable that there should be, so far as this Court is concerned, an authoritative decision once and for all upon the important points common to many such application. I have, therefore, constituted this Special Bench. The applications though argued by various lawyers, have been heard continuously. As I have already indicated, the same points are common to many of them, and it is, therefore, in my opinion, the most convenient course to deal with all of them in the same judgment. Owing to the fact that this must inevitably involve a somewhat lengthy order and the fact that so much has already been said about this Ordinance and the points arising in connexion with it, in various Indian High Courts, I desire to be as brief as possible consistently with dealing adequately with the principal points which have been urged.

I take first a batch of cases, Criminal Revisions Nos 654, 662, 663 and 770 of 1942, which all arise out of the same decision of Mr N. Huda, Special Magistrate, who is also Sub-divisional Officer of Samastipur in the Darbhanga district. The petitioners in these cases have been convicted for having committed an offence under R. 56 (4) of the Defence of India Rules and sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for two years and to pay a fine of Rs 500 each. They preferred an appeal before the Special Judge of Darbhanga, but the learned judge held that the appeal was not maintainable. They have now applied to this Court in revision and they also pray in the alternative for an order directing their release under S.491, Criminal P.C. on the ground that their trial by the Special Magistrate was without jurisdiction and their detention in prison is illegal and unwarranted by law.

[Omitted: Arguments rejecting defence plea that the Special Magistrate had no jurisdiction to try these specific cases, and another plea that Ordinance 2 was ultra vires of the Govt. of India Act 1935 -- Ed.]

Criminal Revision Nos 701, 707 and 755.

The petitioners in Criminal Revision No. 701 were sent up by the police under custody to Mr Hoda, the Sub-divisional Magistrate under the Ordinance, on 27th September 1942. On 28th September the learned Magistrate noted in the order sheet: 'to my file' and proceeded with the trial and on the same day he convicted the petitioners under S.56 (4), Defence of India Rules, and sentenced them to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 18 months and to pay a fine of Rs 200 each. The petitioner Pasupati Tewari in Criminal Revision No. 707 was sent up by the police on 9th September 1942 and on 10th September 1942 Mr Hoda made the following note in the order sheet.

To My file. I will try the case as special Magistrate. Five prosecution witnesses present. Examined in chief five prosecution witnesses. Charge under R. 56 (4) D.I. Rules, framed against the accused who pleads not guilty. Cross-examined P.Ws. and discharged them. Examined the accused. The accused had filed petition stating that adjournment be given for adducing defence. I am not satisfied from the petition that it is necessary in interest of justice and hence disallowed. Judgment delivered. Accused convicted and sentenced to R.I. for two years and a fine of Rs 250 in default R.I. for one year under R. 56, D.I. Rules.

The petitioners in Criminal Revision No. 753 were sent up before Mr Hoda, Sub-divisional Officer of Samastipur on 15th September and the learned Magistrate convicted them on 16th September 1942 under S.56 (4), Defence of India Rules, and sentenced them to two years rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 300 each.

The common feature of these cases is that in all of them Mr Hoda tried the accused persons as a Special Magistrate and in each case the trial was concluded before 4th October. The point raised in all these cases is that Mr Hoda had no jurisdiction to try the petitioners as a Special Magistrate, inasmuch as the District Magistrate of Darbhanga issued no order under S 10 of the Ordinance until 4th October 1942. It appears that several orders were issued by the District Magistrate of Darbhanga relating to the Ordinance and one of the orders which was issued on 31st August was in these terms:

Mr S.W. Bilgrami, Mr H.C. Chakravarty, Deputy Magistrates, will act as Special Magistrates under the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, for all cases in the Sadar Sub-division of this district. All cases will be made over to Mr Bilgrami, who will make over such cases as he may consider necessary to Mr Chakravarty for disposal.

The Sub-divisional Officers of Samastipur and Madhubani will act as Special Magistrates under the Act, within their respective jurisdiction. Mr Muhammad Usman, Deputy Magistrate, will try such cases under the Ordinance as may be made over to him by the Sub-divisional Officer of Samastipur. Babu Rajeshwari Prasad Varma and Babu Ramtahal Sinha, Sub Deputy Magistrates, will act as Summary Courts under Ordinance in respect of such cases as may be made over to them for disposal by their respective Sub divisional Officers.

We are concerned here with the second part of the order which has been underlined (here italicized). The next order was issued on 4th October and runs as follows:

Whereas under Ordinance 2 of 1942 the Government of Bihar in exercise of their power under S.4 of the said Ordinance have appointed a Special Judge for the district of Darbhanga, and where under S.9 of the said Ordinance the said Government have invested certain Magistrates in this district with powers of a Special Magistrate to try offences or classes of offences or such cases or class of cases the Provincial Government or a servant the Crown empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf, may, in general or special or in writing direct I.R.N. Lnes, I.C.S. District Magistrate of Darbhanga, in exercise of the power conferred on me as a servant of the Crown that Ss. 5 and 10 of the said Ordinance do hereby by general order direct as follows. (a) All offences mentioned in Sch. (A) to this order will be tried by the Special Judge of this district (b) All offences mentioned in Sch. (B) to this order will be tried by the Special Magistrates in this district.

It should also further be noted that the Special Magistrates shall try the offences mentioned in Sch. (B) committed in the jurisdiction of the sub-division where they are ordinarily posted, unless otherwise directed by me by an order in writing.

Then follow two long schedules: Schedule (A) is headed 'Offences triable by a Special Judge' and contains five clauses which set out specifically the offences which were intended to be tried by the Special Judges. Schedule (B) is headed 'Offences triable by Special Magistrate' and contains four clauses which also set out with great precision the offences intended to be tried by the Special Magistrates. The question which arises in these cases is whether the order issued by the District Magistrate on 31st August can be treated as an order under S.10 giving jurisdiction to Mr Hoda, one of the Special Magistrates, to hold trials of any and every offence under the Ordinance. It appears that a Bench of this Court of which my brother Meredith was a member has held that inasmuch as the District Magistrate had to act in great haste and under great stress the order of 31st August though it was undoubtedly a defective order may be construed to be an order under S.10: see Criminal Revn. No. 20 of 1943. The contention put forward on behalf of the petitioners on the other hand is that this order cannot be construed to be an order under S.10, because it does not specify what offences or classes of offences or cases or classes of cases were to be tried by the Special Magistrates. It is said that this order was merely an order which was preliminary to or a precursor of the subsequent order of 4th October which was in every sense an order S.10. The order in question, it is said, merely defined the jurisdiction of the various Magistrates within the Sadar and the Samastipur and Madhubani sub-divisions of the district and these Magistrates had evidently to await further orders which were to be issued after it had been decided by the District Magistrate as to what class of cases or offences should be tried by them under the Ordinance.

It is urged that unless this view was taken one would be forced to the conclusion that the District Magistrate intended that every kind of offence including even the offences which were wholly unconnected with the disturbances such as adultery, criminal mis-appropriation, etc., should also be tried by Special Magistrates; but if that was the intention it could have been clearly expressed by stating in so many words in the order that all offences under the Penal Code and other laws were to be tried by the officers nominated in that order. In my opinion, the contention put forward on behalf of the petitioner is a serious one and cannot be lightly brushed aside. The order of 31st August could not have been intended to mean that all criminal cases without any exception were to be tried by the Special Magistrates under the Ordinance firstly because the language of the order and especially used in the second part of it which relates to Samastipur sub division is inept and not quite clear and secondly because S.10 clearly implies that offences punishable with death cannot be tried by Special Magistrates. There is no such exception made in this order, and if the interpretation which is sought to be put on it is correct, then we must hold that the District Magistrate had directed the Special Magistrates to try even offences punishable with death. I do not, however, see any justification for putting such a construction upon the order as would constrain us to hold that the District Magistrate had directed something which he had no power to direct and that he had acted without due care. In the order of 4th October, it is definitely stated that it was issued by the District Magistrate under Ss. 5 and 10 by virtue of the power vested in him by the Government of Bihar under S.9 of the Ordinance and a list of offences was also given. If the order of 31st August was intended to be an order under S.10, then there should have been something in the order of 4th October to show that the previous order had been superseded and that the Magistrates concerned were no longer competent to try all cases but only offences mentioned in the later order. This view is confirmed by another order which was issued by the District Magistrate on 26th October and which runs as follows:

I, R.N. Lines, I.C.S., District Magistrate of Darbhanga, in exercise of the powers conferred on me as a servant of the Crown, under Ss. 5 and 10 of Ordinance No. 2 of 1942 promulgated by the Government of Bihar hereby direct that the following amendment shall be made in my order dated 4th October 1942. . . .

If the order of 4th October was intended to amend the order of 31st August, one would have expected some such words as those underlined (italicized) to have been used in that order also, but no such words are to be found there. However that may be, even apart from these subsequent orders it seems to me that the order of 31st August which is conceded to be a very defective order and which has to be construed on its own terms cannot be construed to be an order under S.10. It is suggested that the order was drawn up in an imperfect form, because the District Magistrate had to act in haste and under great stress, but we have looked at the orders passed by the District Magistrates of a number of other districts such as Manbhum, Monghyr, Bhagalpur, Ranchi, Motihari, Palamau, Saran, etc., who had to act under similar circumstances and in all these orders we find a complete classification of the offences which were made triable by the Special Magistrates. A comparison of these orders with the order issued by the learned District Magistrate of Darbhanga on 4th October does lend support to the argument that the order which was really intended by him to be an order under S.10 was issued on 4th October. Upon this law I am constrained to hold that Mr Hoda had no jurisdiction to try the offences committed by the petitioners as a Special Magistrate because, on the date he tried the offences, he had not been empowered to try them by an order under S.10. I accordingly direct under S.491, Criminal P.C., that the petitioners should be released at once or brought to trial in accordance with law.

Criminal Revisions Nos 71, 670, 718, 752 and 802.

The facts of these cases are fully set out in the judgment of my brother Meredith and I entirely agree with the order proposed by him in the individual cases of this group.

[Omitted. A long discussion on whether the Patna High Court had the power to issue a writ of certiorari -- Ed.]

As to the other matters arising in these cases I am of the same opinion as my brother Meredith and I agree with the order which he proposes to make in regard to them in his judgment.

Criminal Revisions Nos 785, 786, 669, 717, 664, 666, 655, 715, 716, 72: So far as these revisions are concerned I agree with the conclusions of my brother Meredith as well as with the orders proposed by him.

Manohar Lall J. — I have the advantage of seeing in advance the judgments prepared by my lord the Chief Justice and by Meredith J. As I agree entirely with the reasonings and the conclusions of the judgment of my lord Chief Justice, and also in view of the great length to which these two judgments have already reached, I think it is undesirable that I should pronounce a judgment of my own which may, owing to the necessity of dealing fully with the numerous points raised, occupy an equally large space. But I would like to make two observations only. The first is that in my opinion it is unnecessary to decide whether this High Court has power to issue a writ of certiorari because as shown by my lord the Chief Justice even if we have the power this power has been taken away by S.26 of the Ordinance under consideration. The second observation I wish to make is that in the cases where we have held that the trial was without jurisdiction the accused should be released forthwith unless the authorities, after taking into consideration the nature of the offence said to have been committed by a particular accused and the nature of the evidence adduced by the prosecution, think it desirable that this accused should still be put upon trial before a Special Magistrate with jurisdiction.

[NAI]

Extracts from the Minutes of the Nagpur Security Conference

Item 13 (c) - Security Prisoners

The Bengal representative raised the question of security prisoners of one province being permitted to correspond with those of another. In the Punjab such correspondence is not allowed while in Orissa, Madras and the Central Provinces correspondence is only permitted between families, and only on matters of a domestic nature. A reference was also made to the allowances of security prisoners, with particular reference to the permission given to them in some provinces to pool these allowances for common interests.

The conference expressed the opinion that the practice of allowing security prisoners to correspond with each other was dangerous and recommended that where necessary the rule governing the custody of such prisoners should be amended to include the prohibition considered necessary. The conference also wished the opinion to be recorded that it was unwise to permit any collective use of money or to allow expenditure on anything except within the category of immediate legitimate personal requirements.

Correspondence with S.P's in the provinces is permitted under the central Govt. S.P's order. Please see our letter of 16.4.42¹ on this point. This question should not perhaps be reopened.

[A/ 2. The allowances referred to are apparently the funds which S.P's are permitted to receive from outside sources. The pooling of such funds was agreed to in our memorandum on the treatment of S.P's which was forwarded to P.G's in Jan. 42. As the funds remain in the custody of the Supt. it is not clear how pooling of funds is harmful from the security point of view. Please see note on page 52 in this connection.

3. No further communication was promised to provinces in respect of this item; the representative could perhaps explain to the members of the Conference at the next session the fact that the concessions of correspondence with other S.P's & pooling of funds were agreed to by the G/I after discussion with D.I.B. of Mr Joshi's recommendations and that they cannot very well be withdrawn now. D.I.B. may see.

Signed (illegible)

Policy on which points have been settled some time ago, and the conference has apparently produced no fresh arguments on this subject. It is suggested that no action is necessary at this stage. D.I.B. may see for remarks.

26.4.43.

Would D.I.B. kindly see them (c) of the proceedings of the Nagpur security Conference. . . .

Congress security prisoners are as a rule not allowed correspondence with any body, much less with other security prisoners, unless they be close relation and the subject matter is on an entirely domestic or business nature.

As regards other security prisoners, they would be eligible under our own rules to correspond with each other.

All Correspondence is censored & we shall be obliged for some further information to show what was worrying the conference. What exactly the danger in letting one security prisoner write to another if the correspondence is censored. Is it the fear that the censoring arrangements made in the jails are not adequate and/or are unreliable; have any undesirable leakages occurred on account of correspondence between security prisons.

Regarding the other point made about the collective use of money, is anything further necessary in the light of /A/ the office note.

H D U O No. 44,642 - Poll (I) dated 15/43.

Item 13 (c) was not included in the agenda but was raised at the conference by Mr Ray, the Bengal representative, and Bihar was probably the object of his attack. Mr Ray spoke of misuse of collective funds and probably also of bad censorship which permitted undesirable communications to reach other provinces. It is understood that the feeling of the Conference was that provinces which are in any way lax should apply the necessary correct measures and something in the minutes would give Provincial S.Bs a starting point.

If Home Department wish to have more information as to what Mr Ray had in mind when he raised these questions, we will write to him and find out.

26: Benoari Lal Sarma and others accused (petitioners) v. Emperor [Derbyshire C.J., Khundkar and Sen J.J., Special Bench (21 April 1943)]

AIR, Vol. 30, 1943, Calcutta, pp. 289-318

Criminal Revn. No. 81 of 1943, Decided on 21st April 1943 . . .

E.P. Mayer, S.C. Taluqdar, Joy Gopal Ghose and P.K. Bose — for Petitioners.

Amiruddin Ahmed and Serajuddin Ahmed — for the Crown

Derbyshire C.J. This rule was issued upon the District Magistrate of Jessore to show cause why the conviction of the applicant and 14 other persons should not be set aside. The accused persons are all policemen and, according to the evidence, were directed to secure the person of a fellow policeman who was said to have become mentally deranged and instead of obeying orders they disobeyed them and behaved in a riotous manner. The District Magistrate, acting under powers conferred upon him by the Government of Bengal, directed a Special Magistrate, appointed under ordinance 2 of 1942, to try the case with the result that the Special Magistrate convicted the 15 applicants of offences under Ss.147, 149 and 332, Penal Code, and also under R.38 (1) (a) and (5)/R.34 (6b) (c) of the Defence of India Rules, committing a prejudicial act. He passed no sentence in respect of the offences under the Penal code, but as regards the offences under the Defence of India rules he sentenced all the accused each to two years rigorous imprisonment. The proceedings were taken under Ordinance 2 of 1942, S.26 of which prohibits the interference by this court with either the proceedings or the convictions. However, the convicted persons contend that the ordinance itself is ultra vires the law-making powers of the Governor-General and ask us to hold as such and, thereupon, to exercise our revision jurisdiction and set aside the convictions or, alternatively, to reduce the sentences.

The Magistrate was a First Class Magistrate specially designated as a special Magistrate under the ordinance. The ordinance itself was made on 31st December 1941 and published in the Gazette of India on 2nd January 1942. It recites that whereas an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary to provide for the setting up of special criminal Courts, the Governor General in the exercise of powers conferred upon him by S.72, Government of India Act, 1915, as set out in Sch.9, Government of India Act, 1935, makes and promulgates the ordinance. . . .

[Omitted: Enumeration of different sections of the Ordinance, and narration of the dates when by notification the Ordinance was made operative in Bengal – Ed.]

In the case in question the District Magistrate directed the Special Magistrate to try this case; the effect of this case being tried under the Ordinance is (if the Ordinance is valid and the requirements prescribed by the Ordinance have been complied with) to prevent the convicted persons from appealing to any appellate tribunal, whether in the High Court or elsewhere, and also to prevent the High court exercising its revisional jurisdiction. the contentions of the accused persons are that the Ordinance is invalid in (1) it delegates legislation and (2) that it ousts the jurisdiction of the High court in criminal matters contrary to S.223, Government of India Act, 1935, and (3) that it leaves it to the District Magistrate to say whether the accused shall have the rights of appeal or revision which the ordinary law provides.

The case is an important one and has been argued at great length. . . .

[Omitted: Judgement rejecting the contention that (a) the Government of India could not delegate to Bengal government the power to judge when the Ordinance was to be brought into operation (b) a Governor General's Ordinance could not take away the High Court's revisional jurisdiction over the Magistrate's Courts in Jessore – Ed.]

The third contention of the applicants, and the one which has caused me a great deal of difficulty, is that, although the Governor-General might set up Special Courts and prescribed the class of case to be tried in those Courts, he has not prescribed the classes of offences and cases but has left it to the Provincial Government, on adopting the Ordinance, to prescribe the classes of cases and has even permitted some servant of the Crown, who may be empowered in that behalf by the Provincial Government, to prescribe the classes of cases. It is said that this is delegating legislation, and that there is not power in the Governor-General to delegate legislation in this way. The position is a difficult one for us to deal with because the Special Courts in question do not come within the superintendence of the High Court by virtue of S.26. Circulars and directions have been forwarded by Government to District Magistrates – some marked confidential and some marked secret – with instructions as to how the Special Courts were to be worked; this Court had not received copies of those instructions until many months afterwards – sometimes six months or more. However, from such material as I have been able to gather, the position is as follows: The Ordinance itself was adopted by the Government of Bengal on 3rd April 1942, when by a Gazette Notice No. 3529 P of 3rd April 1942, the Governor was pleased to declare the Ordinance to be in force in the province of Bengal with effect from the date of publication. On the same date by a Gazette Notice No. 3531P certain District Judges in the coastal and border areas were nominated Special Judges under S.4 of the Ordinance. By another Gazette Notice No. 3532P of the same date – 3rd April 1942 – all First Class Magistrates in the same coastal and border areas were, who have exercised powers as such for not less than two years, invested with the powers of special Magistrates under S.2 of the Ordinance and by a further Gazette Notice No. 3534P of the same date there is the following announcement:

In exercise of the powers conferred by S.10, Special Criminal courts Ordinance, 1942 (Ordinance No. 2 of 1942) the Governor is pleased to empower the District Magistrates of the districts of Chittagong, Noakhali, Tippera, Bakerganj, 24-Parganas, Midnapore and Khulna to direct within their respective districts by general or special order in writing which offences or classes of offences or cases or classes of cases other than offences or cases involving the offence punishable by death under the Indian Penal Code shall be tried by a Special Magistrate

By a gazette Notice No. 3535P of 3rd April 1942, the following was provided:

In exercise of the power conferred by S.5 of the Special Courts Ordinance, 1942 (Ordinance 2 of 1942) the Government is pleased to empower the District Magistrates of the districts of Chittagong, Noakhali, Tippera, Bakerganj, 24-Parganas, Midnapore and Khulna, to direct within their respective districts by general or special order in writing which offences or classes of offences or cases or classes of cases under the Indian Penal Code shall be tried by a Special Judge.

On 25th June 1942, by similar Gazette notices (two of which viz. Nos 9578P and 9579P are set out earlier in this judgement) corresponding powers were given to Special Magistrates and district Judges in other areas of the province similar to those set out under Notification No. 3584P and No. 3535P. On or about 26th June 1942 a circular was issued by a Secretary of the Government of Bengal giving instructions as to how the District Magistrates should exercise their powers. Two schedules were sent out with it one of them setting out a list of the offences which might be tried by Special Magistrates and the other a list of offences which might be tried by Special Judges. Those lists are very long and although not identical are nearly so. They are set out as an appendix to this judgment. They comprise a very large number of the offences under the Penal Code, some of which could have nothing to do whatever with the special conditions prevailing in the province, as well as a list of offences under special statutes e.g., the Defence of India Rules and various Police Acts. Other circulars have been sent out since. It is only comparatively recently that copies of these circulars and schedules have been sent to this Court for its information.

It appears that the present case was tried by a Special Magistrate as a result of a specific order to that effect by the District Magistrate. What has happened in other cases this court does not know. I have made enquiries of one District Judge and found that the following procedure has been adopted in that district. The District Magistrate made an order to the effect that 'cases arising out of the recent disturbances shall be tried by Special Magistrates.' Thereupon, cases were brought before Special Magistrates accompanied by a certificate from the police to the effect that the cases arose out of the recent disturbances and thereupon the Special Magistrate dealt with them under the ordinance. This is extremely unsatisfactory from the point of view of the subject. It makes the police the arbiter of a man's rights as to how he shall be tried. Before the ordinance was set up, any person charged with an offence when brought before a court know exactly what class of Court he would be tried in, and what rights he had if the Court made an error in procedure or in the determination of the facts or in the law applicable to the case. As far as he was concerned, the law and his rights under it were certain. Under the ordinance a man may be brought before a Magistrate charged with an offence and it is left to the District Magistrate to say whether that man should be tried by the ordinary courts and have the ordinary rights of appeal and revision under the Criminal Procedure Code and the High Court's powers under its Letters Patent or whether he should be tried by a Magistrate sitting as a Special Magistrate with very limited rights of appeal and no right as to revision. The man's rights as regards appeal and revision are not predetermined by law but are left to the discretion or order of the District Magistrate and, in some cases, practically to the discretion of the police.

Although the ordinary criminal Courts at all material times since 3rd April 1942 have and still do function and although the Criminal Procedure Code has not been repealed and although the substantive criminal law stands as it did before the Ordinance, there are now two sets of Courts, the ordinary criminal Courts and the Special Criminal Courts working side by side and no man knows which Court he may be tried in—that is left to the District Magistrate nominally to decide: in fact it might be decided by the police. As I have said previously I am of the opinion that in a grave emergency like the present it is competent for the Governor-General to set up temporary Special Criminal courts, and for similar reasons I am of the opinion that it is competent for the Governor General in the emergency to prescribe the offences and persons that should be tried in those Special Courts even to the ouster of the ordinary Courts. That follows from the legislative powers that the Governor General has under S.72, Government of India Act, 1915, and S.102 of the Act of 1935. However, that is not what the ordinance has done. It has first left it to the Provincial Government to set up the Special Courts authorized in the ordinance where it thought fit; I think that is a proper exercise of the Governor-General's powers: it is not delegating legislation. Nothing more needed to be done but for the Provincial Government to bring the ordinance into operation and appoint Magistrates and Judges. That is conditional legislation within the decision in (1878) 3 A.C. S.89. So far as at present advised, I think that is valid.

The ordinance, however, leaves it to the Local Government or to some officer of the Local Government empowered by the Local Government in that behalf to direct in writing what offences or classes of offences and, moreover, what cases or classes of cases—a different matter—shall be tried by the Special Courts. The Code of Criminal Procedure still stands as a whole and is operative in the ordinary criminal Courts every day; in it are certain provisions which prescribe how certain offences shall be tried and what rights of appeal the convicted person has. For instance, an offence may be committed under S.304, Penal Code—culpable homicide which is less than murder. Schedule 2 of the code prescribes that cases under S.304, Penal Code, shall be tried by a court of Session which may be a High Court or an ordinary Court of Session. Section 267 of the Code provides that all trials under chap. 29 (which deals with trials before High court shall be by a jury. Section 268 provides that all trials before a Court of Session shall be tried by jury or with the aid of assessors. Those two sections give definite rights to the subject and they are not repealed by the ordinance. Again, S.275 of the Code prescribes that in a trial by jury in a Court of Session a person not being a European or an American the majority of the jury shall, if the person so desires, consist of persons who are neither Europeans nor Americans. Again, S.276 (1) enacts that in a trial by a jury in a High Court or in a Court of Session a European or American accused may if he so requires be tried by a jury of Europeans or Americans.

There is nothing in the ordinance directly or indirectly repealing those provisions and they stand as part of the statute law of the land. Trial by jury continues in this province today. However, under the ordinance, the Local Government or a servant of the Crown empowered in that behalf by the Local Government may at any time by general or special order in writing direct a person charged under S.304 to be tried either by a Special Judge or a Special Magistrate, if that happens the Government of Bengal acting in its administrative capacity or a servant of the Crown again acting in an administrative capacity is taking away the rights of the subject under the code of Criminal Procedure to be tried by a jury-an Indian by Indians, a European or an American by Europeans or Americans. If such direction is valid, it amounts to a repeal in that instance of one or more of the sections of the Code of Criminal Procedure I have mentioned. That is legislation or it is invalid.

There are many offences in the Penal Code which are by sch.2, Cr. P.C. triable only by Courts of Session or in the High Courts and a similar position as under S.304, Penal Code, will arise in many of them. Those are, in my view, particular and the more striking and obvious instances of the more general position. The Penal Code is a statute which declares that certain acts and omissions are offences against the State; it declares the obligations of the subject towards the State with the respective penalties for breach thereof. The Criminal Procedure code prescribes how the breaches of those obligations shall be ascertained in the Courts and in so doing gives to the subject certain rights secured by that statute which subsist for the protection of the subject until they are taken away by the proper legislative authority. Some of the most important of those rights (in addition to trial by jury) are the right of appeal and the right of revision by superior Courts including the High Courts.

In the Special Courts which are temporary and established to meet the grave emergency, the rights of the subject are heavily cut down in the interests of the security of the State. The subject who commits a crime is not, however, ipso facto or by the Ordinance itself brought within the jurisdiction of the Special Courts. Two men may commit the same kind of offence in the same district; one may be tried in the ordinary Courts and have the ordinary rights of appeal and revision if convicted; the other may be ordered by written direction of the Provincial Government or the District Magistrate, whose discretion is absolute and decision final (S.14), to be tried by the same Magistrate or Judge in the special Courts and have no or little rights of appeal or revision under the code of Criminal Procedure. In effect it is Provincial Government or the District Magistrate acting not in a judicial capacity but in an administrative capacity, that deprives the subject of his right under the Code and repeals its valued provisions as far as he is concerned. That, in my view, is repealing the code of Criminal procedure in part in that instance legislation ad hoc for the man's case.

Under the Government of India Act, the Provincial Government may legislate by or through an Act passed by both Houses and assented to by the Governor or in the proper case by a Governor's Act or Ordinance (see Ss. 88, 89 and 90, Government of India Act), but as far as I am aware in no other way. A servant of the Crown not being the Governor-General or the Provincial Governor has no authority at all to legislate unless he is specially empowered in a limited manner to do so by some Act of the Legislature, as for instance in the making of a rule under a statute. This rule-making power originates and derives from the practice in Parliament where in modern times, especially in war time, it is extensively used. Presumably, Parliament intended the Central Indian Legislature to have the same powers for they are frequently exercised. It may be that Parliament has intended the Provincial Legislature to have the same powers. No question here arises to the exercise of those rule-making powers. When such rules are made they are laid before the Legislature and/or published so that all concerned may know them, and all concerned affected alike. Whether the Governor-General has the power to delegate legislation by rule-making is another matter. Section 72, Government of India Act, 1915, provides that the Governor-General may make Ordinances and 'any Ordinances so made shall . . . have the like force of law as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature'. It does not provide that rules made under each Ordinance shall have the like force as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature. Any practical difficulty can be surmounted by the Governor-General enacting the rules as an Ordinance after they are made. That, and the fact that the Governor-General's Ordinance is not a thing of the same derivation and kind (although it may have the like force of law) is an argument against the power to make rules under an Ordinance. Be that as it may, no such rules support to have been authorized or have indeed been made under the Ordinance. If they had, they would have been published to all concerned, and have been the same for all concerned. This is a case of delegation of authority to be used ad hoc. I see no authority in S.72 for that; the power to legislate belongs to the Governor-General. This conclusion is borne out by another consideration. The Secretary of State, under S.13, Government of India Act, 1935, issued the instrument of Instructions to the Governor-General. Section 13 (2) provides that the validity of anything done by the Governor-General shall not be called in question on the ground that it was done otherwise than in accordance with any Instrument of Instructions issued to him.

The Instrument of Instructions is public, and from it, it is apparent that by Para 27

"Our Governor-General shall not assent in Our name to but reserve for the signification of Our pleasure, any Bill of any of the classes specified, that is to say, (b) any Bill which in his opinion, would, if it became law, so derogate from the powers of the High Court of any province as to endanger the position which these courts are by the said Act (Government of India Act, 1935) designed to fill."

The Ordinance in question is not an Act which began as a Bill: it is emergency legislation; so that it may well be that Para 27 of the Instrument does not apply to it. The Instrument of Instructions does, however, show that the position of the High Courts is one of special interest to the Crown and one where the Governor-General's powers with regard to it are not to be exercised without special consideration. Can it be supposed that in making an Ordinance which affects the High Courts, the Governor-General can, in the absence of clear authority, delegate his powers to others to exercise? Such a consideration supports the view that at any rate where the jurisdiction of the High Courts is concerned, delegation of the Governor-General's powers, not being expressly permitted, cannot be implied. The same considerations are relevant as regards a Governor's Ordinance. The delegation of power to the Local Government or an officer of the Crown to direct which offences or classes of offences or cases or classes of cases shall be tried by the Special Courts results in a curious position where the High Court in Calcutta is concerned. The High Court was constituted not under any Government of India Act but by the grant of Letters Patent by the Crown under the High Courts Act of 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. Cap. 104). This statute-S.9-continued the criminal jurisdiction that the Supreme Court had in Calcutta. The Letters Patent-CI.15-provides that:

The High court shall have original criminal jurisdiction within the local limits of the ordinary original civil jurisdiction and also in respect of all such persons both within the limits of the Bengal Division of the Presidency of Fort William and beyond such limits (as are therein set out).

This means that the High Court has original criminal jurisdiction over all persons in the area bounded by the Circular Road and the west bank of the river Hooghly. At present the High court holds its sessions five times a year in this court and tries with a jury persons who commit serious crimes within its jurisdiction. Under the Ordinance an officer of the Bengal Government in the Secretariat or the Chief Presidency Magistrate (who is normally subject to the High court's jurisdiction) can by an order in writing order any offence alleged to have been committed within or a criminal case arising within the area bounded by the Circular Road and the river Hooghly he pleases, to be tried by a Special Magistrate or a Special Judge, whether the offence arises out of the emergency or not, in ouster of the Court's jurisdiction given to it under the High Courts Act of 1861 and the Letters Patent granted by the Crown, and so set aside the provisions of clause 15. Clause 44, Letters Patent, provides that the Letters Patent are subject to the legislative powers of the Governor-General in Council and also of the Governor-General in council under S.71, Government of India Act, 1915, and also of the Governor-General in cases of emergency under S.72 of that Act and may be in all respects amended and altered thereby.

By Cl.44 the Governor-General may, in an emergency take away the High Court's original criminal jurisdiction; but no one else is so authorized, and there is nothing in the wording of Cl.44 to suggest in any way that such powers might be delegated to someone else. In Bengal there has been double delegation — once by the Governor-General to the Government of Bengal and then by the Government of Bengal to the District or Presidency Magistrates. There is no restriction in the Ordinance or in the Gazette notices of 3rd April or 25th June as to the offences or cases triable under the Ordinance. Accordingly, if the Ordinance is valid each District Magistrate and the Chief Presidency Magistrate may direct, if they so desire, all cases in their several districts to be tried by Special Magistrates or Special Judges with the result that except within the very narrow limits permitted by the Ordinance the jurisdiction of the High Court both in Calcutta and throughout the province may be out set for the time being in criminal matters — a very serious matter both from the point of view of the subject and the Court.

If the Ordinance itself had directed such ouster of jurisdiction, it would have been apparent on the face of it, and the Governor-General would have known that this was taking place, as would the court and the public. The Governor-General might then well have considered whether it was a matter which came within the spirit of the directions in Art. 27 of the Instrument of Instructions. The present position may result in an indefinite ouster of jurisdiction of the High Court, and an indefinite ouster of the subject's rights without either the Governor-General or the court or the public being aware of the extent of it. The effect upon the administration of justice may be grave. It has already given the Court a great deal of anxiety and has given rise to serious complaints being made in the Bengal Assembly as to the use of this Ordinance. In the original instructions sent out by an officer of the Government of Bengal on 26th June 1942 (which the Court was not apprised of until January 1943), this ouster was made possible over a very large section of the criminal law. Since this present case has been started the Court has received another circular from the Government of Bengal which intimates that District Magistrates are instructed to use the Ordinance only in cases of hoarding and profiteering. From the public point of view, that is undoubtedly a step in the right direction although it may be retraced at any time; but it leaves the High Court without any control over profiteering and hoarding offences. It is notorious that proceedings in respect of profiteering have been relatively few and the sentences imposed have been very light. There is no judicial or other authority at present to revise these sentences and enhance them.

The Ordinance is of course an emergency measure of limited duration, but it is difficult to say that because of that the power of ouster of jurisdiction should be delegated in the way it has been. It is possible, if the advice of those with special knowledge and experience in the administration of the criminal law is sought, to effect in the ordinary Courts the same purpose, viz., the swift, stern and even-handed punishment of serious offences against the State in an emergency, by a relatively small alteration of the Criminal Procedure Code and other Acts. I have come to the conclusion for the reasons I have given that as the Ordinance in Ss.5, 10, 14 and 16 empowers persons other than duly authorized Legislatures constituted under the Government of India Act, 1935 to repeal ad hoc certain provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code and of the Letters Patent of the High Court, it is so far invalid. I am therefore of the opinion that the trial of the applicants which has been by a Special Magistrate under the direction of the District Magistrate, acting in pursuance of S.10 of the Ordinance and the authority delegated to him by the Provincial Government, is void. In my opinion, this conviction should be set aside and the applicants released, re-arrested and tried in the ordinary courts according to the ordinary process of law.

[Omitted: Schedule of cases triable by a Special Magistrate and Schedule of cases triable by a Special Judge — also omitted is Justice Khundkar's views — Ed.]

Sen J. — The petitioners have been convicted of having committed various offences punishable under the Penal code and the rules framed under the Defence of India Act and sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for a period of two years. The trial was held in accordance with the provisions of ordinance 2 of 1942 by a Special Magistrate appointed under that ordinance. Against this order of conviction they moved this Court and obtained this rule. The only question argued was that Ordinance 2 of 1942 was 'ultra vires' of the Governor-General to make. We did not enter into the merits of the case for obvious reasons. If the ordinance is ultra vires it is not necessary to consider the merits; the convictions and sentences must be set aside, whatever the merits of the case may be, as the Court trying the petitioners was no Court at all. If the ordinance is 'intra vires' we are debarred by S.26 of the Ordinance from interfering with the decision of the Special Magistrate. I shall now deal with the only question raised before us. The contention of Mr Meyer for the petitioners is that Ordinance 2 of 1942 is 'ultra vires' of the Governor-General to make and he relies upon two broad grounds for this view. They may be stated thus: (1) Although the Government of India Act of 1935 has given the Governor-General the power to make ordinances in case of emergency, the Governor-General has no power by such ordinance to affect the jurisdiction of the High court of the law administered therein, nor may he by ordinance alter or affect the powers of the Judges of a High Court in relation to the administration of justice in the court. (2) Even if he has such powers, ordinance 2 of 1942 is nevertheless 'ultra vires' and invalid by reason of certain provisions therein contained. In other words, he argues that the Ordinance contains within itself the elements which destroy its validity.

I shall now deal with the first ground. Mr Meyer's argument as I understand it may briefly be summarized thus. Section 110 (b) (ii), Government of India Act of 1935, says that nothing in the Act shall be taken to empower the Federal Legislature or any Provincial Legislature to make any law amending any provision of the Act except in so far as is expressly permitted by a provision of the Government of India Act of 1935 Section 223. Government of India Act 11935 lays it down that the jurisdiction and powers of the High Court as it existed immediately before the commencement of Part 3 of the Government of India Act of 1935, shall be maintained subject to the provisions of any Order in Council or of any Act of the appropriate Legislature enacted by virtue of powers conferred on that Legislature by the Government of India Act of 1935. It is thus clear that express permission is given by S.223 to the appropriate Legislature to legislate with respect to the jurisdiction and powers of the High Court by virtue of the powers conferred on that Legislature by the Government of India Act. The Governor-General in case of emergency is empowered by S.72 of Sch.9, Government of India Act of 1935 to make and promulgate ordinances having the force of a law passed by the Indian Legislature. This, however, does not mean that the Governor-General can pass Ordinances affecting the jurisdiction and powers of the High Court. The ordinance has the like force of a law passed by the Indian Legislature, but it is not an Act of the Indian Legislature and S.223 refers only to an Act of the appropriate Legislature. Further sec. 110 (b) (ii) requires an express permission to be given to the Legislature to amend any provision of the Government of India, Act. While S.223 gives an express permission to the Indian Legislature to enact laws in respect of the jurisdiction and powers of the High Court, no such express permission is given to the Governor-General when he is vested with the power to make ordinances having the force of law. That being so, there is no power in the Governor General to take away any portion of the jurisdiction of this court by an Ordinance. The answer to this argument is, in my opinion, to be found in S.311 (6), Government of India Act of 1935. That section runs as follows:

Any reference in this Act to Federal Acts or laws or Provincial Acts or laws, or to Acts or laws of the Federal or a Provincial Legislature, shall be construed as including a reference to an ordinance made by the Governor General or a Governor General's Act, or, as the case may be, to an ordinance made by 'Governor or a Governor's Act'.

Thus, the words 'any Act of the appropriate Legislature' occurring in S.223 must be construed as including a reference to an Ordinance made by the Governor-General. the Governor-General is thus given express permission to make ordinance affecting the jurisdiction of this Court. Mr Meyer contended that we should not interpret the words 'Act of the appropriate Legislature' in this fashion because those words in S.223 are followed by the words 'enacted by virtue of powers conferred on that Legislature by this Act'. He contends that the use of the word 'Legislature' with a capital L in this clause indicates that only the Federal and Provincial Legislatures are being referred to and that the word 'Legislature' cannot be taken to mean the Governor-General as ordinance maker. I am not impressed by this argument. The word 'Legislature' means an authority empowered to make laws. The Governor-General when he promulgates and ordinance makes a law and is therefore in that capacity a Legislature.

There is another answer to this argument of Mr Meyer. Clause 44, Letters Patent, of this Court says that the provisions of the Letters Patent are subject to the legislative powers of the Governor-General in cases of emergency under S.72, Government of India Act of 1915 and may be in all respects amended and altered thereby. Mr Meyer admitted that if S.72, Government of India Act of 1915 were still in force the Governor-General in cases of emergency would have complete power to make ordinances affecting the jurisdiction of this Court. But he says that the entire Government of India Act of 1915 has been repealed by the Government of India Act of 1935 and that the present S.72 of Sch.9, Government of India Act of 1935, although it is in the same terms as S.72, Government of India Act of 1915 is not in law the same thing as S.72, Government of India Act of 1915 and therefore it cannot have the effect given to S.72 of the Act of 1915 by Cl. 44, Letters Patent. It is quite true that the Government of India Act of 1915 has been repealed as a whole by the Government of India Act of 1935. Section 317, Government of India Act of 1935, however, re-enacts S.72, Government of India Act of 1915 in Sch.9. Now, what is the effect of this re-enactment? Mr Ahmad appearing on behalf of the Crown draws our attention to the Interpretation Act of 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. Ch.63). Section 38 of that Act says that where an Act is repealed and any provision of the repealed Act is re-enacted with or without modification, references in any other Act to this repealed provision shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be construed as references to the provision so re-enacted. Therefore, the reference in Cl.44, Letters Patent to S.72, Government of India Act of 1915 must be construed as being a reference to the provisions of S.72 of Sch.9, Government of India Act of 1935. If this is done, it becomes abundantly clear that the Governor-General has power to pass ordinances affecting the jurisdiction of this court.

Mr Meyer sought to meet this argument by saying that S.38, Interpretation Act, dealt only with a reference in an Act to a repealed provision which has been re-enacted, but it did not deal with a reference to a re-enacted repealed provision in something which was not an Act. He pointed out that the Letters Patent was not an Act and that therefore the reference in the Letters Patent to a provision which has been re-enacted will not be affected by the rule laid down in S.38, Interpretation Act. In my opinion, this argument cannot prevail. It is true that the Letters Patent is not an Act, but it is granted by the Sovereign by virtue of an Act passed by the Parliament and it should be construed in the same way as an Act. Further, even if S.38, Interpretation Act, does not apply in terms to the Letters Patent, I have no hesitation in saying that the principle underlying S.38 should be applied in construing Cl.44, Letters Patent. In connexion with the other argument dealt with in the earlier part of this judgment, viz., that the Governor-General is not a Legislature I may point out that S.18, Interpretation Act, defines the expression 'Legislature' when used with reference to a British possession as meaning 'the authority competent to make laws to meet the emergency. He is therefore a Legislature. In view of what has been said above I am of opinion that the first ground urged on behalf of the petitioners must fail.

The second ground for inviting us to hold that the Ordinance is 'ultra vires' and invalid is a substantial one. There are three broad reasons urged in support of this branch of the argument. Firstly, Mr Meyer contends that, although the preamble states 'whereas an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary to provide for the setting up of special Criminal courts' nevertheless it is unmistakably clear from the very provisions of the Ordinance that the Governor-General was not of opinion that an emergency which necessitated the promulgation of this Ordinance existed. He then argues that if the Governor-General did not think that such an emergency existed he had no power to make the Ordinance. Now, let us examine what powers are given to the Governor-General to make and promulgate ordinances. These powers are to be found in S.72 of Sch.9, Government of India Act, 1935, which is as follows:

The Governor-General may, in cases of emergency, make and promulgate Ordinances, for the peace and good government of British India or any part thereof and any ordinance so made shall, for the space of not more than six months from its promulgation have the like force of law as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature; but the power of making Ordinances under this section is subject to the like restrictions as the power of the Indian Legislature to make laws; and any ordinance made under this section is subject to the like disallowance as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature and may be controlled or superseded by any such Act.

There has been an amendment of the section by an Act of Parliament, viz., the India and Burma (emergency Provisions) Act of 1940 (3 & 4 Geo. VI, Ch.33), which for the period mentioned in S.3 of that Act removes the limit on the period during which an Ordinance may be in force. This amendment however, does not in any way touch the particular question now under discussion. The words of S.72 make it clear that the Governor-General has been given the power to make an Ordinance only under a certain specified condition and only for a specified purpose. The prerequisite is the existence of an emergency and the specified purpose is to ensure peace and good government. In other words, he cannot make and promulgate an ordinance unless there is an emergency which calls for the exercise of his special legislative power given by S.72 and his Ordinance must be a measure designed to ensure peace and good government endangered by the emergency. It follows from this that an Ordinance made and promulgated when there is no emergency which necessitates the exercise of this special legislative power of the Governor-General is ultra vires. Again, the words of the section indicate that an Ordinance passed for purposes other than the peace and good government of British India would likewise be ultra vires. Mr Ahmed on behalf of the Crown contended that it is not for a Court of law to decide whether or not an emergency which necessitates the promulgation of the Ordinance exists. Nor is it for a court of law to decide whether or not the Ordinance conduces to peace and good government; the only person to judge these matters is the Governor-General. He argued that if this view be accepted, this Court cannot go into the question whether or not the Governor-General was of opinion that an emergency which necessitates the promulgation of this Ordinance exists. In support of this view, he referred to well-known decision of the Judicial committee in 58 I.A.169. In my opinion, the decision in 58 I.A. 169 does not support the argument of Mr Ahmad. let us examine what the Privy Council have said in that case. This is what was said:

The petitioners ask this Board to find that a state of emergency did not exist. That raises directly the question who is to be the judge of whether a state of emergency exists. A state of emergency is something that does not permit of any exact definition. It connotes a state of matters calling for drastic action which is to be judged as such by someone. It is more than obvious that the someone must be the Governor General and he alone. Any other view would render utterly inept the whole provision. Emergency demands immediate action and that action is prescribed to be taken by the Governor-General. It is he alone who can promulgate the Ordinance.

Yet, if the view urged by the petitioners is right, the judgment of the Governor-General could be upset either (a) by this Board declaring that once the Ordinance was challenged in proceedings by way of habeas corpus the Crown ought to prove affirmatively before a Court that a state of emergency existed or (b) by a finding of this Board after a contentious and protracted enquiry that no state of emergency existed and that the Ordinance with all that followed on it was illegal. In fact, the contention is so completely without foundation on the face of it that it would be idle to allow an appeal to argue about it.

It was next said that the Ordinance did not conduce to the peace and good government of British India. The same remark applies. The Governor-General is the judge of that.

Let us analyse what these observations mean. They certainly do not mean that the power of the Governor-General to promulgate an Ordinance is absolutely untrammelled. To say this would be to nullify the express words of S.72 which stipulate that it is only in cases of emergency that the Governor-General can make and promulgate an Ordinance. All that the Judicial committee has said in this connexion is that, if the Governor-General judges that an emergency exists the Courts are not competent to say that it does not exist. In other words, an emergency exists if the Governor-General thinks that an emergency exists. It follows from this view that the Governor-General has power to promulgate an Ordinance only if he thinks or judges that there is an emergency which necessitates the promulgation of the Ordinance. To put it in another way, even if an emergency exists and the Governor-General does not think there is an emergency he cannot promulgate an Ordinance; on the other hand, if there is really no emergency but the Governor-General thinks there is an emergency he has the power to promulgate an Ordinance. It is what the Governor-General thinks that matters. The Privy Council has nowhere said that the court is not permitted to decide whether or not the Governor-General has judged that there is an emergency. What the Privy Council has said is that if the court finds that the Governor-General has judged that there is an emergency the Court is bound by that judgment. The Court must, however, decide when called upon to do so, whether or not the Governor-General has in fact judged that there is an emergency. It is no argument to say that the Court cannot delve into the mind of a person. This will certainly not be the first time that the Court is called upon to determine the state of a man's mind. The Court has to do this constantly and the Evidence Act abounds in provisions which demand that the court shall determine the state of mind of a person. The state of a man's mind is a question of fact capable of being determined like any other question of fact. Now, if from the very provisions of the Ordinance it is established that the Governor-General does not think that there is an emergency is not this Court bound to declare that the Ordinance is ultra vires? I have no doubt that this Court is so bound. Suppose, in this Ordinance the Governor-General had said: 'I do not think there is an emergency which necessitates the promulgation of this Ordinance but nevertheless I promulgate it'. Obviously, the ordinance would be ultra vires and the Court would have power to declare it to be so. If he had said, 'I do not think there is an emergency which necessitates the promulgation of this Ordinance but nevertheless I promulgate it because at some future date an emergency may arise which may require such an Ordinance', would that Ordinance be valid? In my opinion it would be equally invalid as the Ordinance just before mentioned. The Governor-General, it is true, is the sole judge to determine whether or not an emergency exists, but for the purposes of promulgating ordinances he is not vested with prophetic powers which would enable him to legislate with respect to some emergency which has not arisen. His powers of legislation are limited to making an ordinance when he thinks an existing emergency demands it. Emergency legislation is something drastic and immediate—it is not contemplative legislation.

An emergency is nowhere defined in the Government of India Act, 1935, but the meaning given to the word may be gathered from S.42 (1) of that Act which makes provision for emergency legislation by Ordinance by the Governor-General. The section is not in force as it occurs in Part 2 of the Act which is to come into force when Federation is established. For the transitional period, S.72 of Appendix 9 takes the place of S.42 so far as emergency legislation is concerned. Section 42 runs as follows:

If at any time when the Federal Legislature is not in session the Governor General is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action, he may promulgate such ordinances as the circumstances appear to him to require.

Instead of using the words 'in case of emergency' which are used in S.72 of Sch.9 the words used are: 'The Governor-General is satisfied that circumstances exist which renders it necessary for him to take immediate action.' this is what is meant by 'emergency'. The Judicial Committee in 58 I.A. 169 has given the same meaning to the phrase in case of emergency. This is also the dictionary meaning of the word 'emergency'. An emergency according to the Oxford Dictionary is 'a sudden juncture demanding immediate action' or whether he was 'satisfied that circumstances existed which rendered it necessary for him to take immediate action.' This is what the Ordinance says:

"Whereas an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary to provide for the setting up of Special Criminal Courts:

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by S.72 of the Government of India Act, as set out in the Ninth Schedule to the Government of India Act, 1935, the Governor-General is pleased to make and promulgate the following Ordinance:

1. (1) This Ordinance may be called the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 1942. (2) It extends to the whole of British India. (3) It shall come into force in any Province only if the Provincial Government being satisfied of the existence of an emergency arising from a hostile attack on India or on a country neighbouring on India or from the imminence of such an attack, by notification in the official gazette, declares it to be in force in the Province, and shall cease to be in force when such notification is rescinded:

The preamble does say that an emergency exists which renders it necessary to provide for the setting up of Special Courts but what follows in S.1 (3) clearly contradicts the preamble. If the Governor-General judged that such an emergency had arisen he would take immediate action by setting up Special Courts. He says that the Ordinance itself is not in force and shall not come into force until the Provincial Government considers that it should be brought into force by reason of its being satisfied that a certain kind of emergency exists. I would stress here that in cases of emergency the Governor-General has power to promulgate Ordinances for the peace and good government not only of India as a whole but of any part thereof. There is no bar to the Governor-General himself promulgating an ordinance for the peace and good government of any province, if he is of opinion that an emergency existed in that province. But he does not do this. He promulgates an ordinance, but he does not put it into force anywhere; on the contrary he provides in S.1 (3) that it cannot be in force in any province until the Provincial Government is satisfied that an emergency exists and considers that the emergency necessitates the Ordinance being put into force. I draw attention to the words 'only if' in S.72. Why does he do this? The only reasonable answer is because he did not think at the time of promulgating the ordinance that any emergency which required to be met immediately by this ordinance actually existed. If he thought that an emergency existed which, in the words of the Privy Council in 58.A.169 'demanded immediate action' he would surely put the ordinance into force at once or fix a definite date and the earliest possible date when it would come into force; he certainly would not postpone its effectiveness to some indeterminate date to be fixed by someone else when that someone else considered that a particular emergency which called for the application of the ordinance had arisen. The preamble and S.1 (3) are contradictory, and read together they indicate that the Governor-General has misdirected himself as regards the conditions under which he is given power to promulgate an ordinance. When a preamble contradicts the enacting portion of a statute and that portion is quite clear, the enactment must prevail over the preamble. This principle was laid down by the House of Lords in (1899) A.C.143 at page 157. The Earl of Halsbury L.C. Said:

Two propositions are quite clear — one that a preamble may afford useful light as to what a statute intends to reach, and another that, if an enactment is itself clear and unambiguous no preamble can qualify or cut down the enactment.

Again at page 185 of the same report Lord DAVOEY says:

Undoubtedly—I quote from Chitty, learned Judge's judgment, words with which I cordially agree — it is a settled rule that the preamble cannot be made use of to control the enactments themselves, when they are expressed in clear and unambiguous terms.

Section 1 (3) contains a clear and unambiguous statement. By it Governor-General postpones the operation of the Ordinance until the Provincial Government is satisfied that the emergency requiring the Ordinance has arisen. In other words, he says that the emergency requiring the Ordinance has not yet arisen. The preamble cannot be used to alter or detract from or add to this clear and unambiguous statement in the enactment itself. I am convinced that an emergency necessitating the Ordinance existed: what he thought was that an emergency necessitating this Ordinance may arise at some future date from a hostile attack on India or on a country neighbouring on India or from the imminence of such an attack. The words of S.72 are clear: an Ordinance can be promulgated only 'in cases of emergency'. The words are not in case of apprehended emergency or future emergency. The emergency must be in existence or in the words of the Judicial Committee in 58 I.A. 169 the Governor General must judge that an emergency which demands immediate and drastic action is in existence. A little alteration in the Ordinance will bring out more clearly the contradiction between the preamble and the enactment. If, instead of the words 'Provincial Government' in S.1 (3) the words 'Governor General' were substituted, the Ordinance would read thus:

"Whereas an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary to provide for the setting up of Special Criminal Courts:

Now therefore in exercise of the powers conferred by S.72, Government of India Act, as set out in the Ninth Schedule to the Government of India Act, 1935, the Governor-General is pleased to make and promulgate the following ordinance.

1. (1) This ordinance may be called the special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 1942. (2) It extends to the whole of British India. (3) It shall come into force in any Province only if the Governor-General being satisfied of the existence of an emergency arising from a hostile attack on India or on a country neighbouring on India or from the imminence of such an attack, by notification in the official gazette, declares it to be in force when such notification is rescinded:

Provided that any trial or proceeding which was pending at the time of such rescission may be continued and completed as if the provisions of this ordinance were still in force."

If the ordinance was framed thus (and the Governor-General having the right to pass Ordinances in respect of any Province could very well have framed it thus) what would be the inevitable conclusion? Would it not be that the Governor-General when promulgating the Ordinance was not of opinion that an emergency which required the operation of the Ordinance then existed. The fact that the Ordinance as it stands delegates the function of deciding whether the emergency exists to the Provincial Government makes no difference to the force of the argument that the Governor-General was not of opinion that an emergency existed, it only raises a further difficulty in the way of supporting the Ordinance—a difficulty which I shall presently show is unsurmountable. It has been suggested that the Governor-General considered that an emergency existed which made it necessary not to set up Special Courts immediately but merely to provide for the setting up of Special courts and that it is for this reason that the Ordinance is framed not to set up Special Courts immediately but only to make provision for the setting up of Special Courts by Provincial Government, when the Provincial Government is satisfied that an emergency requires it. In this view, it is argued, that it cannot be said that the Governor General did not think that an emergency necessitating this kind of ordinance existed.

This, in my opinion, is a specious argument. What provides for the setting up of the Special Courts? It is the ordinance and nothing else. What is postponed and left to be brought into force by the Provincial Government when the said Government is satisfied that an emergency exists? It is that very ordinance itself. Section 1 (3) says so in terms. It says that 'it (the ordinance) shall come in force'. Thus the very measure which is providing for the setting up of Special Courts is postponed till an emergency necessitating the measure arises. It follows that the person promulgating such a measure does not think that any emergency requiring the measure exists. In my opinion, the provisions of this ordinance proclaim unmistakably that the Governor-General did not think that an emergency which necessitated the ordinance actually existed. He may have thought that such an emergency may arise at some future time. That, however, is not enough. The Governor-General had no power to promulgate this ordinance unless he was of opinion that the emergency requiring it actually existed: it is therefore ultra vires of the Governor-General.

My Lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Khundkar have said that we cannot say that the emergency did not exist because the emergency is the war which is a 'historical' fact of which we must take judicial notice. They hold the view that in the face of existing historical facts, this Court is bound to hold that there was an emergency and therefore to hold that the Governor-General had judged that there was an emergency. To do otherwise they say, would be to shut our eyes to well-known historical facts. I respectfully dissent from this view. The Privy Council has said in 58 I.A. 169 that once the Governor-General has judged that there is an emergency, this Court cannot say that there was none whatever may be the historical facts. If we cannot look at historical facts to decide that there was no emergency we are equally incompetent to look at historical facts for the purpose of deciding that there is an emergency. We are to be completely blind in this respect and not blind in the Nelsonian manner. There is no scope for putting the telescope once to the blind eye and once to the sound one. What I have taken pains to show is that the Ordinance itself proclaims that the Governor General has not judged that there is an emergency. In the preamble he says that an emergency necessitating the Ordinance has arisen but in S.1 (3) he says that it has not, that it is yet to arise and the canons of statutory interpretation say that S.1 (3) shall prevail over the preamble. If my interpretation of S.1 (3) be correct, then whatever may be the historical facts, we cannot say that an emergency necessitating the Ordinance exists, as that would amount to contradicting the Governor-General on the question of the existence or non-existence of the emergency and this we are not permitted to do.

My Lord the Chief Justice has referred to the proclamation of the Governor-General under S.102, Government of India Act, 1935. He says that this proclamation showed that there was an emergency and that it could not be said thereafter that no emergency existed. I respectfully disagree with this view. The proclamation of emergency under S.102 was made for the purpose of giving power to the Federal Legislature to make laws for a province with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Provincial List and for this purpose only. The emergency justifying an Ordinance is quite another matter. A proclamation of emergency under S.102 will not necessarily be sufficient to empower the Governor-General to make an Ordinance. Before he can make an Ordinance the Governor-General must judge that an emergency which necessitates the particular Ordinance exists. This the Governor-General has not judged when promulgating this Ordinance.

A second reason is canvassed by Mr Meyer for holding that the Ordinance is ultra vires. This is what he says: Parliament has entrusted the Governor-General and the Governor-General alone with the duty to judge whether such an emergency exists as would justify him in promulgating an Ordinance. The Governor-General cannot delegate the duty to determine whether an emergency exists to any one. In the present case the Governor-General has not judged whether an emergency which necessitates this Ordinance, exists: but he has left it to the Provincial Government to do this and consequently the Ordinance is ultra vires.

We have therefore to determine first who is the person who in this case is deciding whether such an emergency exists as would necessitate this Ordinance and secondly, whether that person has the right to decide this matter. Let us again look at the Ordinance. In the preamble the Governor-General says that 'an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary to provide for the setting up of Special Criminal Courts'. If this statement remained uncontradicted, perhaps, one could have said little in support of the present argument. But in S.1 (3) the Governor-General says that the Ordinance is not to come into force until the Provincial Government is satisfied that an emergency has arisen from a hostile attack on India or on a country neighbouring on India or from the imminence of such an attack and being so satisfied declares it to be in force by a notification in the Gazette. It is thus clear that the Ordinance has no force at all until the Provincial Government decides to bring it into force upon being satisfied that an emergency necessitating the Ordinance exists. I would point out here that S.1 (3) does not say that the Provincial Government shall bring the Ordinance into force whenever there is a hostile attack on India or on a country neighbouring on India or whenever there is imminence of such an attack. Some at least of these events had actually happened when the Ordinance was promulgated. Burma had been invaded. All or any of the above mentioned events may happen and yet the Provincial Government may not according to the terms of the Ordinance be justified in not bringing it into force.

One must be careful to distinguish between an emergency and the events which may lead to an emergency. They are not equivalent matters. An invasion may lead to food shortage; this would be an emergency necessitating one kind of legislation or it may lead to sabotage and that would require another type of legislation. In the present Ordinance very wide powers are given to the Provincial Government, in fact overriding powers are given. The Provincial Government may let the Ordinance remain inert as it was when promulgated by the Governor-General or it may give it life. The Provincial Government is left to decide whether an emergency of such a description has arisen as would justify the ordinance being put into force.

A recent amendment of the Ordinance makes the point I am labouring clear. The Special Courts (Second Amendment) Ordinance of 1942 (ordinance 42 of 1942 brought into force in August 1942) adds another event from which an emergency may arise. It is 'any disorder in the province'. It is obvious that the Provincial Government is not bound to bring the Ordinance into force as soon as any disorder occurs in the province. The Provincial Government is asked to judge whether such disorder has created an emergency of such description as would justify the Ordinance being put into force. If the words of the preamble and S.1 (3) are read together and analysed this is what we find the Governor-General saying in effect: 'I am of opinion that if an emergency arises from invasion, imminence of invasion or internal disorder Special Criminal Courts should be set up, the power of the High Court should be curtailed and certain other things should be done. I leave it however to the Provincial Government to decide whether such an emergency has arisen by reason of these events as would require the creation of Special Courts, the curtailment of the power of the High Court and the doing of the other things mentioned in the Ordinance.'

I can quite realise an emergency arising out of imminence of invasion which would justify an Ordinance curtailing the right of the subject to have recourse to the High Court. I can also envisage an emergency arising from the imminence of invasion which could not possibly justify an Ordinance curtailing the powers of the High Court to rectify injustice. When the High court is functioning normally, sitting in its usual place and dealing with intricate civil matters as if nothing unusual had happened I find it difficult to appreciate how a curtailment of its powers to do justice in criminal matters can help to solve any emergency arising out of a threatened invasion. In my opinion in these conditions such curtailment would further intensify the emergency by creating panic among the people. The position would be different if owing to bombing or some similar cause the High Court had to disperse to places which were not easily accessible to the people. However, it is not for this Court to decide whether the Ordinance is justified or not, in this matter also the Privy council has said that the Governor-General is the sole judge. I have digressed somewhat, but I have done so to emphasise the point that the Governor-General is leaving it entirely to the Provincial Government to decide not only if an emergency exists but also to decide whether the emergency is of such a description as would justify the Ordinance.

The Provincial Government has decided that even in Calcutta where there is no riot or civil commotion, where all Courts including the High court are sitting and carrying out their normal duties in a normal fashion, a person wrongly convicted and sentenced by a Special Criminal Court situated at a place a few minutes walk from this Court will not have the right to demand any redress from this Court. I have referred to the conditions under which the Ordinance has been brought into force in Bengal not for the purpose of ventilating the opinion, which I hold, that there is not necessity for this Ordinance at any rate in this part of Bengal — as my opinion regarding the propriety of enforcing the Ordinance is of no relevance in a discussion regarding its validity; but I refer to these matters to illustrate the fact that while it is quite possible for the Governor-General and the Provincial Government to hold different views on the question whether such an emergency exists in Bengal as would justify this Ordinance, the Governor-General abdicates his duty to judge this matter and gives the Provincial Government the complete and exclusive right to decide it. Having regard to all these circumstances is there any doubt as to the person who in this case is deciding whether such an emergency exists as would justify this ordinance? In my opinion there can be none. It is the Provincial Government which is being made the sole judge of this emergency.

The next point to decide is whether the Governor-General can empower the Provincial Government to decide whether an emergency which necessitates the Governor-General's Ordinance exists. We must again go back to S.72 of Sch.9, Government of India Act, 1935, and to the decision of the Privy Council in 58 I.A.169 where this section was interpreted. Section 72 gives power to the Governor-General to legislate by Ordinance if an emergency requiring the Ordinance exists. Who is to decide whether an emergency exists? The Judicial Committee in emphatic terms has said that it is more than obvious that the 'Governor-General and he alone' is to judge whether a state of emergency exists. After this, there is no room for suggesting that any one else has the power to decide this matter. I wish to make it clear that I am not now dealing with the question of the delegation of legislative powers, but with the question whether a particular function assigned to the Governor-General by Parliament can be assigned by him to any one else. Parliament has entrusted to the Governor-General the judicial function of deciding whether such an emergency exists as would justify him in promulgating an Ordinance. I have described the function as a judicial one deliberately. The decision whether or not an emergency necessitating the exercise of his ordinance making powers exists is not a mechanical act which involves no matter of discretion and which can be performed by one person as well as by any other. It is a function which involves the exercise of one's deliberative faculties and faculties of judgment and discretion. Where the performance of such a function is entrusted by Parliament to any one he must discharge it himself, he cannot unless expressly permitted to do so by Parliament, delegate this function to any one else. The doctrine 'delegata potestas non potest delegari' (a delegated power cannot be delegated) is one, which is usually applied in cases arising out of contract, but the principle of that doctrine is of universal application and would apply in this case. If authority be needed for this proposition I would refer to the case of 19 Howell State Trials 1030 at p. 1063 where it was observed by Lord Camden that a Magistrate can have no assistant nor deputy to execute any part of his employment 'because the right is personal to himself and a trust that he can no more delegate to another than a justice of the peace can transfer his commission to his clerk.'

In giving the Governor-General ordinance making powers, Parliament imposed the duty upon the Governor-General to judge whether or not an emergency which necessitated an Ordinance existed and that trust he can not delegate to another. In the present case the Governor-General has delegated this trust or function to the Provincial Government and this makes the Ordinance ultra vires. To meet this argument, Mr Ahmed on behalf of the Crown, referred us to the well-known decision of the Privy Council in 51 A.178 and also to certain recent decisions regarding this Ordinance of different High courts where 51 A.178 was relied upon to repel the contention that this Ordinance is ultra vires. The decisions are A.I.R. (30) 1943 ALI 26 I.L.R. (1943) Nag.73 at pp. 89, 90, A.I.R. (30) 1943 Pat.24 at pp. 26, 27 and an unreported decision of the High Court of Bombay [A.I.R. 1943 Bom.169 (F.B.).]

I shall first deal with 51 A. 178 In 1869 the Governor-General in Council, which was then the Indian Legislature, passed an Act purporting, inter alia, to remove the Garo Hills from the jurisdiction of the Courts of Civil and Criminal Jurisdiction and to vest the administration of civil and criminal justice within that territory in such officer as the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal might from time to time appoint. The Act was to come into operation on such date as the Lieutenant Governor should by notification in the Calcutta Gazette direct. By S.9 of the Act the Lieutenant Governor was empowered from time to time by notification in the Calcutta Gazette to extend 'mutatis mutandis' all or any of the provisions of the Act to the Jaintia Hills, Naga Hills etc. The question arose whether this Act was intra vires of the Indian Legislature. The majority of a Full Bench of this Court held that S.9 of this Act was in excess of the legislative powers of the Indian Legislature because that section was not legislation but a delegation of legislative power, inasmuch as, it was left to the Lieutenant Governor to extend the Act or such portion of the Act as he thought fit to different areas. The Judicial Committee held that the decision of the majority of the Full Bench was wrong and allowed the appeal. This is what their Lordships said:

But their Lordships are of opinion that the doctrine of the majority of the Court is erroneous, and that it rests upon a mistaken view of the powers of the Indian Legislature, and indeed of the nature and principles of legislation. The Indian Legislature has powers expressly limited by the Act of the Imperial Parliament which created it, and it can, of course, do nothing beyond the limits which circumscribe these powers. But, when acting within those limits, it is not in any sense an agent or delegate of the Imperial Parliament, but has, and was intended to have plenary powers of legislation, as large and of the same nature, as those of Parliament itself. The established courts of justice when a question arises whether the prescribed limits have been exceeded, must of necessity determine that question, and the only way in which they can properly do so, is by looking to the terms of the instrument by which, affirmatively, the legislative powers were created, and by which, negatively, they are restricted. If what has been done is legislation within the general scope of the affirmative words which give the power, and if it violates no express condition or restriction by which that power is limited (in which category would, of course, be included any Act of the Imperial Parliament at variance with it) it is not for any Court of justice to inquire further, or to enlarge constructively those conditions and restrictions.

The proper Legislature has exercised its judgment as to place, person, laws, powers; and the result of that judgment has been to legislate conditionally as to all these things. The conditions having been fulfilled, the legislation is now absolute. Where plenary powers of legislation exist as to particular subjects, whether in an Imperial or in a Provincial Legislature, they may (in their Lordships' judgment) be well exercised, either absolutely or conditionally. Legislation, conditional on the use of particular powers, or on the exercise of a limited discretion, entrusted by the Legislature to persons in whom it place confidence, is no uncommon thing, and in many circumstances, it may be highly convenient.

These observations of the Judicial Committee are relied upon by the crown as a complete answer to the present argument that the ordinance is ultra vires because the Governor-General by S 1 (3) of the Ordinance has delegated to the Provincial Government a function entrusted by Parliament to the Governor-General alone viz., the function of judging whether or not an emergency necessitating the ordinance exists. In my opinion an analysis of the decision in (1878) 3 A.C. 889 will show that it does not answer this argument urged on behalf of the petitioners and that it has really very little to do with the point under discussion. The Judicial Committee were dealing with an Act of the Indian Legislature, a body clothed with general legislative powers by the Indian Councils Act passed by the British Parliament. I would emphasise that the Judicial Committee do not say that an authority clothed with general legislative powers can delegate such general legislative powers to another authority. On the contrary they said that this could not be done. Their view was that there had not been any such delegation in this case but only conditional legislation. At p. 194 this is what they observed:

Their Lordships agree that the Governor-General in council (i.e. then Indian Legislature) could not by any power of enactment create in India, and arm with general legislative authority a new legislative power not created or authorized by the Councils' Act. Nothing of that kind has, in their Lordships' opinion, been done or attempted in the present case.

As I have said before I am not at present dealing with the question of delegation of legislative powers at all, but with the question whether the judicial function entrusted to the Governor-General by Parliament of deciding whether a particular type of emergency exists which required legislation by ordinance could be delegated to someone else (1878) 3 A.C. 889 has not dealt with this question at all; it was not a question which arose for consideration in the case and nothing which was said in (1878) 3 A.C. 889 can be taken to indicate that such functions can be delegated. In fact the general principle underlying the maxim delegata potestas non potest delegari was expressly recognised by their Lordships when they said that the Indian Legislature which was clothed with general legislative authority by Parliament could not clothe any other body with such general legislative authority. What the Privy Council decided was only this. When an authority is given plenary or unconditional powers of legislation with certain limits prescribed by Parliament, it can within those limits do anything which Parliament could have done. Having unconditional powers it could pass conditional legislation. The Privy Council have not said that when an authority is given only conditional powers of legislation it can legislate beyond those conditions; nor have they said that where an authority has to decide whether a certain condition precedent giving it power to legislate exists, it can leave the decision of that matter to some one else. Parliament has enacted that the Governor-General can legislate by ordinance only on condition that the Governor-General is of opinion that an emergency requiring the Ordinance exists. Nothing said in (1878) 3 A.C. 889 can be interpreted to permit the Governor-General leaving anyone else to decide whether or not an emergency exists.

Where an authority is given plenary power to do a certain thing by legislation, it may be that that authority can validly make a law whereby it empowers someone else to do that thing. I do not say that this can be done, but admitting for the sake of argument that (1878) 3 A.C. 889 has decided that this can be done. I would still say that the contention of Mr Meyer that the Governor-General cannot delegate his function of judging whether an emergency exists to anyone, remains unassailable. If the Governor-General had been given power by Parliament to declare by legislation that an emergency existed it may be that he could by Ordinance empower the Provincial Government to make such a declaration. But Parliament has not given this legislative power to the Governor-General. The Governor-General has no power to legislate by Ordinance at all until he first judges that there is an emergency requiring the Ordinance. There is therefore no power in the Governor-General to legislate by Ordinance that Provincial Government shall decide whether an emergency necessitating the Ordinance exists. I shall now deal briefly with the decisions of the other High Courts regarding the points raised. In A.I.R. (30) 1943 ALL. 26 the argument was that inasmuch as the Ordinance was not put in operation on the date of its promulgation it must be presumed that no emergency existed and therefore the Ordinance was bad. This argument was met by Iqbal Ahmad C.J. thus:

'The short answer to this contention, to my mind, is that the Governor General is the sole judge as to the existence or absence of an emergency and accordingly, the validity of an Ordinance which is otherwise intra vires the Governor-General cannot be called in question on the ground that no emergency as a matter of fact existed.

He then referred to 58 I.A. 169. It seems that the point of view placed before us by Mr Meyer, viz., that the Ordinance shows that the Governor-General did not judge there was an emergency, was not placed before the Allahabad High Court. What the Chief Justice has said there is no answer to the point raised in this court. It was also argued in that case that the Governor-General had delegated the determination of the question of emergency to the Provincial Government and that such delegation was not permissible. The Chief Justice met the point thus:

If the Ordinance was validly promulgated on 2nd January its validity could not be questioned on the ground that its enforcement was deferred and was made dependent on any specified set of facts. The power to promulgate an Ordinance necessarily carries with it the power to specify the conditions necessary for its enforcement.

He referred in support of his view to the case in (1882) 7 A.C. 829 which followed (1878) 3 A.C. 889. With great respect to the learned Chief Justice I am unable to agree with his view. He starts by saying 'If the Ordinance was validly promulgated on 2nd January'. Certainly, if it was validly promulgated its validity could not be challenged. The question is whether it was validly promulgated. Next, the question raised was not one of merely deferring the enforcement of a valid law: the question related to propriety of the delegation of a judicial function to decide on a certain matter. This question was not considered by the learned Chief Justice. In A.I.R. (30) 1943 Pat. 24 it was argued that the Governor-General could leave the question of the existence of an emergency to anyone else. Next it was argued that the fact that the question regarding the existence of the emergency was left to the Provincial Government showed that there was no emergency. Lastly, it was said that the fact that it was left to the Provincial Government to decide when to bring the Ordinance into force also showed that there was really no emergency. All these arguments were met by saying that in 58 I.A. 169 the Privy Council said that the Governor-General was the sole judge of whether an emergency existed. Fazl Ali J. said 'the mere recital in the preamble that there was an emergency is enough'. He goes on to say that once there is such a recital then the Ordinance must be held to be a good Ordinance and 'all the provisions made therein including the provisions of S 1 (3) by which the Provincial Government are to decide where the Special Courts are to be constituted must also be held to be good'.

The question of the validity of the delegation of the function to decide whether an emergency existed or not was not specifically dealt with at all. I must respectfully disagree with the view of Fazl Ali J. that the statement in the preamble prevents us from deciding whether or not the Governor-General had judged that an emergency existed. Nor can I agree with him that this statement in the preamble protects every other provision in the Ordinance from being declared illegal. Fazl Ali J. referred to (1878) 3 A.C. 889 when dealing with the postponement of the enforcement of the Ordinance. As I have said before (1878) 3 A.C. 889 has not dealt with the question of the propriety of the delegation of the function of the Governor-General to decide whether an emergency exists so it is not necessary for me to deal with that part of the Fazl Ali J.'s judgment.

In I.L.R. 1943 Nag. 73 it was argued that the Governor-General had promulgated the Ordinance before an emergency had arisen and had abdicated his legislative authority in favour of the Provincial Government to promulgate the Ordinance when the actual emergency arose. Niyogi J., relied on 58 I.A. 169 and said that the Governor-General was the sole judge to decide whether an emergency existed and added 'It must be assumed that there was an emergency when he declared that there was'. He went on to say that the Ordinance was promulgated to meet an emergency which was likely to become more acute and all that S.1 (3) did was to indicate at what acute stage the Ordinance was to be put in force. He then relied on (1878) 3 A.C. 889 and held that the Ordinance was intra vires of the Governor-General. All I need say is that the precise form of the arguments addressed to us was different from the arguments addressed to Niyogi J. I would respectfully add that I am not able to accept his interpretation of S.1 (3) for the reasons which I have already given when dealing with the arguments addressed to us. There remains an unreported case decided by the Bombay High Court which was placed before us by the learned Deputy Legal Remembrancer, Viz. Cr. Application No. 431 of 1942 [A.I.R. 1943 Bom. 169 F.B.]. Dealing with the argument that the Ordinance showed that there was no existing emergency because its enforcement was postponed. Beaumont C.J. said this

'The Governor-General has said that an emergency exists, and to say that there cannot be an emergency, unless it is necessary instantly to bring the terms of the Ordinance into operation, is to suggest that there can be no emergency with which the Governor General can deal before it arises. It suggests that the Governor-General can never exercise any foresight in the protection of the State.

With great respect to Beaumont C.J. I must say that I entirely disagree with him in his view that the Governor-General can promulgate an Ordinance before an emergency arises. He can exercise his foresight and contemplate Ordinances but he can promulgate them only when an emergency exists. Section 72 as interpreted by the Judicial Committee in 58 I.A. 169 makes this quite clear. I agree that the Governor-General can use his foresight in the protection of the State. He may promulgate Ordinances to protect the State from an impending disaster but an impending disaster means an existing emergency. If I may say so with great respect, Beaumont C.J. was not quite right in his appreciation of the term 'emergency' as used in S.72 of sch.9. It is something in existence which calls for immediate action. When dealing with question of the delegation of the Governor-General's function to judge whether an emergency existed, the learned chief Justice said that the use of the word 'emergency' in sub.S.(3) of S.1 was 'rather unfortunate' because it suggested two emergencies. He added that there was only one emergency viz., that which justified the promulgation of the ordinance and it was that emergency which justified the Governor-General in leaving it to the Provincial Government to bring the ordinance into operation as part of the machinery for carrying out the ordinance.'

I am aware of the principle that emergency legislation cannot be so carefully and skilfully drafted as normal peace-time legislation and that courts in construing emergency legislation should bear this in mind and avoid being too meticulous or fastidious but I would respectfully say that the construction put on S.1 (3) by the learned Chief Justice savours more of legislation than of construction. Further it should be remembered that the ordinance is taking away valuable rights from the subject and also curtailing the jurisdiction and powers of this Court; when an Act or ordinance does this the duty of the Court is to be vigilant and to satisfy itself that all the conditions necessary for the validity of such an ordinance or Act have been complied with. Bearing all this in mind I am unable to agree with Beaumont C.J. that all that S.1 (3) does is to leave the Provincial Government to put the machinery of the Ordinance into action. It does something more; it leaves it to the Provincial Government to decide whether such an emergency exists as would justify the Ordinance being put into operation. If I may say so, with the greatest respect, in most of the cases one point is lost sight of, viz., that the emergency and the measure to meet it are not unconnected matters and that they are interdependent. The measure is something which is taken to meet the particular emergency. These two things cannot be viewed apart from each other. They are inextricably bound together. The person who decides the emergency must also devise the measure to meet it. One person must be responsible for both. It is this principle that has also been ignored in the promulgation of this Ordinance.

The third and the last point urged by Mr Meyer is this: The Governor-General has not only delegated the function of deciding whether the emergency exists but he has also delegated his legislative functions to the Provincial Government. The Governor-General does not decide what jurisdiction the different Courts are to have; he has left that to the Provincial Government to decide either by itself or by some officer empowered in this behalf by the Provincial Government. By this Ordinance it is the Provincial Government or the officer of the Provincial Government who is given power to decide how much of the criminal jurisdiction of the High Court is to be taken away. My Lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Khundkar have dealt with this point very fully and I cannot usefully add anything to what they have said.

I would rest my decision that the ordinance is ultra vires on the other grounds discussed by me. As the ordinance is ultra vires we must hold that the Special Court which tried the petitioners was not properly constituted and had no jurisdiction to try them. This rule must therefore be made absolute. The convictions and sentences must be set aside. The order that I would pass would be that the petitioners be released and that Provincial Government should re-arrest them and proceed against them according to law in the ordinary Courts.

By the court — As the majority of the Court is of the opinion that the applicants have been convicted by a Court which had no jurisdiction to deal with them and as the other member of the Court is of the opinion that the tribunal under no circumstances could have jurisdiction over them, we make the order that the conviction be set aside and that the applicants be released, but that they be re-arrested and dealt with in the ordinary Court according to the ordinary process of law. It will be for those in charge of this case to see that these persons are rearrested and brought before the Magistrate and dealt with; and we direct the attention of the Magistrate to the provisions relating to bail in S.130 A of the Defence of India Rules, but not in the sense that we suggest that they should have bail. Certificate is granted under S.205, Government of India Act.

27. Keshav Talpade (Appellant) v. Emperor [Gwyer C.J., S. Varadachariar and Zafrullah Khan J.J. (22 April 1943)]

AIR, Vol. 30, 1943, Federal Court Calcutta, pp. 1-9

G.N. Joshi (B.G. Thakar, with him) instructed by R.G. Naik, Agent — for Appellant.

N.P. Engineer, Advocate-General, Bombay (M.M. Desai with him) instructed by B. Banerjee, Agent for Respondent.

Sir Brojendra Mitter,* Advocate-General of India (H.R. Kazimi, with him) instructed by K.Y. Bhandarkar, Agent for the Governor General in Council.

Gwyer C.J. — In this case the appellant appeals against the refusal of a Division Bench of the High Court of Bombay to grant an order under S.491, Criminal P.C., in the nature of writ of habeas corpus in order to secure the release of the appellant from detention under an order purporting to be made under R.26 of the Defence of India Rules. The appellant was arrested on 24th August last under R.129, and an order for his detention under R. 26 was made by the Provincial Government on 27th August. The ground on which the appellant asked for an order under S.491 was that the Defence of India Act, 1939, and as a necessary corollary the rules made thereunder are ultra vires, since the Act purports to relate to the defence of India, and no power is conferred on the Central Legislature or upon any other Legislature in India to legislate on that subject. This is a startling contention and, if it is sound, would have even more startling consequences. It is therefore necessary to examine closely the facts of the case and the relevant statutory provisions which have been brought to our notice. The appellant states that he was arrested by a police officer on 24th August 1942 and detained in custody, that on 4th September, he was removed to the Thana Jail; and that he learned later that an order had been made by the Bombay Government dated 27th August, which is in the following terms.

‘Whereas the Government of Bombay has received a report from the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, that the person known as Keshav Talpade had been arrested and committed to jail custody under sub-rules (1) and (2) respectively, of R. 129 of the Defence of India Rules.

And whereas the Government of Bombay is satisfied that with a view to preventing the said Keshav Talpade from acting in a manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order and the efficient prosecution of the war, it is necessary to make the following order.’

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by sub-R. (4) of R.129 read with R. 26 of said rules, the Government of Bombay is pleased to direct: (a) that the said Keshav Talpade be detained until further orders, (b) that he shall be detained in the Thana District Prison until any other place for his detention is determined by a competent authority under sub-r. (5) of the said R. 26; and (c) that he shall for the purposes of the Security prisoners Detention Conditions Order, 1941, be classified as a Class II security prisoner.

The appellant further states that he is now detained in the Yeravada jail, Poona. He denies that he has acted in any manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order and the efficient prosecution of war; on the contrary he says that he believes in giving unqualified aid to the efficient prosecution of war. It is not disputed that he is in fact detained under the order to which we have referred. The two rules, 26 and 129, are in the following terms.

‘26 (1) The Central Government or the Provincial Government, if it is satisfied with respect to any particular person that with view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order, His Majesty’s relations with foreign powers or Indian States, the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas or the efficient prosecution of the war it is necessary so to do, may make an order: (a) directing such person to remove himself from British India in such manner, by such time and by such route as may be specified in the order, and prohibiting his return to British India, (b) directing that he be detained; (c) directing that, except in so far as he may be permitted by the provisions of the order, by such authority or person as may be specified therein he shall not be in such area or place in British India as may be specified in the order; (d) requiring him to reside or remain in such place or within such area in British India as may be specified in the order and if he is not already there to proceed to that place or area within such time as may be specified in the order; (e) requiring him to notify his movements or to report himself or both in such manner at such times and to such authority or person as may be specified in the order; (f) imposing upon him such restrictions as may be specified in the order in respect of his employment or business, in respect of his association or communication with other persons, and in respect of his activities in relation to the dissemination of news or propagation of opinions; (g) prohibiting or restricting the possession or use by him of any such article or articles as may be specified in the order; (h) otherwise regulating his conduct in any such particular as may be specified in the order."

Provided that no order shall be made under cl. (a) of this sub rule in respect of any British Indian subject of His Majesty.

Provided further that no order shall be made by the Provincial Government under cl. (c) of this sub-rule directing that any person ordinarily resident in the province shall not be in the province.

(3) An order made under sub-rule (1) may require the person in respect of whom it is made to enter into a bond, with or without sureties, for the due performance of, or as an alternative to the enforcement of, such restrictions or conditions made in the order as may be specified in the order:

(1) If any person is in any area or place in contravention of an order made under the provision of this rule, or fails to leave any area or place in accordance with the requirements of such an order, then, without prejudice to the provisions of sub r. (5), he may be removed from such area or place by any police officer or by any person acting on behalf of Government.

(5) So long as there is in force in respect of any person such order as aforesaid directing that he be detained, he shall be liable to be detained in such place, and under such conditions as to maintenance, discipline and the punishment of offences and breaches of discipline, as the Central Government or the Provincial Government, at the case may be, may from time to time determine.

(5A) Where the power to determine the place of detention is exercisable by the Provincial Government, the power of the Provincial Government shall include power to determine a place of detention outside the province:

Provided that: (a) no such place shall be determined save with the previous consent of the Provincial Government of the Province in which the place is situated, or where the place is situated in a Chief Commissioner's Province, of the Central Government; (b) the power to determine the conditions of detention shall be exercised by the provincial Government of the province in which the place is situated, or, where the place is situated in a Chief Commissioner's Province, by the Central Government.

(5B) If the Central Government or the Provincial Government, as the case may be, has reason to believe that a person in respect of whom that Government has made an order under cl. (b) of sub r. (1) directing that he be detained has absconded or is concealing himself so that such order cannot be executed, the Government may; (a) make a report in writing of the fact to a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the First Class having jurisdiction in the place where the said person ordinarily resides; and thereupon the provisions of Ss. 87, 88 and 89, Criminal P.C. 1908, shall apply in respect of the said person and his property as if the order directing that he be detained were a warrant issued by the Magistrate; (b) by notified order direct the said person to appear before such officer, at such place and within such period as may be specified in the order; and if the said person fails to comply with such direction he shall, unless he proves that it was not possible for him to comply therewith and that he had within the period specified in the order informed the officer of the reason which rendered compliance therewith impossible and of his whereabouts, be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years or with fine or with both.

(5C) The Central Government or the Provincial Government may by general or special order made with the consent of the Crown Representative, provide for the removal of any person detained by it under sub-r. (1) to, and for the detention of such person in, any area administered by the Crown Representative.

(6) If any person contravenes any order made under this rule, he shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to five years or with fine or with both, and if such person has entered into a bond in pursuance of the provisions of sub-r. (3) his bond shall be forfeited, and any person bound thereby shall pay the penalty thereof or show cause to the satisfaction of the convicting Court why such penalty should not be paid.

129.(1) Any police officer or any other officer of Government empowered in this behalf by general or special order of the Central Government, or of the Provincial Government may arrest without warrant any person whom he reasonably suspects of having acted, acting, or of being about to act — (a) with intent to assist any State at war with His Majesty, or in a manner prejudicial to the public safety or to the efficient prosecution of war; (b) in any area in which the provincial Government has, by notification, declared that this clause shall become operative in a manner calculated to promote, or to assist the promotion of, rebellion against the authority of Government; (c) in any prohibited place, protected place or protected area, or any other place or area as respects which (sic) an order has been made under R. 9 in a manner prejudicial (1) to the safety of any such place or area or of any industry, machinery or building in any such place or area (ii) to the output or effective control of any such industry or machinery.

(2) Any officer who makes an arrest in pursuance of sub-r. (1) shall forthwith report the fact of such arrest to the Provincial Government, and, pending the receipt of the orders of the Provincial Government, may subject to the provisions of sub-r. (3), by order in writing, commit any person so arrested to such custody as the provincial Government may by general or special order specify;

Provided (1) that no person shall be detained in custody under this sub-rule for a period exceeding fifteen days without the order of the Provincial Government; and (ii) that no person shall be detained in custody under this sub-rule for a period exceeding two months.

(3) If any person arrested under cl. (c) of sub-rule (1) is prepared to furnish security, the officer who has arrested him may, instead of committing him to custody, release him on his executing a bond with or without sureties that he will not, pending the receipt of the orders of the Provincial Government, enter, reside or remain in the areas in respect of which he became liable to arrest.

(4) On receipt of any report made under the provisions of sub-rule (2), the Provincial Government may, in addition to making such order, subject to proviso 2 to sub-rule (2), as may appear to be necessary for the temporary custody of any person arrested under this rule, make, in exercise of any power conferred upon it by any law for the time being in force, such final order as to his detention, release, residence or any other matter concerning him as may appear to the said Government in the circumstances of the case to be reasonable or necessary.

(5) Subject to the condition that nothing in this sub-rule shall be deemed to extend the limits of detention prescribed in provisions 1 and 2 to sub-rule (2), the Provincial Government may direct that any person arrested under cl. (a) or cl. (b) of sub-rule (1) shall be removed to any other province of which the provincial Government (hereinafter described as the second Government) has given its consent in this behalf, and thereupon such person shall be removed and the second Government shall take in respect of such person such action as may be lawful in like manner as if such person had been arrested within its province.

(6) When security has been taken in pursuance of the provisions of sub-rule (3), the bond shall be deemed to be a bond taken under the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, by the Chief Presidency Magistrate or District Magistrate having jurisdiction in the area in respect of which the said security has been taken and the provisions of S.514 of the said Code shall apply accordingly.'

Both rules were made by the Central Government under powers conferred by the Defence of India Act, 1938. Section 2 (1) of that Act provides that the Central Government may, by notification in the official Gazette, make such rules as appear to it to be necessary or expedient for securing the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order or the efficient prosecution of war, or for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community.'

Sub-section (2) is as follows:

'Without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-section (1), the rules may provide for, or may empower any authority to make orders providing for, all or any of the following matters', and then follow 35 paragraphs each of which sets out a matter or matters for which rules under the Act may be made. Apart from the general words in sub-section (1), para (10) of sub-section (2) appears to be the only provision in the Act dealing with the apprehension and detention of suspects. Paragraph (10) is in the following terms:

the apprehension and detention in custody of any person reasonably suspected of being of hostile origin or of having acted, acting or being about to act, in a manner prejudicial to the public safety or interest or to the defence of British India the prohibition of such person entering or residing or remaining in any area and the compelling of such person to reside and remain in any area, or to do or abstain from doing anything.

Counsel for the appellant contended that the Central Legislature had no power to enact the Defence of India Act, 1939, at all, because the 'defence of India' is not to be found among any of the entries in Lists I, II or III in Sch. 7, Constitution Act. This is no doubt true, and it is plain from various provisions of the Act that the executive authority of the Governor-General with respect to defence extends beyond matters with respect to which the Central Legislature has power to make laws: see example Ss. 7, 8, 11 and 12 (or during the transitional period, before part II comes into force, Ss. 312 and 313). We need not enlarge on the general scheme of the Act, which is now well known. It is sufficient to say that list I sets out a number of matter in respect of which the Central Legislature has an exclusive right of legislation, list II a list of matters in respect of which the provincial legislatures have a similar exclusive right, and list III a list of matters in respect of which the Central and provincial Legislatures have a concurrent power of legislation. There are one or two entries which are indirectly connected with defence such as entries Nos 1 and 2 in list I and entry No. 34 in list III; but many other entries in one or other of the three lists would clearly enable legislation of different kinds to be enacted, would in fact be effective for the purposes of defence. The S.102 of the Act provides that, if the Governor-General has declared by proclamation that a grave emergency exists whereby the security of India is threatened, whether by war of internal disturbance, the Central Legislature is to have power to make laws for a province or any part thereof with respect to any of the matters in the provincial Legislative list. Such a proclamation has been issued, and accordingly the Central Legislature has at the present time power to make laws with respect to any matter in any of the three lists.

It is plain, we think, that entries in the Legislative Lists can be found which would justify legislation on most matters covered by the general words in S.2 (1), Defence of India Act, as well as by the more precise provisions set out in sub-section (2) with its thirty five paragraphs. The draftsman of S.2 (1) appears to have adopted the language of the Emergency powers (Defence) Act, 1939, which has been passed by Parliament, not altogether happily, seeing that with the possible exception of 'the maintenance of public order', none of the purposes which he has set out are to be found under the same description among the matters comprised in the legislative lists. Counsel for the appellant however contended that legislation purporting to be with respect to 'the defence of India' as such was ultra vires the Central Legislature altogether. So far as we understood him, he was prepared to admit that many of the provisions in the Act of 1939 could be justified by one or more entries in the Legislative Lists, if they stood by themselves, but that if they purported to be provision 'with respect to the defence of India' then they were bad. He would not admit that some of the provisions in the Act might be good, even if others were bad for the reason which we have just given, for he argued that the Act represented a single legislative scheme every part of which was so closely interwoven with every other part that it was not possible to sever the valid from the invalid. This argument appears to us to be without any substance. If it can be shown that there are provisions in the Act of 1939 which are not covered by any of the entries in the Legislative Lists, then no doubt they will be open to challenge. It is however unnecessary in the present case that we should analyse for that purpose the Act and the Rules made under it since entry No. 1 of list 1 gives the Central Legislature in any event power to legislate with respect to preventive detention in British India for reasons of State connected with defence and certain other specified matters, and we see no reason why it is not permissible to treat any provisions with respect to this as severable from the rest of the Act and Rules even if all the latter are bad. We agree on this point with the High Court of Bombay. The High Court of Allahabad had substantially the same argument addressed to them and arrived at a similar conclusion in I.L.R. (1941) All. 617; see especially the judgment of Braund J.

The Canadian and Australian cases cited on behalf of the appellant do not assist him. In those Dominions the subject of 'defence' is a matter within the exclusive competence of the Dominion Parliament and the Commonwealth Parliament respectively. In the Canadian case, 1923 A.C. 695, the question was whether Dominion Legislation could be justified as a defence measure even though it trespassed on the provincial sphere, and the Privy Council returned an affirmative answer. A similar conclusion was reached in Australia (21 Commonwealth L.R. 433), and therefore it is true to say that the Courts have decided that the Central Legislature has by implication both in Canada and Australia all the powers of legislating with respect to 'defence' which S.102, Constitution Act, has expressly conferred on the Central Legislature in India.

We therefore reject the main argument addressed to us on behalf of the appellant, and if there were nothing more in the appeal, we should dismiss it without further discussion. There is however another aspect of the case, which was not argued until the Court itself drew the attention of counsel to it, for it seemed to us that it was open to question whether

R. 26 itself in its present form was within the rule-making powers conferred by the Defence of India Act. If it is not within those powers, then it must be held void and inoperative, either in whole or in part: and orders made under it will be similarly open to challenge. The power conferred on the Central Government by S.2(2) (X) of the Act we leave aside for the moment the more general powers in sub-section (1), is to make rules providing for the apprehension and detention in custody of any person reasonably suspected of being of hostile origin or of having acted, acting or being about to a act, in a manner prejudicial to the public safety or interest or to the defence of British India. Under R. 26 it is enough that the Central or provincial Government is satisfied with respect to any particular person that his detention is necessary with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order, His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian States, the maintenance of peaceful condition in tribal areas or the efficient prosecution of the war.

The reference to His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian States and the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas were added to the original rule by Notification dated 3rd August 1940. It will be seen that there is nothing about hostile origins. 'Reasonably suspected' implies the existence of suspicion for which there is reasonable justification: but by what test is the reasonableness of the justification to be determined? Nothing is said in R. 26 about suspicions, reasonable or otherwise, that the person concerned has acted, is acting, or is about to act in a prejudicial manner, those who framed it thought it sufficient to provide that the Government should be satisfied that the detention is necessary with a view to prevent the person concerned from acting in a 'prejudicial manner. We are compelled therefore to ask ourselves two questions: (1) whether 'reasonably suspected' in the rule making power means suspected on grounds which appear reasonable to the detaining authority or whether it means suspected on grounds which are in fact reasonable: and (2) whether a statutory power to make a rule for the detention of person reasonably suspected of having acted, of acting or of being about to act in a certain specified way justifies the making of rule which merely empowers Government to detain a person if it is satisfied that it is necessary to do so with a view to preventing him from acting in that way or in certain other ways also.

We approach the consideration of these question with the anxiety which a Court of Justice must always feel where the liberty of the subject is concerned; but we have at the same time to remember that the country is at war and that in war as it is known today every Government in the world has found it necessary to arm itself with powers untaught of and often unknown in time of peace. And though it is well to remember that, as was said in one of the judgments delivered in a case before this Court some years ago, Courts of law ought to abstain from harsh and ungenerous criticism of acts done in good faith by those who bear the burden and responsibility of Government, especially in times of danger and crisis, we are not on that account relieved from the duty of seeing that the executive Government does not seek to exercise powers in excess of those which the Legislature has thought fit to confer upon it, however drastic and far — reaching those powers may be and however great the emergency which they are designed to meet. Nevertheless, we must constantly bear in mind the purpose of the powers given since to use the words of Lord Macmillan in 1942 A.C. 206 at p. 252.

It is right so to interpret emergency legislation as to promote rather than to defeat its efficacy for the defence of the realm. That is accordance with a general rule applicable to the interpretation of all statutes or statutory regulations in peace time as well as in war time.

It may be that the draftsman of the Indian Act and Rules made thereunder intended that S.2 (2) (X) and R. 26 should have an effect similar to that which the House of Lords have now attributed to the Emergency powers (Defence) Act, 1939, and Regulation I.S.B. It may be so, but he has used different language. There is in the Indian Act no trace of an intention that any particular person or authority should exercise the power of detention. On the contrary, the selection of those who are to exercise this most important and exceptional power is left to be decided by the rules themselves (i.e., by the executive which makes the rules). The vast areas of the Indian subcontinent, the wholly different problems of Government which are to be found there, and the existence of eleven provinces in addition to the Central Government besides other subordinate governing authorities no doubt made it a more difficult task to select in advance an individual or individuals in whom these powers might be vested, as was done in the United Kingdom, but so far as we can see, there is nothing in the Act to prevent these powers being vested in any person or body, however insignificant or subordinate. It is one thing to confer a power to make a regulation empowering the Home Secretary to detain any person if he thinks it expedient to do so for a number of specified reasons; it is another thing altogether to confer a similar power on any person whom the Central Government may by rule choose to select, or to whom the Central Government may by rule give powers for the purpose. We are therefore left without any such guidance as the House of Lords had in (1942) A.C. 206 when we find ourselves called on to decide whether it is enough that the authority which is to be given the power of detention under the rules should satisfy itself that the suspicions which it entertains are reasonable. If the words in S.2 (2) (x) were the apprehension and detention in custody of any person suspected by the apprehending or detaining authority on grounds which appear to them to be reasonable, no difficulty would have arisen, but no such formula is used. But, even if we are to read the words as though they ran the apprehension and detention in custody of any person reasonably suspected by the apprehending or detaining authority, that does not seem to us necessary to imply that the authority's own belief in the reasonableness of their suspicions is not open to challenge.

It might well be argued that since the apprehending or detaining authority could be any person in India whom the Central Government chose to select when it framed its rules, it can never have been intended that any person could be detained without trial and by mere executive act unless there were reasonable grounds in fact for suspecting that he had brought himself within the scope of para (x). It will be said that the Central Government must be trusted only to make any rules vesting this power in responsible persons or authorities. The Central Government has in fact vested them in itself and in the Provincial Governments, that is to say, the Governor-General in Council and the Governor and those who advise him, whether Ministers or others. In the United Kingdom the number of persons detained under Regulation 18B, according to public statements made from time to time, has not been so large as to make it impossible for the Secretary of State to consider personally each case. We may take judicial notice of the fact that the numbers in India on the other hand have been, comparatively speaking, very large; and it is difficult to suppose that the Governor-General in Council or the Governors with their advisers have always been able to give their personal attention to each case; so that the consideration of the facts must have been left in very many instances, to put it no higher, to officials, sometimes, no doubt highly placed, but not necessarily so. In these circumstances those in whom the legal right to detain is vested might not always find it easy to form an opinion of their own whether the person apprehended or detained is reasonably suspected or not. If this be so, it would certainly seem that the more natural construction of the words of para (x) is that there must be suspicions which are reasonable in fact and not merely suspicions which some as yet unspecified person or authority might regard as reasonable.

We do not however think it necessary to express a final opinion on the difficult point of construction involved in the first of the two questions we have propounded, in view of the answer which we find ourselves compelled to give to the second. The second question was whether a statutory power to make a rule for the detention of persons reasonably suspected of having acted, or acting or being about to act in a manner prejudicial to certain specified matters justifies the making of a rule which empowers Government to detain a person if it is satisfied that it is necessary to do so with a view to prevent him from acting in a manner prejudicial to any of the matters so specified, or to any of certain other specified matters as well. We need hardly point out the divergence between R.26 and para (x) of S.2 (2) of the Act which is clearly intended to be the authority for making the rule. The Act authorizes the making a rule for the detention of persons reasonably suspected of certain things, the rule would enable the Central Government or any Provincial Government to detain a person about whom it need have no suspicions, reasonable or unreasonable, that he has acted, is acting or is about to act in any prejudicial manner at all. The Government has only to be satisfied that with a view to preventing him from acting in a particular way it is necessary to detain him. The Government may come to the conclusion that it would be wiser to take no risks, and may therefore subject a person to preventive detention against whom there is no evidence or reasonable suspicion of past or present prejudicial act or of any actual intention of acting prejudicially; and R. 26 gives it power to do so. We can find nothing in para (x) which justifies a rule in such terms. The Legislature might have conferred upon the Central Government the power of making a rule as wide as this, but we are clear that it had not yet done so. A rule made under existing statutory powers can only confer a right to detain those persons who fall within the scope of para (x), that is, persons reasonably suspected of the things mentioned in that paragraph. There is no power to detain a person because the Government thinks that he may do something hereafter or because it may think that he is a man likely to do it, he must be a person about whom suspicions of the kind mentioned in the paragraph are reasonably entertained. The Legislature having set out in plain and unambiguous language in para (x) the scope of the rules which may be made providing for apprehension and detention in custody, it is not permissible to pray in aid the more general words in S.2 (1) in order to justify a rule which so plainly goes beyond the limits of para (x); though if para (x) were not in the Act at all, perhaps different considerations might apply; see 1917 A.C. 260. It may be that the Government has only made detention orders in the case of persons who are reasonably suspected in the manner required by para (x) but that is immaterial; the question is not what the Government have in fact done under the rule, but what the rule authorizes them to do; and in our opinion it is impossible so to interpret the rule to restrict its operation to the suspected persons of para (x). We are compelled therefore to hold that R.26 in its present form goes beyond the rule-making powers which the Legislature has thought fit to confer upon the Central Government and is for that reason invalid.

We have already drawn attention to the addition made to the rule in 1940, which empowers

Government to detain persons with a view to preventing them from acting in a manner prejudicial to 'His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian States and the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas'. These additional words are clearly suggested by entry No. 1 in List I of the Legislative Lists, which authorizes the Central Legislature to legislate with respect to preventive detention for purposes connected with defence and the other matters which we have just mentioned. There can be no doubt therefore that it was competent for the Central Legislature to confer a power to make rules with respect to preventive detention in connexion with all these matters; but it seems to us very doubtful whether it can as yet be said to have done so. It has conferred the power to make rules with respect to detention for purposes connected with defence; and from the express mention of detention alone in para (x) it seems to follow that no power has been conferred to make rules with respect to detention for purposes connected with these other matters as such which it is plain that the language of entry No. 1 of List I regards as in a separate category from defence. We are therefore disposed to think that R.26 would be in any event beyond the rule making power which has been conferred, so far as regards the addition made to it by the Notification dated 3rd August 1940; but having regards however to the view which we take of the rule as a whole, it is unnecessary for us to consider whether or to what extent the addition is severable from the rest of the rule. We think it right to refer to certain observations made by one of the learned Judges in the Court below. He says this;

As I have pointed out, there is no doubt that it was competent to the Government of Bombay to detain the applicant on the ground that his detention was necessary in as much as he was acting in a manner prejudicial to the defence of British India and also for the maintenance of public order. It may be that the other two grounds given in the order are not justified by any of the items in Sch. 7 But if the two or even one of the two grounds are justified as coming within the competence of the Indian Legislature, I do not think it makes any difference to the validity of the order if the Government of Bombay proceed to give further reasons which are not well founded.

We doubt whether this is a correct statement of the law. If a detaining authority gives four reasons for detaining a man, without distinguishing between them, and any two or three of the reasons are held to be bad, it can never be certain to what extent the bad reasons operated on the mind of the authority or whether the detention order would have been made at all if only one or two good reasons had been before them. We confess that an order in the terms of that under which the appellant in the present case has been detained fills us with uneasiness. It recites that the Government of Bombay is satisfied that, with a view to preventing the said Keshav Talpade from acting in a manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order and the efficient prosecution of the war, 'it is necessary to make an order of detention against him.

This reads like a mere mechanical recital of the language of R. 26. We do not know the evidence which persuaded the Government of Bombay that it was necessary to prevent the appellant from acting in a manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order and the efficient prosecution of the war, but we may be forgiven for wondering whether a person who is described as an authorized petition writer on the insolvency side of the Bombay High Court was really as dangerous a character as the recital of all these four grounds in the order of detention suggests. The order does nothing to remove the apprehension already expressed that many cases the persons in whom this grave power is vested may have had no opportunity of applying their minds to the facts of every case which comes before them. Our attention was drawn in the course of the argument to S.16 of the Act. Section 16 (1) provides;

No order made in exercise of any power conferred by or under this Act shall be called in question in any Court.

We are clearly of opinion that where the order is made under or by virtue of a rule which is invalid and therefore of no force or effect, the order is a nullity and S.16 (1) has no application. We recognise that our decision may be a cause of inconvenience and possibly of embarrassment, even though temporarily, to the executive authority. We regret that this would be so, especially in these difficult times; but we venture to express an earnest hope that greater care may be taken hereafter to secure that powers of this extraordinary kind which may affect, and indeed have affected, the liberty of so many of the King's subjects in India, may be defined with great precision and exactitude, so as to reduce to as small a compass as possible the risk that persons may find themselves apprehended and detained without Legal warrant. The appeal will be allowed and the case remitted of the High Court of Bombay with a direction to the Court to dispose of the appellant's application in the light of the observations made in our judgment

Appeal allowed.

Federal Court Judgment in Talpade's Case

[A] We desire also to draw the attention of those who have the power of making orders of detention to what we have thought it right to say with regard to the obligation which lies on them to specify as clearly and accurately as they can the true grounds on which the order is made.

Note by Home Department

As regards [A] I suggest that the Court was going entirely beyond its function in suggesting that the Executive authorities should give reasons for their action when passing orders of detention under Defence Rule 26. It is perfectly obvious that in wartime we may have to detain people without trial on extremely good evidence derived from sources of the utmost secrecy and that we should be gravely endangering the safety of the realm if we were under any obligation to state our reasons in every case. I imagine that the Home Secretary in England is under no such obligation: and it would obviously be undesirable to state reasons in some cases and not in others.

29: Baldeo Das on behalf of Kamlapati Tewari – (Applicant) v. Emperor [Iqbal Ahmad C.J. (30 April 1943)]

AIR, Vol. 30, 1943, Allahabad, pp. 331–4

Criminal Misc. Case No. 356 of 1943, Decided on 30th April 1943.

Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru,* P.N. Sapru and T.N. Sapru --- for Applicant. Government Advocate – for the Crown.

Order

This is an application under S.491, Criminal P.C., and was filed on 27th April last by one Baldeva Das with a view to secure the release of Pt. Kamlapati Tewari from detention under an order purporting to be made under R.26 of the Defence of India Rules. The application is supported by an affidavit which shows that Kamlapati Tewari, who is a member of the Legislative Assembly, United Provinces, attended a meeting of the All India Congress Committee at Bombay and, on his return journey from Bombay was arrested at the Allahabad Railway Station on the night of 10th August 1942, and is at present detained under R. 26. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, who appeared for the applicant, contended that R.26 of the Defence of India Rules was invalid and submitted that it had been so held in a recent case by the Federal Court.¹ On 27th April I adjourned the hearing of the application to this date to enable Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru to file a certified copy of the judgment of the Federal Court and he has today filed a copy of that judgment of the Federal Court (Case No. 5 1943). A perusal of the copy shows that the Federal Court has held that rule 26 in its present form goes beyond the rule making powers which the Legislature has thought fit to confer upon the Central Government and is for that reason invalid.

If the matter rested there, there would be no answer to the present application. The Government Advocate, however, submitted that, in the interval that elapsed between 27th April and today's date the Governor-General had passed an Ordinance that nullified the effect of the decision of the Federal Court and in support of this submission, he produced a copy of an Extraordinary Gazette of India dated 29th April 1943. The Ordinance relied upon by the Government Advocate is published in this Gazette and is Ordinance No. 14 of 1943. The Ordinance is headed as 'An Ordinance further to amend the Defence of India Act, 1939' and the preamble to the Ordinance is as follows:

'Whereas an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary further to amend the Defence of India Act, 1939 (35 of 1939) for the purpose here in after appearing:

Now, therefore, I exercise, of the powers conferred by S.72, Government of India Act, as set out in the Ninth Schedule to the Government of India Act, 1935 (26 Geo. V.C. 2) the Governor-General is pleased to make and promulgate the following Ordinance.

The Ordinance contains three sections which read as follows:

1. Short title and commencement—

- (2) This Ordinance may be called the Defence of India (Amendment) Ordinance, 1943.
- (2) It shall come into force at once.

2. Substitution of new clause for cl. (x) of S.2 (2) Act 35 of 1939: For Cl. (x) of Sub-section (2), Defence of India Act, 1939 (35 of 1939), the following clause shall be substituted and shall be deemed always to have been substituted, namely:

(X) the apprehension and detention in custody of any person whom the authority empowered by the rules to apprehend or detain as the case may be suspects on grounds appearing to such authority to be reasonable, of being of hostile origin, or of having acted, acting, being about to act, or being likely to act in a manner prejudicial to the public safety or interest, the defence of British India, the maintenance of public order, His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian States, the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas or the efficient prosecution of the war, or with respect to whom such authority is satisfied that his apprehension and detention are necessary for the purpose of preventing him from acting in any such prejudicial manner, the prohibition of such person from entering or residing or remaining in any area, and the compelling of such person to reside and remain in any area, or to do or abstain from doing anything.

3. Validity of orders made under R.26, Defence of India Rules: For the removal of doubts it is hereby enacted that no order heretofore made against any person under R.26 of the Defence of India Rules shall be deemed to be invalid or shall be called in question on the ground merely that the said rule purported to confer powers in excess of the powers that might at the time the said rule was made be lawfully conferred by a rule made or deemed to have been made under S.2, Defence of India Act, 1939.'

The Ordinance, prima facie, puts the validity of rule 26 beyond question and furnishes a complete answer to the application of Baldeva Das, but the validity of the Ordinance itself was questioned by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru. He contended that by S.72, Government of India Act as set out in sch. 9, Government of India Act, 1935, the Governor-General was empowered to make and promulgate ordinances only with prospective and not with retrospective effect. He, therefore, maintained that if the ordinance purported to amend the Defence of India Act with retrospective effect it was ultra vires the Governor-General. In the alternative he contended that on a true interpretation the Ordinance could only operate from the date it was promulgated, and as such, could not adversely affect the application of Baldeva Das that was filed on 27th April, a day before the Ordinance was promulgated. In my judgment there is no force in these contentions. Section 72, Government of India Act, as set out in sch. 9, Government of India Act, 1935, gives wide and extensive power to the Governor-General to make and promulgate ordinance and reads as follows:

72. The Governor General may, in cases of emergency, make and promulgate ordinances for the peace and good Government of British India or any part thereof, and any ordinance so made shall, for the space of not more than six months from its promulgation, have the like force of law as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature, but the power of making ordinances under this section is subject to the like restrictions as the power of the Indian Legislature to make laws; and any ordinance made under this section is subject to the disallowance as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature, and may be controlled or superseded by any such Act.

In view of this provision, it is clear that, though the power to make ordinances' is subject to like restrictions as the power of the Indian Legislature to make laws', an ordinance that does not contravene such restrictions has, when made and promulgated, 'the like force of law as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature.' It was not suggested the Governor-General in making and promulgating the Ordinance in question transgressed any such restrictions. Further it is not and cannot be disputed that it is within the competence of the Indian Legislature to make laws with retrospective effect. The Governor-General is, therefore, competent to make and promulgate ordinance giving the same retrospective effect. It follows that the Governor-General had the power to make amendments in the Defence of India Act and give such amendments retrospective effect.

The question, however, remains whether the amendments introduced by the Ordinance in the Defence of India Act are with retrospective effect. In my judgment, they are. By S.2 of the Ordinance a new clause has been substituted for cl. (x) of S.2 (2), Defence of India Act, and S.2 of the Ordinance does not merely substitute the new clause for the previous one but proceeds to enjoin that the new clause 'shall be deemed always to have been substituted'. The words just quoted are of clear and unambiguous import and plainly indicate that the substituted clause must always be deemed to have existed in the Defence of India Act. The amendment made in that Act by the Ordinance is, therefore, to my mind, with retrospective effect. The historical background of the Ordinance also unmistakably points to the same conclusion. Sub-section (1) of S.2, Defence of India Act, confers wide powers on the Central Government to make rules for securing the objects specified therein and enacts as follows:

2. (1) The Central Government may by notification in the official Gazette, make such rules as appear to it to be necessary or expedient for securing the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order or the efficient prosecution of war, or for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community. . . .

No. 15/6/43 – Poll (I)

New Delhi, the 1st May, 1943.

Subject: Observations of the Federal Court regarding the exercise of the powers conferred by Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules.

The Federal Court in its recent judgment appears to have been under the mistaken impression that all orders under Defence Rule 26 had been issued in the name, and under the authority, of the Central or a Provincial Government, and it, therefore, formed the conclusion, considering the total number of orders issued, that each one of them could not have received the attention it deserved from the issuing authority. The Court seems to have overlooked the powers of delegation under section 2 (4) and (5) of the Defence of India Act and the fact, in consequence of such delegation, that each order required the personal 'satisfaction' of a responsible official. Nevertheless, we have little doubt that the main consideration which weighed with the Federal Court was the view, which we cannot but share, that powers of detention without trial are wholly exceptional and must be exercised with the greatest care.

2. We have no intention of depriving ourselves or Provincial Governments of the powers of delegation referred to above, since we consider them essential to deal with extreme emergencies, especially when communications are upset. But we feel, and trust you will agree, that delegation of power to detain without trial under Defence Rule 26 (1) (b) should not be delegated to any subordinate authority except for the period of such emergencies and that any delegation made should be cancelled as soon as the emergency ceases to exist. It seems to us most doubtful whether such an emergency does now exist in any part of India and we accordingly request to you to consider, if you have not already done so the cancelling of any directions made under Defence of India Act 2 (5) so far as Defence Rule 26 (1) (b) is concerned. Whether the other powers under that rule should be left to authorities such as District Magistrates is a matter for your discretion, but we think they should certainly not be exercised in normal times by any lower authority.

In addition to the action suggested above, we also suggest (and this really amounts only to an extension of the scope of our letter No. 3/30/43 - Poll (I), dated 3rd April 1943¹) that you should review all detention orders passed by subordinate officers since August the 9th 1942. Where you are satisfied that these orders must remain in force, we are inclined to think there might be some advantage in replacing them by orders issued by the Provincial Governments itself.

3. Finally there is the question of the form in which detention orders under Defence Rule 26 should in future be issued. The Federal Court seems to have been perturbed by the practice of reciting in the order all or most of the objects in relation to which such an order may be issued and to have implied that the correct course is to specify the particular object or objects to which the action taken is to be related. No order can, of course, be expected to reveal the evidence (much of which may be secret) on which the authority concerned is satisfied that it is necessary, but we agree that in future it will be better to quote in the order only those grounds referred to in the rule which have a direct bearing on the case.

Review of Janayuddha

In the article under the Caption 'Sudhu Mukher Kathai Kaj Hai Na' (Nothing could be done by words only) it says that inspite of repeated and renewed hopes by the authorities to solve the food problem, the situation did not improve. Over and above this the coal problem was again in view inspite of very satisfactory work by the volunteers of the Defence Committee, the authorities were not co-operating with the Committee. So it demanded the co-operation of authorities with the Defence Committee in solving the food problem.

In the editorial column the heading 'Congress Netader Mukti Chai' (we demand the release of Congress leaders), it says that as a result of the decision of the Federal Court declaring the Rule 26 of D.I. Rules as illegal, India did not get back their leaders released but got another Ordinance. This proved that the supreme power of the Government of India was not with the Federal Court but in the hand of the Viceroy. This also proved that the power of releasing the Congress leaders was not in the hands of the legal professionals, but in the hands of the volunteers of the country. They could achieve their aim only by national strength. The new Ordinance of the Viceroy was standing in the way of the country's demand for meetings of Gandhi and Jinnah for the national unity. The days are coming when the decision of the Federal Court and the Viceroy's Ordinance will be turned into small past incidents. Let India raise the demand of national unity and the release of the political leaders.

Sir,

I enclose a statement showing the particulars of the orders issued by the District Magistrate since the 9th August 1942 under Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules. All these cases have subsequently been covered by Government Orders. Orders under the Rule were not passed either by the Additional District Magistrate or by the sub Divisional Magistrates in this district during the above period.

(2) With regard to items (1) and (2) of the statement, orders under Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules were passed by the District Magistrate first and subsequently the Government in G.O. No. MS 2872, public (Gl) Department, dated 15-9-42 passed orders under sub rule 5 of Rule 26 for the detention of the two persons in the Central Jail, Vellore. A detailed report was already submitted to the Government in the above two cases in this office R.O.C. Cl-921/M-Confdl/42-IV-(b) dated 6-9-42 and R.O.C. Cl-921-M/Confdl/42-IV(a) dated 6-9-42. In all other cases noted in the statement, reports were submitted to the Government recommending the issue of orders under rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules; but as orders were not received from the Government before the expiry of the 15 days' time allowed under rule 129 of the Defence of India Rules, orders under rule 26 were passed by the District Magistrate for their detention in the local sub jails. In all these cases the orders of the Government were subsequently received and the District Magistrate's orders were thereupon revoked and the persons concerned were sent for detention in the Vellore Central Jail under the Government Orders. The No. and date of the Government orders in these cases are noted in the statement.

(3) Copies² of all the orders passed under Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules are submitted as directed.

A.K. Fazlul Haque, N.C. Chatterjee, J.C. Gupta, Kumud Bandhu Bagchi, R.S. Bachawat, Sudhansu Sen, P.K. Bose, Subimal Roy, S.M. Murshed and Sadhan Chandra Gupta for Petitioners.

S.M. Bose' (Acting Advocate General), J.N. Majumdar (Standing Counsel), and Ch. Roy Choudhury and M.N. Ghose for the Crown.

Mitter J. – The nine persons on whose behalf applications under S.491. Criminal P.C., have been made before us by their relations have been detained in different jails in pursuance of orders passed under R. 26, Defence of India Rules, on diverse dates between 24th October 1940 and 8th March 1943. Those applications were made on 24th April 1943 after the Federal Court had declared their said rule to be ultra vires S.2, sub.S.(2), cl. (x) Defence of India Act (35 of 1939), in Keshav Talpade v. Emperor.¹ On the same date, nine rules were issued on the Crown to shew cause why the said persons should not be released. Those rules came on for hearing before us on 7th May 1943. At an early stage of the hearing, seven out of the nine detenus applied to us to give them facilities to swear affidavits in jail. We granted their prayer.

They swore affidavits and those affidavits have been put on the record with liberty to the Crown to file affidavits in answer. Another affidavit sworn by Dr Nalinaksha Sanyal,' a member of the Bengal Legislative Assembly and a first cousin of Sasanka Sekhar Sanyal, one of the detenus, was put before us. The Crown objected to the reception of that affidavit but we overruled that objection and directed that affidavit to be put on the record, the Crown being given liberty to file an affidavit in answer. At the time when we admitted Dr Nalinaksha Sanyal's affidavit we intimated that we would give reasons in our judgment for admitting the said affidavit.

At the time when Dr Nalinaksha's affidavit was put in, the advocate for the petitioners stated that as that affidavit embodied only the proceeding in the Legislative Assembly which would be relevant in all the nine cases before as it would be a needless repetition to file affidavit of exactly the same nature in the other eight cases. They accordingly prayed verbally that the formality of having eight more affidavits of the same nature, one in each of the other eight cases, may be dispensed with and Dr Nalinaksha Sanyal's affidavit may be allowed to be used in all the nine cases which we were hearing together. To that course the learned Advocate-General did not object and we allowed the prayer. The Crown has put in an affidavit in answer affirmed by Mr Porter,' who at all material times had been the Additional Secretary in the Home Department of the Government of Bengal, to meet the allegations made in the affidavit of the seven detenus and those made in the affidavit of Dr Nalinaksha Sanyal. The orders passed on the nine detenus under R. 26 have produced by the Crown for our perusal. True copies of those orders have been put on the record. After the decision of the Federal Court in Keshav Talpade's case the Governor-General has, on 28th April 1943, made and promulgated an Ordinance (ordinance No. 14 of 1943, hereafter to be called the Ordinance) under S.72 of Sch. 9. Government of India Act. That Ordinance is as follows:

'Whereas an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary further to amend the Defence of India Act, 1939 (35 pf 1939) for the purpose herein after appearing:

Now therefore in exercise of the powers conferred by S.72, Government of India Act, as set out in Sch. 9, Government of India Act (26 Geo. V.C.2) the Governor-General is pleased to make and promulgate the following Ordinance;

1. Short title and Commencement — (1) This Ordinance may be called the Defence of India (Amendment) Ordinance, 1943. (2) It shall come into force at once.

2. Substitution of new clause for cl. (r) of S.2 (2), Act 35 of 1939 — For (x) of Sub-section (2) of S.2. Defence of India Act, 1939 (35 of 1939), the following clause shall be substituted, and shall be deemed always to have substituted namely;

(x) the apprehension and detention in custody of any person whom the authority empowered by the rules to apprehend or detain as the case may be suspects, on grounds, appearing to such authority to be reasonable, of being of hostile origin, or having acted, acting, being about to act, or being likely to act a manner prejudicial to the public safety or interest, the defence of British India, the maintenance of public order. His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian States, the maintenance of peaceful relations in tribal areas or the efficient prosecution of the war, or in respect of whom such authority is satisfied that his apprehension, and detention are necessary for the purpose of preventing him from acting in such prejudicial manner, the prohibition of such person from entering or residing or remaining in any area, and the compelling of such person to reside and remain in any area, or to do or abstain from doing anything.

3. Validity of orders under Rule 26, Defence of India Rules. — For the removal of doubts it is hereby enacted that no order therefore made against any person under R. 26 of the Defence of India Rules shall be deemed to be invalid or shall be called in question on the ground merely that the said rule purported to confer powers in excess of the powers that might at the time the said rule was made be lawfully conferred by a rule made or deemed to have been made under S.2, Defence of India Act, 1939.'

The underlined (here italicized) portions of S.2 of the Ordinance represent the amendments made to S.2, sub-section (2), cl. (x) Defence of India Act, 1939. Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules was left intact, but by the aforesaid amendment of S.2 (2), cl. (x), Defence of India Act, 1939, the ground on which the Federal Court had pronounced R. 26 to be ultra vires was cut away. To regularize the detentions that had been made in the past by orders made under R. 26 and to prevent the legality of those orders for detention being challenged in Courts the amendment was given retrospective operation and S.3 of the Ordinance was enacted with the same purpose in view. The Crown pleads this ordinance in answer to the claim for release of the nine detenus.

The petitioners have urged the following points:

- (1) That the whole of S.2, Defence of India Act, both in its original and amended forms, is ultra vires the Indian Legislature. (2) That the portion of cl. (x) of S.2 (2) of the said Act, which has been added by the amendment made by the Ordinance is ultra vires the Indian Legislature and accordingly of the Governor-General's power under S.72 of Sch. 9. The corresponding portions of R. 26 of the Defence of India Rules are bad and consequently the orders of detention in the cases we have before us are bad. . . .
- (3) That the Governor-General has no power to repeal or amend directly any Act of the Federal Legislature by an Ordinance made and promulgated under S.72, of sch. 9, Government of India Act, 1935. (4) That it is only the Central Indian Legislature that has the power to repeal or amend an Act of the Central India Legislature passed under the provisions of S.102, Government of India Act. (5) That the Governor-General has no power to legislate by such an ordinance on any subject enumerated in List II, of Sch. 7, Government of India Act. (6) That in any event the Governor-General has no power to give retrospective operation to such an ordinance. (7) That in any event the Ordinance (14 of 1943) cannot affect proceedings which were pending at the date of its promulgation. (8) That S.3 of the Ordinance (14 of 1943) has no independent existence apart from S.2 of the said Ordinance and must stand or fall with that section (9) That Rule 26, defence of Indian Rules, had no existence in the eye of law on 29th September 1939, when the Defence of India Act was passed and so does not exist even now either in its original or amended forms. (10) That even if R.26 be intra vires the detention of the nine persons whose cases are before us was improper.

(1) Section 2, Defence of India Act, is ultra vires.

In Talpade's case the Federal Court has decided that the Defence of India Act is not ultra vires the powers of the Central Indian Legislature, that most of the matters covered by the general words in S.2(1) as well as by the more precise provisions set out in sub-section. (2) with its 35 paragraphs are covered by Lists, I, and III of Sch.7, Government of India Act. That judgment also indicates that preventive detention for the defence of British India being in item 1 of List I, the Central Indian Legislature would have been competent to legislate on that subject. That omission in cl. (x) of S.2 (2), on the basis of which R. 26, Defence of India Rules, was pronounced to be bad, has now been supplied by Ordinance 14 of 1943. Neither the Federal Court's judgment or the amendment made by the said ordinance, however, concludes this point by reason of the form in which it has been urged before us. For the purpose of dealing with this point I would assume that Ordinance 14 of 1943 is a good enactment, and that S.2 (1) and in particular cl. (x) of S.2 (2), Defence of India Act, both in its original and final shape, includes matters which are in list I and List II, and none of the matters go beyond the three Lists of schedule 7.

The arguments before us have proceeded on these lines; (a) that on a declaration of grave emergency made by the Governor-General under S.102, Government of India Act, the Central Indian Legislature no doubt acquires the power to legislate on matters enumerated in List II, but then it can legislate on those matters for one Province at a time, that is to say, one such Act cannot comprise more than one Province, and (b) in any case it cannot in one enactment include in an inseparable manner matters coming in List I and List II. These two questions depend solely upon the interpretation of S.102, Government of India Act. The questions raised are of first impression. I can at once say that I cannot accept those contentions. For deciding the points raised. SS.99 (1), 100 and 102 must be read together, and the definition of the word 'Province' as given in S.46 (3), Government of India Act, must be borne in mind. It means the Governor's province and does not include the areas under the administration of Chief Commissioners. Section 100, Sub-section. (4) has an important bearing on the construction of the phrase, 'to make laws for a province' used in S.102 (1). It is on this phrase only that the first part of the contention of the petitioners' advocates is based. Leaving out of consideration British Baluchistan, which is specially dealt with in S.95, the Central Indian Legislature has powers to legislate in respect of matters covered by List II of all areas not comprised in Governor's provinces, e.g. for the Chief Commissioners' Provinces apart from the provisions of S.102. Apart from S.102, it cannot legislate on matters coming within List II for the Governors provinces. Section 99 (1) defines the local extent of Acts passed by the Central Indian Legislature (Federal Legislature during the transitional period), and S.100 distributes between the Centre and the provinces the subjects of legislation. The phrase 'make laws for a province' used in S.102 (1), accordingly does not mean 'make laws for one particular province at a time' That phrase had to be used in S.102 (1) because of the language employed in S.100, sub-section (4). The real effect of S.102 (1) in any judgment is to destroy the separation of the subject matter of legislation in regard to Governors provinces which had been created by S.100 sub-section (3) on a grave emergency being declared by the Governor-General. On such a declaration list II is to be regarded as part and parcel of List I and the Central Indian Legislature which has by virtue of S.99 (1) the power to legislate over the whole of British India, would acquire the power to legislate over whole of the said area (which necessarily includes all the Governors' Provinces) in respect of matters contained in List II. There is thus nothing in the Government of India Act which would prevent the Central Indian Legislature from making one enactment which would have operation over more than one Governor's Province.

In construing S.102 (1) I have already indicated my view that List II is fused, so to say, into List I on the declaration of grave emergency. If there was nothing more in the other parts of S.102, the Central Indian Legislature would have the power to legislate by one enactment on matters of both those lists in an inseparable manner. It had from before the power to legislate over the whole of British India, which covers the areas under the administration of Governors in matters coming in List I and by reason of the declaration of grave emergency it acquires the power to legislate in respect of matters mentioned in List II for areas included in Governor's Provinces. To meet these conclusions the learned advocates for the petitioners refer us to sub-section (4) of section 102. The argument is that an Act passed by the Central Indian Legislature on matter contained in List I has ordinarily permanent duration. Unless the particular enactment expressly limits its duration it would be on the statute book till expressly repealed by it. An Act however dealing with matters contained in List II passed by the Central Indian Legislature in pursuance of S.102 would be of limited duration unless the proclamation of emergency had been approved by Parliament, such an Act would last for one year from the date of the proclamation of emergency. The petitioners' advocates say that if these conclusions are sound, and I hold that they are, after the expiry of a year from the date of the proclamation of emergency a part of the enactment that which dealt with List I would remain on the statute book and the other part that which dealt with subjects mentioned in List II would cease to have effect, and if matters of the two lists were essentially and inseparably connected in substance in that enactment, the part that would remain would be unworkable. They accordingly say that as parliament never intended such a result it must be held that the Central Indian Legislature has no power to Legislate on subjects of Lists I and II in that manner. The argument, in my judgment, is of no substance. It proceeds upon an entire misconception of the provisions of S.102, S. Sub-section (4). The Central Indian Legislature can say in express terms that a particular enactment on a subject mentioned in List I shall have force for such a limited period of time which it chooses. By combining the matters mentioned in List I with matters mentioned in List II it says by necessary implication, what could have been said in express terms, that provisions made in the enactment which bears upon the subjects of List I would cease to have effect at the same time when the Provisions of that enactment relating to matters mentioned in List II would cease to have operation by virtue of the Provisions of S.102, Sub-section (4) I accordingly overrule ground No. 1.

(2) The portion added to S.2 (2) Cl. (x) by ordinance 14 of 1943 is ultra vires

The amendment introduces detention for preventing a person from acting in a manner prejudicial to the public safety of interest, the defence of British India, the maintenance of public order, His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian States, the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas or the efficient prosecution of the war. The argument is that defence of British India is not one of the subjects enumerated in the Lists of Sch. 7, Government of India Act, and of the subject mentioned above 'preventive detention for reasons connected with public order' is the only subject enumerated in those lists, that subject being one of the subjects mentioned in item 1 of List II. I am not convinced that this is correct. In the first place, I cannot say that Parliament kept away all matters concerning defence of British India from the province of the Indian Legislatures. Items 1, 2, 3, 17, 29 and 30 of List I in some form or other have direct relation to defence and war, and items 1 and 29 of List II and No. 34 of List III may in some circumstance have relation to those subjects. In the second place, the last part of item 1 of List I gives power to the Central Indian Legislature to make laws dealing with preventive detention for reasons of state connected with defence and external affairs. All that is required is that there should be a connexion with defence. In my judgment, all the items mentioned in s.2 (2) Cl. (x) as amended by the Ordinance are intimately connected with defence of British India. Efficient prosecution of this war is directly connected with the defence of British India, when Japan is almost knocking at the gates of India. On the maintenance of public safety, interest and public order, on the maintenances of His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian States and on the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas, which border on British India, depend the effective prosecution of this war and so those matters are connected with defence of British India.

I am prepared to go further and to hold that all the matters mentioned in clause (x) of S.2 (2), Defence of India Act, and in the amendment made thereto by the Ordinance fall within List I, being matters connected with defence and that more of them comes within List II. Items of List I may overlap items of List II but the pith and substance of the particular legislative enactment must be looked at to see if the subject-matter of that enactment comes within items of List I or List II. On this view the second portion of this ground as urged before us does not arise I accordingly overrule this ground also.

(3) Governor-General has no power to repeal or amend an act of the Central Indian legislature

This point has been urged before us by the petitioners on the following basis: (a) An ordinance made and promulgated under S.72 of Sch. 9 being by nature of a limited duration cannot repeal or amend an Act of the Legislature which is by nature of unlimited duration. (b) When two equally competent legislative bodies deriving the authority to legislate from the same paramount Legislature, namely the Parliament, can operate on the same field, one of such bodies cannot directly repeal or amend the laws passed by the other unless the authority which created those two legislative bodies had expressly conferred on one the power of repealing or amending the enactments made by the other. (c) That Parliament never intended to confer the power on the Governor-General to directly repeal or amend an Act of the Central Indian Legislature.

I propose to deal with these grounds together. I may at once say that if I could have answered grounds (b) and (c) in favour of the Crown, I would have felt no difficulty in rejecting ground (a). There is, in my judgment, no principle which would prevent a Legislature directly to repeal or amend its own permanent enactment by an enactment of a temporary nature. The power to repeal or amend flows from the power to enact. Repeal by a temporary measure would be construed as the suspension for a limited period of time of the provisions of the earlier permanent statute. The question in substance would be a matter of interpretation only. This is the view which has been expressed by Lord Ellenborough C.J. in (1809) 10 East 569 at p. 573. It is, however, quite a different question when one legislative body attempts directly, that is by the expressed force of its provision, to repeal or amend the enactments of another equally competent legislative body.

The Central Indian legislature derives its authority and powers from Parliament. The Governor-General, who also derives authority from Parliament, exercises legislative functions on fulfilling the conditions required by S.72 of Sch. 9. Emergency gives him the power to legislate for peace and good Government of India. He then becomes a legislative organ. The same Act of Parliament gives him the power to legislate under S.72, which gives authority to the Central Indian Legislature to legislate. He cannot legislate on matters on which the Central Indian Legislature cannot legislate. The only difference is that an emergency must exist (of which he is the sole judge) before he can embark on legislation by Ordinance, and the legislation must be for the peace and good Government of British India. But whether the particular provisions which he chooses to enact would promote peace or good Government is a matter which is entirely within his judgment. The propriety of the particular piece of legislation cannot be questioned by any outside body: 58 I.A. 169. But he cannot act in excess of the powers conferred on him by Parliament. Subject to what has been indicated above, he cannot make a provision in his ordinance that the validity of its provisions or a particular provision therein shall not be challenged in Courts of judicature in India on the ground of ultra vires his powers. Such a provision would be illegal and would be discarded by Courts, on the principle that he would thereby be able to extend his power to make laws, which Parliament never intended for him. I am making these general observations in view of the provisions of Ordinance 14 of 1943 and by way of introduction.

On an emergency the Governor-General encroaches upon the field of the Central Indian Legislature. The Ordinances made and promulgated under S.72 of Sch. 9 during the transitional period and those made and promulgated under S.43 after the introduction of part II, Government of India Act, have the same force and effect as Acts passed by the Central Indian Legislature, the Indian Legislature during the transitional period and the Federal Legislature after part II has come into operation. There is thus the possibility of an Ordinance made by the Governor-General on an emergency coming into conflict with an Act passed by the Central Indian Legislature. The learned Advocate-General argues, and I dare say rightly that when such a contingency happens, it must be held that the provisions of the Ordinance would prevail over these of the Act of the Central Legislature. There are two sound principles behind that contention of the learned Advocate-General. One is that where there are two legislative enactments having the same force and effect, the last in point of time must prevail. The other principle is that the special enactment would prevail over the general. I must therefore accept the contention that by creating a repugnancy the Governor-General can destroy or mutilate an Act of the Central Indian Legislature by an Ordinance made and promulgated by him on an emergency. The next step in the argument of the learned Advocate-General requires careful consideration. It is, that when the Governor-General can indirectly do away with or modify an Act of the Central Indian Legislature, there is no reason why he cannot directly, that is to say by the express provisions of his Ordinance, repeal or amend an Act of the Central Indian Legislature. The principle on which he stands, using his words, is that an authority can do that directly which it can do indirectly. At first sight his contention would appear to be a sound one, but on careful consideration I do not consider it to be so.

Where one legislative body seeks to do away with the enactment of another legislative body equally competent to legislate on the subject by creating what appears prima facie to be a repugnancy, it is exclusively within the province of the Courts to decide whether in fact the repugnancy exist, and if it does, to decide which enactment should prevail. The question whether a repugnancy actually exists is often a difficult question.

[Omitted: A historical survey of the background to the Privy Council appeal case re. Attorney-General for Ontario V. Attorney-General for the Dominion of Canada. (1896 A.C. 348) - Ed.]

What I have stated above is a necessary background for understanding the passage at that page which follows the passage which I have quoted in the earlier part of my judgment. The point there was and I have already indicated how that point was a material point in that case-whether one Legislature, in that case the Dominion Parliament, could by the express provisions of its statute and by sole force thereof repeal the provisions of a statute passed by another Legislature, in that case the Legislature of the province of Ontario, both the legislatures being equally competent to legislate on the subject of prohibition and both deriving their powers from the same Act of parliament which had not in express terms conferred on one the power of repealing the Act passed by the other. That question was answered in the negative. An argument was advanced that S.129, British North America Act, had given in express terms the Dominion Parliament the power to repeal the provincial Temperance Act of 1864. That contention was overruled and in connexion with that contention Lord Watson made the following observations at the bottom of P. 366 of the report.

It appears that neither the Parliament of Canada nor the Provincial Legislatures have authority to repeal statutes which they could not directly enact and then referred to (1882) 7 A.C. 136. These last-mentioned observations in my judgment were made on the matter of construction of S.129 of the Canadian Constitution and did not lay down a general proposition of law. Section 129 provided that all laws in force in the Provinces of Canada (which consisted of the Province of Ontario and Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at the date of the Union shall continue in force till repealed, abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada (the dominion Parliament) or by the Legislature of the respective province, according to the authority of the Parliament or of that Legislature under this Act.

All that Lord Watson said in this part of the judgment was that according to the true construction of S.129 the Dominion Parliament could not repeal or amend the Temperance Act of 1864, which, being an Act passed before the Union, was continued by S.129 in the province of Ontario, as the Dominion parliament could not have passed that Act for the Province of Ontario only after the Union by reason of the provisions of S.92 of the Constitution Act of Canada.

The case before us is in essential features of the same type. Both the Central Indian Legislature and the Governor-General exercising his function under S.72 of Sch. 9 derive their powers to Legislate from the same Act of parliament. Both are competent to legislate on items of Lists I and III, bearing upon peace and good Government of British India. I am leaving out for the present list II subjects, for a question has been raised as to whether the Governor-General can by Ordinance made and promulgated under S.72 encroach on any subject of list II. The Act of Parliament does not give express powers to the Governor-General to directly repeal, reamed an Act of the Central Indian Legislature. The observations of Lord Watson, which I have first quoted, would therefore apply with equal force to the case before us. I therefore hold that the Governor-General has no power to repeal directly and in express terms any Act of the Central Indian Legislature. The power to amend stands on the same principle, for whereas repeal means the destruction of the whole, amendment means the destruction of a part, followed, may be but not necessarily, by the creation of a substitute. I accordingly hold that S.2 of Ordinance 14 of 1943 is ultra vires the powers of the Governor-General. Apart from the reasons stated above the Government of India Act gives indications that such a power was not intended by Parliament for the Governor-General in cases where either the Governor-General or the Governor is given the power to make what in substance are laws-either by Ordinance or by Regulation, and they stand on the same footing under the Indian Constitution Act — Parliament had expressed itself in clear terms; where it intended that they (the Governor-General or the Governor, as the case may be) should have the power to repeal or amend an Act of the Legislature. A reference to Ss. 92 (2) and 96 read with S.95 (3), Government of India Act, supports the view I am taking. The last portion of S.72 of sch. 9 also indicates that where Parliament intended to confer such a power to a co-ordinate legislative body, e.g. the Indian Legislature, it expressed itself in an unambiguous manner.

5. The Ordinance cannot affect pending proceedings decision against the petitioners) — Ed.]

(8) Section 3 of the Ordinance has no existence apart from S.2.

The argument of the learned Advocate-General is that even if the amendment of S.2. (2), cl. (x) Defence of India Act, by S.2 of the Ordinance is bad, S.3 of the Ordinance stands and the orders of the detention on the persons before us cannot be challenged. I cannot accept this contention. I have already held that the Governor-General cannot repeal or amend an Act of the Central Indian Legislature. An Act is amended if some of its provisions are altered. It is also amended if some provisions are added to its original provisions. I consider both Ss.2 and 3 of the Ordinance to be amendments of the Defence of India Act. The preamble to the Ordinance throws light on the matter and supports my view). That is one reason why I hold that S.3 is bad, for I have already held that the Governor-General by his Ordinance made and promulgated under S.72 of Sch. 9 cannot amend an Act of the Indian Legislature. There is another reason why I hold that S. 3 of the Ordinance falls to the ground with S.2. Section 3 says that for the removal of doubts the provisions contained therein were enacted. The 'doubt' in my judgment would have arisen in the following manner, if S.3 had not been enacted. By S.2, cl. (x) of S.2 (2), defence of India Act, was amended with retrospective effect. That amendment would sustain R. 26, Defence of India Rules, from 29th September 1939, when the Defence of India Act was passed, but it could still be argued that the orders of detention made before 28th April 1943, when the Ordinance was promulgated were bad. To set at rest that point, S.3 was enacted. I do not wish to develop this point further, as it is dealt with fully in the judgment of my learned brother Sen J. which I had the advantage of seeing. I agree with the reasons given therein for coming to the conclusion that S.3 of the Ordinance cannot have an existence independently of S.2. I accordingly answer this ground in favour of the petitioners.

(9) Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules had no existence when the Defence of India Act (35 of 1939) was passed

Assuming S.3 of Ordinance 14 of 1943 to be a good enactment the petitioners can challenge R. 26 of the Defence of India Rules on any ground other than the ground mentioned therein. That position is clear on the terms of S.3 of the Ordinance, and is moreover not contested by the learned Advocate-General. The petitioners' advocates attack Rule 26 on the ground that it never had existence in the eye of law. For following this argument the following facts are relevant. On 3rd September 1939 Ordinance 5 of 1939 was made and promulgated by the Governor-General under S.72 of Sch. 9. Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules was published on the same date. Ordinance 5 of 1939 was repealed by the Defence of India Act (35 of 1939) which was passed on 29th September 1939. Section 2 of the Act is a reproduction of S.2 of that Ordinance. The substance of that rule as published on 3rd September 1939 so far as it is material for the argument on this point is as follows. Paragraph I gave the Central Government only the power to make, if satisfied, any of the orders mentioned in cls (a) to (g) of that paragraph on any person with a view to prevent him from acting in a manner prejudicial to the efficient prosecution of the war, to the defence of British India or to public order. Clause (b) provided for detention. Paragraph 2 gave the Provincial Government powers to make like orders on a person who was within province with a view to prevent him from acting in a manner prejudicial to public order only.

After the Defence of India Act had come into force that rule was amended twice once on 28th March 1940 by Notification No. 356 O.R./40 and then again on 3rd August 1940 by Notification No. 534 O.R./40. The rule as it exists now with the exception of the words 'His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian States, the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas' after the words 'public order' in para. I was the result of the first mentioned amendment and those words were added by the second amendment, section 21, Defence of India Act, on which the argument is based is as follows:

The Defence of India Ordinance, 1939, is hereby repealed, and any rules made . . . in exercise of any power conferred or under the said Ordinance shall be deemed to have been made . . . in exercise of the powers conferred by or under the Act as if this Act had commenced on 3rd day of September 1939.

The learned advocates for the petitioners contend that on the reason given by the Federal Court in Talpade's case it must be held that R. 26 as made and published on 3rd September 1939 was also ultra vires, because it went beyond what had been provided for in S.2 (2), cl. (x) of Ordinance 5 of 1939. It was made, they say, not in the exercise of the powers conferred by Ordinance 5 of 1939, but in excess of those powers. It had, therefore, no existence in the eye of law on 29th September 1939, when the Defence of India Act 1939, was passed, and therefore could not be continued thereafter by the force of S.21, Defence of India Act. To emphasize this argument reference was made to S.24, General Clauses Act (10 of 1897) and our attention was drawn to the difference in the language employed there. It was pointed out that the language of S.24, General Clauses Act, is not 'made in exercise of powers' under the repealed Act or Regulation etc., but simply made or issued under the repealed Act or Regulation. The argument does not however appear to me to be convincing. I do not see any substantial difference in these two phrases. In my judgment, S.21 does not merely continue the rules made in pursuance of the powers given by the Defence of India Ordinance but continues them by re-enactment. What in fact had existed was continued not merely what existed only as valid in law. Rule 26 as it then existed may have been ultra vires, but no Court had then pronounced it to be so. Moreover, a finding by a Court that a particular rule or bye-law is ultra vires does not remove it from the statute book, for Courts can only declare a rule or bye-law to be void in order to give the substantive relief asked for. It cannot say that it never existed. The observation of Dicey at p. 98 of Law of the Constitution (Edn. 9) lead to the inference which supports the view I am taking. Rule 26 as it existed before 29th September 1939 was accordingly a rule made in exercise of the powers under the Defence of India Act, as in fact it was made in the exercise of the powers given by ordinance 5. As it had existed at the passing of the Defence of India Act it continued and could later on be amended from time to time.

(10) Detention of the nine persons improper

The argument on this point has been addressed to us under two heads: (1) that the authority or the person who is authorized to detain under rule 26, Defence of India Rules, had not in fact been satisfied that the detention of the nine persons before us was necessary: and (II) that the power of detention had not been exercised in the case of those persons in a bona fide manner. In support of the proposition that Courts can investigate these matters, two cases have been cited before us by the petitioners' advocates, viz. 1931 A.C. 662 and 60 Cal. 364. In the first mentioned case, the legality of the expulsion of the Eleko by the executive authority of Nigeria under powers conferred by an Ordinance was challenged. It was held that the Court was entitled to investigate as to whether the conditions on which the executive act of expulsion depended for its validity had been complied with or not. In the cases before us, the act of detention of nine persons in an executive act, which depends upon the condition that the authority designated by R. 26 is to be satisfied that the detention of the particular person was necessary for preventing him from doing acts of a prejudicial nature. The Courts cannot enquire into the grounds of satisfaction or the sufficiency thereof but have certainly the jurisdiction to enquire as to whether that authority or person was satisfied as a matter of fact before he made the order of detention. In the second case, the phrase 'illegally or improperly detained' occurring in S.491, Criminal P.C. was construed. It was held that the word 'Improperly' can only refer to cases in which, although the forms of law had been observed, there had been a fraud on an Act or an abuse of the powers given by the Legislature'. In 1942 A.C. 206, the principle that a Court can look into the question as to whether the power of detention had been exercised in a bona fide manner by the executive in exercise of powers given to it by the Legislature was re-affirmed, and it was stated if the Court was satisfied that it had not been so exercised, it must give relief. These principles are, in my judgment, well established.

In all the cases before us, the orders of detention have been made in the following form:

'Whereas the person known as (name given) is detained in the . . . jail under the provisions of R. 129, Defence of India Rules,

And whereas the Governor has been satisfied that with a view to preventing the said person from acting in a manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order or the efficient prosecution of the war, it is necessary to make the following orders to continue his detention:

Now therefore in exercise of the powers conferred by cl. (b) of sub-rule (1) and sub-rule (5) of R. 26, Defence of India Rules, the Governor is pleased to direct (a) that the said person shall until further orders be detained (b) that until further orders the said person be detained in . . . jail and (c) that during such detention the said person shall be subject to the conditions laid down in the Bengal Security prisoners Rules, 1940.

By the order of the Governor.

Signed by Assistant, Deputy or Additional Secretary (as the case may be) to the Government of Bengal.'

These orders have been authenticated in accordance with the rules framed under S.59 (2), Government of India Act. The learned Advocate-General concedes that if the orders of detention had not been so authenticated it would have been open to Courts to investigate the question as to whether the Governor was satisfied in fact on the general principle laid down in 1931 A.C. 662, but in the cases before us we must take the orders of detention as they stand in view of S.59 (2), Government of India Act, that is to say, he says that we are pretended from saying that the Governor was not satisfied as to the necessity of detaining these persons, for in the order the Governor says that he was satisfied. In my judgment, this is not the effect of S.59 (2). That section prevents an order of the Governor duly authenticated from being challenged on the one ground specified in that sub-section. No one can say that the order is not the order of the Governor and that is all the effect of these sub-section, but he can certainly say that the Governor was not in fact satisfied. The affidavit of Dr Nalinaksha Sanyal contains materials relevant to the enquiry as to whether the authority required by Rule 26 was in fact satisfied before the orders of detention were made under R. 26. It embodies the answers given by the Home Minister on the floor of the Legislative Assembly. Proceedings in Council ought to be proved by the journals of the House, but the learned Advocate-General has waived the mode of proof. He says however that the answers given by the Home Minister are not admissible in evidence, and in support of his contention has referred us to the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in A.I.R. 1935 P.C. 34. In that case, to the plaintiff's claim for damages for defamation, the defendant pleaded justification, and in support of that plea proved some reports of the Legislative Assembly which contained a speech delivered by the plaintiff when he was the Leader of the Opposition. Lord Thankerton in dealing with the point observed:

As regards the reports of debates, it is clear in their Lordships' opinion that they can only be evidence of what was stated by the speakers in the Legislative Assembly, and are not evidence of any fact contained in the speeches.

I do not see in what way that case supports the contention of the learned Advocate-General that the answers given by the Home Minister are inadmissible. Those answers were given in reply to written and supplementary questions and were given by the Home Minister on behalf of the Government. The answers relate to facts and not to opinion, and those facts directly relate to the question as to whether any person or the authority designated by R.26 was at all satisfied before making the orders of detention under R. 26. The Crown does not say that the answers of the Home Minister have not been correctly set out in the annexure to Dr Nalinaksha's affidavit. My learned brother Sen J has dealt with the affidavit of Dr Nalinaksha Sanyal and of Mr Porter in detail. For the reasons given by him, I agree with his conclusions. But for the purpose of considering the questions of law that have been raised by the learned Advocated General on the basis of S.49 and S.59 (3), Government of India Act, I will assume that in five cases the Home Minister, and in three cases Mr Porter, who was then the Additional Secretary in the Home Department of the Government of Bengal, were satisfied as to the necessity of detaining the persons under R. 26. Mr Porter's affidavit, taken with the answers of the Home Minister as set out in Dr Nalinaksha's affidavit, may suggest that the case of Sasanka Sekhar Sanyal was the only case that was considered by the Governor himself.

It is admitted by the learned Advocate-General that, except for the area covered by the District Chittagong, the Provincial Government has not delegated its powers and duties by orders made under sub-section. (5) of S.2, Defence of India Act, to any authority or person. The learned Advocate-General further admits that none of the cases which we have before us relate to the Chittagong area. The position taken up by him for raising the points of law is that the orders of detention must be taken to be orders made by the Provincial Government itself, though none of the cases (except one) had been brought up or considered by the Governor himself. He says that if either the Home Minister or the Secretary or the Additional Secretary in the Home Department of the Government of Bengal was satisfied as to the necessity of detaining these persons and passed orders for detention, that was sufficient, as it must be taken, by reason of the provision of S.49 and also by reason of the General rules of business framed under S.59 (3) Government of India Act, that the Provincial Government after being satisfied had made the orders for detention, for the reason that the Provincial Government functions through Ministers and Secretaries. On a careful consideration of the matter, I cannot accept his contentions.

Rule 26, Defence of India Rules, requires the Provincial Government to make the order for detention on it being satisfied that the detention of a particular person is necessary. That power and the duty can be delegated by the provincial Government to any other authority or officer not subordinate to Central Government by making an order under S.2 (5), Defence of India Act. The word, provincial Government has been defined in S.2, cl. 43, (a), General Clauses Act (10 of 1897). It means the Governor acting or not acting in his discretion, or exercising or not exercising his individual judgment, according to the provisions made in the Government of India Act, 1935. The matter of detention in terms of Rule 26, Defence of India Rules, comes within the special responsibility of the Governor as mentioned in S.52 (1), cl. (a), Government of India Act. The Governor is, therefore, required to exercise his individual judgment. The Ministers can tender their advice to him but he is not bound to accept their advice. In this view of the matter, the Governor must act himself, unless he had delegated his power and duty to another by an order made under S.2 (5), Defence of India Act. In these circumstances, and in the absence of delegation by an order passed by him under the last mentioned section, I do not see how S.49, Government of India Act, or the General rules of business made under S.59 (3), Government of India Act, could be invoked to sustain an order under R. 26 made either by the Home Minister or a Secretary or Additional Secretary to the Government of Bengal, when the Governor himself was not satisfied, but either the Home Minister or the Secretary or the Additional Secretary was, and they made the orders in the name of the Governor. In any view, a Minister cannot be regarded as an officer subordinate to the Governor: I.L.R. (1939) 2 Cal. 411. Moreover, section 49 says that the executive authority of a province shall be exercised on His Majesty's behalf by the Governor either directly or through officers subordinate to him, but sub-section (2) of S.49 limits the exercise 3 (2) on the Governor to matters which could be dealt by the provincial Legislature only in the absence of any other provision in the Government of India Act, and so far as this matter is concerned, there is no other provision. The Defence of India Act could not have been enacted by the provincial Legislature because, as I have held already, that enactment deals exclusively with matters falling within List I.

By the General rules of business, the subject of 'public order', has been assigned to the Home Department of the Bengal Government which is in charge of the Home Minister. The General rules of business framed under S.59 (3), Government of India Act, authorize the Ministers to regulate the business of their Departments by standing orders. Such standing orders may provide that in cases of extreme urgency the Secretary can make orders without reference to the Minister concerned, but all such cases will have to be brought to the notice of the Minister at the earliest opportunity. The Home Minister had issued a General standing order in terms of this General rule. But standing orders cannot, in my judgment, authorize the Secretary, even in cases of emergency, to deal himself with a case of detention under R.26. The matter being within the special responsibility of the Governor, the Governor alone (in the absence of an order made under S.2 (5), Defence of India Act) has to make an order after he is satisfied about the necessity of the detention of that particular person. The Home Minister cannot pass such an order on his satisfaction. If the Governor does not wish to do so for any reason, he will have to act in accordance with S. 2 (5), Defence of India Act. The Secretary the Additional Secretary cannot also deal with the matter of detention under R.26 on his own satisfaction as to the necessity of detention in the absence of an order by the Provincial Government (which means the Governor) made in terms of that sub-section. So the standing order of the Home Minister which authorizes the Secretary to pass orders in urgent cases without reference to him cannot be of any avail, for, that standing order governs only such orders which the Minister could himself have made. The above reasons equally apply to the cases where the Additional Secretary, Mr Porter, made orders for detention on his own satisfaction on Bejoy Singh Nahar,* Shibnath Banerjee* and Nanigopal Mozumdar, for the standing order of the Minister quoted in para 8 of Mr Porter's affidavit could not in law confer a power on the Secretary which the Minister himself did not possess. For the reasons given under this heading, I also hold that the nine persons before us have been illegally detained. For the reasons I have given in discussing the matter under headings Nos (3), (8), and (10), I hold that the detention of all the petitioners before us is illegal and my order is that all of them be forthwith set free.

Khundkar J. — I have had the advantage of reading the judgment just delivered by my learned brother Mitter J., and I agree that the following points enumerated in his judgment should be negatived. (1) That the whole of S.2, Defence of India Act, both in its original and amended forms, is ultra vires of the Indian Legislature. (2) That the portion of cl. (X) of S.2 (2) of the said Act, which has been added by the amendment made by the Ordinance is ultra vires of the Indian Legislature. The corresponding portions of R. 26, Defence of India Rules are bad and consequently the orders of detention in the cases we have before us are bad. (4) That it is only the Central Indian Legislature that has the power to repeal or amend an Act of the Central Indian Legislature passed under the Provisions of S.102, Government of India Act. (5) That the Governor-General has no power to legislate by such an Ordinance on any subject enumerated in List II of Sch. 7, Government of India Act, 1935. (6) That in any event the Governor-General has no power to give retrospective operation to such an Ordinance. (7) That, in any event, Ordinance 14 of 1943 cannot affect proceedings which were pending on the date of its promulgation. (9) That R. 26, Defence of India Rules, had no existence in the eye of the law on 29th September 1939 and so does not exist even now either in its original or amended form.

I agree with the conclusions reached by my learned brother upon these points, and with the reason upon which those conclusions are based. It is therefore not necessary for me to add anything to what is contained in his judgment regarding these points. As I am constrained to disagree regarding the remaining points dealt with in the judgment just delivered, I give below my reasons for so doing.

[(Omitted: Rest of Khundkar's discourse) — Ed.]

Sen J. — I agree with my learned brother Mitter J. that these rules should be made absolute and the petitioners set at liberty forthwith. The points raised have been very fully discussed by my learned brothers and I concur in the conclusions of my learned brother Mitter J. on all points except one with which I shall deal later. The questions involved are of such importance that even at the risk of repeating what has already been said I feel that I should record separately my conclusions and the reasons therefore regarding some of the important matters canvassed before us. Before stating the arguments of the parties it will be necessary to go into the history of the rule under which the petitioners have been detained. The rule is R.26 made by the Central Government in the purported exercise of powers presumed to have been granted to it by the Defence of India Act of 1939. Before the Defence of India Act of 1939 was enacted there existed the Defence of India Ordinance V of 1939. Certain rule making powers were given to Central Government by the Ordinance. The Central Government made a rule, being R. 26 in the exercise of powers presumed to have been given to it by the Ordinance. That rule may for the purposes of these cases be said to be in the same terms as the present one. The Ordinance was repealed and re-enacted by the Defence of India Act, 1939, which is materially in the same terms as the Ordinance, and R. 26 was sought to be continued in force by S.21 of the Act which is in these terms.

The Defence of India Ordinance 1939, is hereby repealed, and any rules made, anything done and any action taken in exercise of any power conferred by or under the said Ordinance shall be deemed to have been made, done or taken in exercise of powers conferred by or under this Act as if Act has commenced on the 3rd day of September 1939.

The rule underwent a slight modification which is not material and it now stands thus:

26. (1) The Central Government or the provincial Government, if it is satisfied with respect to any particular person that with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order, His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian states, the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas or the efficient prosecution of the war it is necessary so to do, may make an order. (a) . . . (b) directing that he be detained.

The petitioners have been detained under this rule. After their detention the validity of the rule was in question in the Bombay High Court in Keshav Talpade's case. That Court held that it was valid. On appeal the Federal Court has held that the rule was made in the exercise of powers presumed to have been granted to the Central Government by S.2 (2) (x), Defence of India Act, and that it is ultra vires of that section as the section did not grant the Central Government the power or authority to make such a rule. Thereafter these petitioners applied before me under S.491, Criminal P.C., for their release on the ground that their detention was not sanctioned by law. I issued rules upon the provincial Government to show cause why the petitioners should not be released. After the rules had been issued and pending the decision thereon the Governor-General passed an Ordinance being ordinance 14 of 1943. This Ordinance consists of only three sections. By S.2 S.2 (2) (x), Defence of India Act is repealed and a new S.2 (2) (x) is substituted in its place. The new section purports to give wider rule-making powers to the Central Government, and it is given retrospective operation. By this method R.26 is sought to be validated. This is the intended effect of S.2 of the ordinance. Then, there is the other section viz., S.3 which enacts that no detention heretofore made under R.26,

Shall be deemed to be invalid or be called in question on the ground merely that the said rule purported to confer powers in excess of the powers that might at the time the said rule was made be lawfully conferred by a rule made or deemed to have been made under S.2, Defence of India Act.

There is no room for any controversy that, if the present Ordinance 14 of 1943 have not been promulgated in view of the decision of the Federal Court, the detention of the petitioners must be held to be illegal. The question for decision is whether this ordinance has the effect of validating the detention. The arguments urged on behalf of the petitioners may be conveniently grouped under four heads thus: (1) the present Ordinance is ultra vires the power of the Governor-General and it cannot validate the detention. (2) Even if the Ordinance be valid it cannot have the effect of validating Rule 26 as the rule had no legal existence when the Defence of India Act was enacted. (3) Even if the Ordinance be valid, inasmuch as it was promulgated when the present proceedings were pending, the cases of the petitioners must be decided as if the Ordinance had not been passed. (4) Even if the Ordinance has validated Rule 26 the orders of detention are bad as they have not been made in accordance with the provisions of the rule. I shall now take up for consideration the main argument under the first head.

It may be stated thus. The present Ordinance has been promulgated by the Governor-General in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him by S.72 of Sch.9, Government of India Act of 1935. The Ordinance directly repeals S.2 (x), Defence of India Act, an Act of the Indian Legislature, and substitutes in that Act a new S.2 (2) (x) Although S.72 gives the Governor-General very wide powers it does not give him the power to repeal or amend directly an Act of the Indian Legislature. On behalf of the Crown the answer to this argument is that although such power has not been expressly conferred by the section nevertheless this power is necessarily included in the wide powers conferred by the section. Section 72 is in these terms:

The Governor-General may, in cases of emergency, make and promulgate Ordinances for the peace and good Government of British India or any part thereof, and any Ordinance so made shall for the space of not more than six months from its promulgation, have the like force of law as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature; but the power of making Ordinances under this section is subject to the like restrictions as the power of the Indian Legislature to make laws: and any Ordinance made under this section subject to the like disallowance as an Act passed by the Indian legislature, and may be controlled or superseded by any such Act.

It is clear that although the section expressly gives the Indian Legislature the power to control or supersede directly an Ordinance no such corresponding power is expressly given to the Governor-General in respect of an Act of the Indian Legislature. I would next draw attention to S.108, Government of India Act, which expressly recognizes the power in the Indian Legislature to amend or repeal directly an Ordinance. It provides that if the Indian Legislature wishes to pass an act which repeals, amends or is repugnant to an ordinance it must get the previous sanction of the Governor-General. There is no similar express recognition of any power in the Governor-General to repeal or amend directly by Ordinance an Act of the Indian Legislature. I would emphasise at that stage that the present point for consideration is not whether the Governor-General by an Ordinance can indirectly repeal or amend an Act of the Indian Legislature by the process of repugnant Legislation but whether the Governor-General as ordinance maker can as he has done by the present Ordinance, directly repeal a provision of an Act of the Indian Legislature and substitute therein as part of that Act another provision.

The argument of the learned Advocate-General is this; By S 72 of Sch. 9 once there is an emergency and the Governor-General considers that an Ordinance is necessary for peace and good Government, the Governor-General is given power to legislate by ordinance on any topic upon which the Indian Legislature could legislate and such Ordinance has the same force as an Act of the Indian Legislature. Where such wide and plenary powers are given it follows as a matter of course that the Governor-General has the power to amend or repeal an Act of the Indian Legislature. Such power is inherent and need not be expressly granted. It is there unless it is expressly taken away.

I am unable to accept this view. There is, I know a well-known general principle that a body which is given the power to make laws has necessarily the power to amend or repeal its own laws; see S.33, Interpretation Act, which related to bye-laws. I am also able to appreciate an argument that where two bodies are given the same power to legislate in the same field, one body may make laws which are repugnant to the laws made by the other body and thereby indirectly repeal or amend an Act of the other. But it must be remembered that when such repugnancy occurs, the Courts and the Courts alone decide which law is to prevail. One Legislature does not repeal or amend directly the Act of the other. I am not aware of any general principle that where there are two legislative bodies with equal powers to legislate in the same field one body has the inherent power to repeal or amend directly the law of the other body and thereby establish by its own Act an overriding power over the other legislative body. There is a fundamental difference between the power to amend or repeal directly and the power to make repugnant laws. In the case of repugnancy one Legislature does not override the other. It merely Legislates in its own field and leaves it to the Court to decide which law shall prevail. When one Legislature has the right to amend or repeal directly an Act of the other the decision as to which law shall prevail is not left to the Court. The Legislature which repeals or amends makes the decision for itself. The matter may be looked at from another angle. An act of the Indian Legislature expresses the collective wisdom and will of the members of the Legislature, an Ordinance expresses the will and wisdom of the Governor-General.

It is difficult to appreciate how there can be any inherent power in the Governor-General as ordinance maker to introduce an Ordinance into an Act and make it part of the product of the Indian Legislature. To put the question more concisely. Has the Governor-General by reason of the provisions of S.72 the inherent power of transforming an Ordinance into an Act of the Legislature? In my opinion he has not. However similar they may be an Ordinance is one thing and an Act of the Indian Legislature is another. They are not identical. Section 72 gives the Governor-General the power to make ordinances. It does not empower him to make an Act of the Indian Legislature or to convert Ordinance into an Act of the Indian Legislature. If he cannot make such an Act, it follows that he can have no inherent power to repeal or amend it directly or substitute something into it.

The learned Advocate-General supported his contention that the Governor-General had power to amend or repeal directly an Act of the Indian Legislature by recourse to another argument. This is what he said. When there is an emergency the Governor-General has, by virtue of the provisions of S.72 of Sch. 9, power to make any law that the Indian Legislature could make for peace and good Government. There can be no doubt that the Indian Legislature can make a law repealing or amending directly a previous law of the said Legislature. Therefore the Governor-General can make an Ordinance directly repealing or amending an Act of the Indian Legislature. The argument is plausible, but if the words of S.72 are carefully analysed it will be found to be unsound. Section 72 does not anywhere either expressly or by necessary implication say that in cases of emergency the Governor-General can by Ordinance make every law which the Indian Legislature can make. It says that in cases of emergency the Governor-General can make an Ordinance on peace and good Government and that such Ordinance when validly made shall have 'the like force of law as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature'. What does this then mean? It means simply this, that the Ordinance shall be as binding upon persons as if it were an Act of the Indian Legislature and that it will be enforceable in the same manner as an Act of the Indian Legislature. The words 'shall have the like force of law as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature' describes the qualities of the Ordinance, they do not confer a power on the Governor-General to make every law which the Indian Legislature can make. Again the section says:

'The power of making Ordinance under this section is subject to the like restrictions as the power of the Indian Legislature to make laws; and any Ordinance made under this section is subject to the like disallowances as an Act of the Indian Legislature.

These words are relied upon by the learned Advocate-General for his contention that the Governor-General as Ordinance maker can do whatever the Indian Legislature can do. The words relied upon are not words donating powers but words imposing restrictions on the power already conferred by the first part of S.72 on the Governor-General to make Ordinances. The learned Advocate-General seemed to argue that as the section imposes the same restrictions upon the Governor-General's power of making Ordinances as are imposed on the powers of the Indian Legislature to make laws, it follows that the powers of both legislatures are identical. There is a fallacy in this argument and, if I may say so with respect, the argument really begs the question. If both Legislatures had originally identical powers then certainly, the imposition of identical restrictions would result in the powers still remaining the same. This is axiomatic, but the mere imposition of like restrictions does not connote the conferment of identical powers. We are thus brought back to the original question—does S.72 confer upon the Governor-General the power to do everything that the Indian Legislature can do? The answer is that the section does not say that it is doing any such things and there is neither jurisdiction nor necessity for reading into a section of this description, which confers extra-ordinary emergency powers upon the Governor-General, something which is not there and which will have the effect of widening these emergency powers.

The learned Advocate-General next argued that as the Governor-General could indirectly repeal or amend an Act of the Indian Legislature by making an Ordinance which was repugnant to the Act he necessarily could effect the same end by the direct method of express repeal and amendment. What can be done indirectly, he argued, can also be done directly. I know of the principle more than once laid down by the judicial Committee and the House of Lords that what a Legislature cannot do directly it cannot do indirectly (1921) 2 A.C. 91, at p. 100, but I have not yet found any Court laying down the principle that what one can do indirectly one can necessarily do directly. To give countenance to this argument of the learned Advocate-General would be to accept the view that the end justifies the means, a view that is as unsound in ethics as it is in law. The law may sanction the achievement of a certain end but it does not follow from this that the law sanctions the employment of any and every means for the achievement of that end. What means are permissible and what are not must be ascertained from the terms of the law which gives the power and when there are no express terms from general principles of construction.

On behalf of the petitioners it was pointed out that whenever Parliament intended to give one Legislative body in India the power to repeal or amend an Act of another Legislative body Parliament gave this power in express terms. In this connection our attention was drawn to S.72 itself which lays it down in express terms that the Indian Legislature can control or supersede an Ordinance. It was argued that if the proposition of the Advocate-General was correct, viz., that when two Legislatures are empowered to pass laws in the same field it necessarily follows that one Legislature can repeal or amend directly the Act of the other, then there was no necessity for providing expressly that the Indian Legislature could control or supersede an Ordinance. The reply of the learned Advocate-General was that the express provision was not necessary and was put in there 'ex abundant cautela'. Why this abundant caution was necessary regarding the powers of the Indian Legislature which is the normal Legislative authority and not regarding the powers of the Governor-General acting as a Legislature only in cases of emergency is difficult to appreciate. I should have thought that words of abundant caution were more necessary when defining the emergency legislative powers of an authority who normally would not have such powers than when defining the legislative powers of the normal Legislature.

On the other hand, it is open to the petitioners to rely upon the legal maxim Expressio unius excludio alterius and say that when one only of two legislative authorities is expressly given the power to repeal and amend an Act of the other it follows that the latter authority had no such power. On behalf of the petitioners our attention was also drawn to the provision of Ss. 92, 95 and 96, Government of India Act, in support of the contention that whenever Parliament intended to confer on one Legislative body the power to repeal or amend directly the Act of another express terms are to be found granting this power. Section 92 deals with excluded areas and S.95 deals with British Baluchistan. Neither the Indian nor the Provincial Legislature has the power to legislate with respect to these areas. These sections give power to the Governor-General to introduce by notification as law into these areas any enactment of the Indian or Provincial Legislature with such modifications as he thinks fit. He is also given the power to make regulations for the peace and good Government of these areas which shall have 'the same force and effect as an Act of the Indian Legislature'. After giving the Governor-General these wide powers of Legislation by regulation the section goes on to grant expressly to the Governor-General the power to repeal or amend by these regulations any law of the Indian or provincial Legislature introduced by notification. Section 96 deals with the Andaman and Nicobar Islands. In respect of these places the Indian Legislature has the power to make laws. Section 96 empowers the Governor General to make regulations for the peace and good Government of these areas which shall have 'the same force and effect as an Act of the Indian Legislature'. Here again an express power to amend and repeal an Act of Indian Legislature by means of regulations is given to the Governor-General. If the contention of the learned Advocate-General be correct, viz., that when two Legislatures have power to legislate in the same field one legislature has necessarily the power directly to repeal or amend the Act of the other then it was quite unnecessary for Parliament to make those express provision in Ss. 95, and 96, Government of India Act. Again, the learned Advocate-General argues that this was done for abundant caution. I am unable to appreciate why Parliament should be so cautious in all these instances and fail to exercise any caution when enacting S.72. It is more reasonable to presume from the provision of all these sections that whenever Parliament intended to give one Legislature the power to amend directly an Act of another it took meticulous care to say so in express terms. The view that I have taken finds support in the decision of the Judicial Committee in 1896 A.C. 348 I would refer to the observation of Lord Watson at P. 366 which is in these terms.

'It has been frequently recognised by this board and may now be regarded as settled law, that according to the scheme of the British North America Act the enactments of the Parliament of Canada, in so far as these are within its competency, must override provincial Legislation. But the Dominion Parliament has no authority conferred upon it by the Act to repeal directly any provincial statute, whether it does or does not come within the limits of jurisdiction prescribed by S. 92. The repeal of a provincial Act by the Parliament of Canada can only be effected by repugnancy between its provisions and the enactments of the Dominion, and if the existence of such repugnancy should become a matter of dispute, the controversy cannot be settled by the action whether of the Dominion or of the provincial Legislature, but must be submitted to the judicial tribunals of the country. In their Lordships opinion the express repeal of the old provincial Act of 1864 by the Canada Temperance Act of 1896 was not within the authority of the Parliament of Canada. It is true that the upper Canada Act of 1864 was continued in force within Ontario by S.129, British North America Act, 'until repealed, abolished, or altered by the Parliament of Canada or by the provincial Legislature' according to the authority of that Parliament, 'or of that legislature'. It appears to their Lordships that neither the Parliament of Canada nor the Provincial Legislature have authority to repeal statutes which they could not directly enact.'

The learned Advocate-General argued that the Judicial Committee, when they said that the Dominion Parliament authority conferred upon it by the Act to repeal directly any provincial statute whether it did or did not come within the limits of the jurisdiction prescribed by section 92, British North America Act, were not basing their view upon any General principle that one Legislature cannot repeal an Act of another unless it is expressly given such power, but were basing it upon the particular provisions of the British North America Act which, he said, prevented the Dominion Parliament from repealing an Act of the Provincial Legislature. I am unable to accept this view for the reasons stated by my learned brother Mitter J., with which I respectfully and entirely agree. The conclusion of the Privy Council regarding the inability of the Dominion Legislature to repeal directly an Act of the Provincial Legislature is based on the assumption that one Legislature cannot directly repeal an Act of another unless it is expressly vested with powers to do so and that the North America Act had not vested the Dominion Parliament with any such powers. The judgment contains nothing to indicate that their Lordships held the view that the Dominion Parliament would have had the inherent power to repeal directly an Act of the Provincial Legislature were it not for the peculiar provisions of the North America Act, nor was the learned Advocate-General able to point out anything in the North America Act which would have the effect of taking away any such inherent power if it existed. Sections 91 and 92, North America Act, are the Provisions which describe the fields of legislation of the Dominion and Provincial Legislatures respectively. It would seem prima facie that each Legislature has an exclusive field of legislation but that is not so. There is some overlapping and in times of great emergency the Dominion Parliament for the safety of the Dominion as a whole has power to trench upon certain subjects in the provincial field (1923 A.C. 695 at p. 703). In spite of this power in the Dominion Parliament it was held in 1896 A.C. 348 p. 336, that the Dominion Parliament could not directly repeal an Act of the Provincial Legislature. Their Lordships went further and said that even if the Provincial Legislature had travelled beyond the provincial field the Dominion Legislature could not directly repeal it. But could only pass repugnant legislation and leave it to the Courts to decide which legislation should prevail. In my opinion, a general principle was being laid down in the above case to the effect that one Legislature cannot directly repeal an Act of another unless it is expressly given power to do so.

For the reasons given above, I am of opinion that there is no power in the Governor-General to repeal or amend directly an Act of the Indian Legislature by means of an Ordinance passed under S.72 of Sch. 9, Government of India Act. The learned Advocate-General next argued that even if this be so S.2 only of the Ordinance would be ultra vires. Section 3 he said, did not directly amend any Act of the legislature and was therefore valid. That being so, he contended, the orders of detention made in respect of the petitioners could not be challenged. In my opinion, this contention cannot prevail for more than one reason. It is perfectly clear from the terms of S.3 itself that the section was intended to be merely an appendage to S.2. It was not intended to have any separate existence at all but was merely explanatory of the effect of S.2 on the validity of the detentions made before the promulgation of the Ordinance. If S.2 falls S.3 must fall with it. Let us remove S.2 from the Ordinance and see how it reads:

An Ordinance further to amend the Defence of India Act, 1939.

Whereas an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary further to amend the Defence of India Act, 1939 (35 of 1939), for the purpose hereinafter appearing.

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by S.72 Government of India Act, as set out in Sch. 9 to the Government of India Act, 1935 (26 Geo V c.2), the Governor-General is pleased to make and promulgate the following Ordinance.

3. Validity of orders made under R. 26, Defence of India Rules — For the removal of doubts, it is hereby enacted that no order heretofore made against any person under R. 26 of the Defence of India Rules shall be deemed to be invalid or shall be called in question on the ground merely that the said rule purported to confer power in excess of the powers that might at the time the said rule was made be lawfully conferred by a rule or deemed to have been under S.2, Defence of India Act, 1939.

Section 3 by itself would have no meaning. I refer specially to the words 'For the removal of doubts.' Section 3 expressly states that it is enacted for the purpose of removal of doubts. Now what are that doubts it seeks to remove? Surely it cannot be said that the decision for the Federal Court created any doubt regarding the validity of the orders of detention made R. 26. The Federal Court in Talpade's case in explicit terms removed any possible doubts on the matter and declared that all such detentions were illegal. To say, in spite of this judgment of the Federal Court, that doubts still existed would be a piece of sheer impertinence and I am unwilling to ascribe such impertinence to anybody exercising legislative functions. Some other meaning must therefore be given to the words 'for the removal of doubts'. The meaning is obvious. The Federal Court had declared in Talpade's case that the detention of Talpade under R. 26 was illegal because that rule was ultra vires of the rule-making power granted to the Central Government by S.2, (2) (X), Defence of India Act, 1939. Section 2 of the Ordinance repealed S.2 (2) (x) and substituted a new section in its place in order to give the Central Government the powers to make a rule like R.26 stating at the same time that the new section shall be deemed always to have been substituted. To remove any doubts as to whether this new section would have the effect of validating detentions made before the amendment was made, S.3 was enacted. It does not make any new law. It states in express terms that its object is to remove doubts. In other words it is merely explanatory of S.2. If S.2 falls S.3 which is merely pendant from S.2 must necessarily fall.

There is yet another reason why S.3 cannot prevent the petitioners from challenging the validity of their detention and it is this. As I have said before, Rule 26 was made originally under the Defence of India Ordinance 5 of 1939, in the exercise of powers assumed to have been granted to the Central Government by S.2, Defence of India Ordinance. The Ordinance was repealed by the Defence of India Act, 1939, and was re-enacted in almost the same terms. Section 2 of the repealed Ordinance was reproduced verbatim in the Act. No rules were framed under the Act but the rules made in exercise of power conferred by the Ordinance were saved by S.21 of the Defence of India Act. Now S.3 of the present Ordinance says that the validity of a detention heretofore made under R. 26 shall not be questioned on the ground that R.26 conferred more powers than could lawfully be conferred by a rule made or deemed to have been made under S.2, Defence of India Act. This is the only ground which a detainee is prohibited from urging by S.3. The urging of any other grounds against the validity of the detention is not prohibited. It is therefore open to the petitioners to urge as they do urge, that their detention is bad not merely because R.26 conferred more powers than a rule made or deemed to have been made under S.2, Defence of India Act, could have conferred, but on the ground that Rules 26 had no existence at all as it was not saved by S.21, Defence of India Act. This leads us to the consideration of S.21. Does S.21 save and continue rules made under the Defence of India Ordinance, 5 of 1939, or does it enact those rules afresh? The learned Advocate-General contends that it is not a saving section. I am not able to accept this view. The marginal note of the section is 'Repeal and saving'. I fully appreciate that a marginal note cannot control a section but it certainly elucidates and illumines the meaning of section. There are no words in the section which indicate that the marginal note is a misdescription. I hold therefore that S.21 saves and continues rules made in the exercise of powers conferred by the Defence of India Ordinance 5 of 1939. Now what rules does the section save? The learned Advocate-General contends that all valid or invalid rules which purport to be made under the Defence of India Ordinance were saved. I am not able to accept this view for the reason that the section does not say so. It says.

And any rules made . . . in exercise of any power conferred by or under the said Ordinance shall be deemed to have been made . . . in exercise of powers conferred by or under this Act as if this Act had commenced on 3rd day of September 1939.

The section says that it saves rules made in the exercise of 'any power conferred'. It does not say that it saves rules made in the exercise of a power not conferred but believed to have been conferred. Now, if it can be shown that no power was conferred upon the Central Government by ordinance 5 of 1939 to make such a rule as R.26 then it follows that the rule was not saved by S.21. This takes us to the decision of the Federal Court in Talpade's case. I agree with the learned Advocate General that the decision of a Court cannot repeal or annul a statute (Dicey, Law of the Constitution, Edn. 9, p. 98). I am not suggesting that the decision of the Federal Court has annulled or repealed R.26 and it is not necessary to say any such thing. But there is no bar to this Court deciding with reference to the Federal Courts' judgment whether such a rule like R.26 could validly be made under the provisions of ordinance 5 of 1939. Having regard to what was said by the Federal Court in Talpade's case, and having regard to the fact that the rule making powers granted to the Central Government by Ordinance 5 of 1939 are exactly the same as the rule making powers granted by the Defence of India Act, this Court cannot but come to the conclusion that the Central Government had no power to make a rule like R. 26 under Ordinance 5 of 1939. The rule was not made in the exercise of 'any power conferred.' It was therefore not saved by S.21, Defence of India Act. That being so, a detention purporting to be made under R. 26 which ceased to exist with the repeal of the Defence of India Ordinance 5 of 1939 cannot be valid. Other grounds were urged to show that the Ordinance was ultra vires. They have been dealt with fully by my learned brother Mitter J. and I entirely agree with his conclusions regarding them and for the reasons given by him.

I now come to the second argument, viz., even if the Ordinance be ultra vires and it cannot have effect of validating R.26 as that rule had no legal existence when the Defence of India Act was enacted. This question has been fully discussed when dealing with the effect of S.3 of the Ordinance. I have held that R.26 ceased to exist with the repeal of the Defence of India Ordinance 5 of 1939 and that it was not revived by S.21, Defence of India Act. The present Ordinance makes no rules but merely seeks to enlarge the rule-making powers of the Central Government in order to validate R.26. Even if it be held that the Ordinance has validly enlarged those powers, Rule 26 could not be validated as it was not in existence from long before the passing of the Ordinance. As there was no R.26, the detention of the petitioners must be illegal as there is no power given to any one by law to make any such order of detention. I shall sum up my conclusion on these two arguments urged on behalf of the Petitioners. I hold in agreement with my learned brother Mitter J. that the entire Ordinance ultra vires and the Ordinance making powers of the Governor-General and that the orders of detention of the petitioners are bad and without jurisdiction. I hold further in agreement with my learned brother Mitter J. that S.3. of the Ordinance cannot prevent the petitioners from challenging the validity of the orders of detention or prevent this Court from declaring that such orders are illegal and without jurisdiction. In arriving at this conclusion regarding the effect of S.3. I have given an additional reason with which my learned brother Mitter J. does not agree. I also hold that even if the Ordinance be within the powers of the Governor-General the detention still remains illegal as R.26 was not in existence when the detentions were made and was never re-enacted.

I now come to the third point urged, viz., that the Ordinance having been promulgated while it cannot affect the decision of these cases which must be decided in accordance with the law as it was when the rules were issued. It is a well established principle that an amendment shall not be given retrospective effect unless there are clear terms in the Act making it retrospective. Here there are express terms giving the Ordinance retrospective effect but the petitioners contend that there is another principle, viz., even if an amendment is given retrospective effect, if there is an action pending at the time the amendment was made the Court will decide the action in accordance with the law as it stood before the amendment unless the Act clearly indicates that the amendment will affect pending proceedings. In this connexion our attention was drawn amongst others to (1876) 1 Ch. D. 48 at p. 50 and to (1940) 2 F.C.R. 110 at pp. 163 & 166. The learned Advocate-General relied on the decision of the Privy Council in 15 pat. 268. The principle which I deduce from all these cases is this. If the law is changed while an action is pending even if the new law is given retrospective effect it will not affect the rights of the parties to the pending action unless the statute expresses such an intention either directly or by necessary implication. In the absence of such an expression, the pending action must be decided according to the law as it was at the time the action commenced. I must guard myself by saying that these principles apply to change in the substantive law and not necessarily to a change in procedural law. It follows from this that the whole question is really a matter of construction of the particular statute. In my opinion Ss. 2 and 3 of the Ordinance read together leave no room for doubt that the intention of the Ordinance was to affect pending actions. The Ordinance if it had been valid would, in my opinion, have had to be taken into consideration in deciding upon the validity of these orders of detention. The third main ground therefore fails. In this connexion I may notice an argument urged on behalf of the petitioners that there is no power given to the Governor-General to make an Ordinance having retrospective effect. In support of this argument reliance was placed on the following words appearing in S.72 of Sch.9.

And any ordinance so made shall for the space of not more than six months from its promulgation have the like force of law.

It was argued that if an Ordinance is made retrospective its operation will commence from a date before the date of its promulgation and it may thus have force for a period longer than six months. I cannot accept this argument. All that R.72 said is that the Ordinance shall have force for not more than six months from the date of its promulgation. I can see no reason why for the space of these six months the Ordinance cannot have retrospective effect. The period during which a law has force is quite a different matter from the effect which a law may have. There is, in my opinion, no bar to a temporary law having a retrospective effect. Further I would point out that since the India and Burma (Emergency Provisions) Act of 1940 (3 and 4 Geo VI, Ch.33) the words limiting the life of an ordinance to six months have been deleted. I now come to the fourth and last ground urged on behalf of the petitioners, viz. Even if the Ordinance be valid the orders of detention are bad as they were not made in accordance with the terms of R. 26 which the Ordinance has sought to validate. In my opinion this ground must prevail. Rule 26 says that the Provincial Government if it is satisfied with respect to any particular person that with a view to preventing him acting in a particular manner it is necessary to make an order directing him to be detained. Before an order of detention under R.26 can be passed, the Provincial Government must be satisfied about certain matters. This satisfaction is the condition precedent of an order of detention and indeed it is the only ground upon which the order can rest. Now what is meant by 'Provincial Government?'. Section 43a, General Clauses Act, defines Provincial Government thus.'

(13a) 'Provincial Government' as respected anything done or to be done by the 'Provincial Government' after the commencement of part 3, Government of India Act, 1935 shall mean – (a) in a Governor's Province, the Governor acting or not acting in his discretion, and exercising or not exercising his individual judgment, according to the provision in that behalf made by and under the said Act.

In short it means the Governor acting on the advice of his Ministers or the Governor acting without and against such advice when he may so act. It follows from this that before an order of detention under R.26 can be made the Governor acting as aforesaid must be satisfied as regards the matters mentioned in the rule. I am not unmindful of the fact that it is not open to the Court to investigate whether there were sufficient grounds upon which the Governor could properly be satisfied. That is a matter entirely for the Governor to decide. But it is certainly open to the Court to enquire whether the Governor was in fact satisfied. The Advocate-General contended first that in view of the nature of the orders of detention passed in this case it is not open to the petitioners to say that Government was not satisfied. He pointed out that the orders were signed by a Deputy Secretary to the Government to Bengal and that they stated expressly that the Governor was satisfied. He then drew our attention to S.59 (1) and (2), Government of India Act, and argued that sub-section (2) precluded any one from challenging the fact that the Governor was satisfied. I am unable to accept this view. sub Section (1) and (2) of S.59 are in the following terms.

59. (1) All executive action of the Government of a province shall be expressed to be taken in the name of the Governor. (2) Orders and other instruments made and executed in the name of the Governor shall be authenticated in such manner as may be specified in rules to be made by the Governor and the validity of an order or instrument which is so authenticated shall not be called in question on the ground that it is not an order or instrument made or executed by the Governor.

All that sub Ss. (1) and (2) lay down is that all executive orders shall be expressed in the name of the Governor and shall be authenticated in a particular manner. If it is so authenticated, no one can say that the Order is not valid on the ground that it has not been made by the Governor. The validity of the orders does not become unchallengeable on all grounds. The validity of the orders is not challengeable only on one ground, viz., that it is not an order made or executed by the Governor. In this case the argument is not that the orders of detention are bad because they were not made or executed by the Governor, the argument is that the detention is bad because the Governor did not satisfy himself on matters on which he was bound to satisfy himself before he could pass an order of detention. Nothing in sub-section (2) of S.59 precludes this Court from inquiring whether the Governor was satisfied.

Next the learned Advocate-General argued that the Governor having stated that he was satisfied, it is not open to the Court to enquire whether in fact he was satisfied. I am not impressed by this argument. As I have said before I appreciate the argument that it is not for this Court to say that the Governor was satisfied on inadequate grounds or that the Governor's satisfaction was improper but it is always to this Court to investigate whether in fact he was satisfied. Ordinarily the ipse dixit of the Governor would be quite enough and it would be extremely difficult for any one to prove that the Governor was not in fact satisfied when he stated that he was. But in this case there are ample materials to prove conclusively that the Governor was not, in fact, satisfied. This takes me to the affidavits filed in this case.

Of the nine detenues affidavits have been filed on behalf of seven. On behalf of one of them viz., Sasanka Sekhar Sanyal, in addition to the affidavit sworn by the detenie an affidavit has been sworn by his cousin Nalinakshya Sanyal and to it was annexed the report of certain proceedings held in the Bengal Legislative Assembly during which the Home Minister made certain statements in answer to question put to him in the House. The learned Advocate-General objected to the report of the proceedings being put in evidence. His contention was that the statements of the Home Minister were not evidence at all, and that in any case they were not evidence of the truth of the facts stated by him. In this connexion he referred us to A.I.R. 1935 P.C. 34 which was decided by the Privy Council on appeal from the Court of Malta. That case really has no application as the facts were entirely different. Here the Home Minister was speaking on behalf of the Government as its spokesman and his answers to questions put to him, as Home Minister, in relation to matters dealt by him as Home Minister, are admissible in evidence as admissions made by the Government. Government is a party to these proceedings and therefore these admissions are relevant and admissible under the Indian Evidence Act, against the Government. The Crown may of course show that the admissions were really not admissions or that they were made under a mistake or that they were not binding on Government for any other valid reason, but unless this is shown the admissions must be taken in evidence against Government. Government was given an opportunity to answer the points involved in all the affidavits and the annexure and, on behalf of the Crown, Mr Porter the Additional Secretary, Home Department, has sworn an affidavit. After we decided to take the statements made by the Home Minister into the evidence it was agreed between the learned Advocate-General and the petitioners that these statements of the Home Minister would be taken into consideration in the cases of all the detenus so far as they may apply to their cases without separate affidavits containing those statements being filed in each case.

We pointedly asked the learned Advocate-General whether it was his case that the Governor personally was satisfied in terms of R.26 that in each of these cases an order of detention was necessary. He replied that he was not in a position to show this. He referred to the affidavit of Mr Porter and stated that in all the nine cases Mr Porter was satisfied. In the cases of Debabrata Roy, Pratul Ganguly, Birendra Ganguly and Narendra Nath Sen Gupta, the Home Minister was also satisfied. In the case of Birendra Ganguly, the Home Minister was satisfied subsequent to the passing of the orders of detention. In the case of Niharendu Dutta Majumdar and Sasanka Sanyal the orders were passed without the consent of the Home Minister. In the cases of Bejoy Singh Nahar, Shibnath Banerjee and Noni Gopal Majumdar, Mr Porter under a general order of the Home Minister passed the order of detention without first consulting the Home Minister. In the cases of Bejoy Singh Nahar and Shibnath Banerjee subsequent to the order of detention materials regarding their case were placed before the Home Minister and he has not passed any order withdrawing the order of detention made by Mr Porter. In the case of Noni Gopal Majumdar the materials have not as yet been placed before the Home Minister of review.

The learned Advocate-General stated that except perhaps in the case of Sasanka Sunyal there was no question of the Governor being personally satisfied within the meaning of R.26. In Sasanka's case he said that the facts indicated that the Governor was personally satisfied but there was nothing expressly stated in the affidavits to this effect. His contention was that the law does not require the Governor personally to be satisfied and that the Governor could discharge this function through his Ministers or any of his officers without passing any specific orders delegating this particular function. He referred to Ss. 49 and 59, sub Ss. (3) and (4), Government of India Act, in support of his argument. Section 49 says that 'the executive authority of a province shall be exercised on behalf of His Majesty by the Governor, either directly or through officers subordinate to him'.

I fail to see how this section can be of any help in the decision of this point. The section deals with the executive authority of a province which is in His Majesty and which the Governor is empowered to exercise on behalf of His Majesty either himself or through his subordinates, it has nothing to do with a particular function imposed upon the Governor by the Defence of India Act, viz., the duty of satisfying himself regarding certain matters before he passes an order of detention under R.26 of that Act. I cannot see how this particular duty can be included in the term 'executive authority of a province'. Sub-section (2) of S.49 makes it impossible to include what I may shortly describe as 'the duty of satisfaction' which the meaning of the words 'executive authority of a Province'. That sub-section says that the executive authority of each Province extends to matters with respect to which the legislature of province has power to legislate. Now R.26, which imposes this duty of satisfaction' relates to many matters regarding which the Provincial Legislature cannot legislate, the functions imposed by the rule cannot therefore come within the meaning of the words 'executive authority of a province'. I would add in passing that I cannot subscribe to the view just expressed by my learned brother, Khundkar J., that a Minister is an officer subordinate to the Governor. In my opinion he cannot in any sense be so regarded. Next I hold that sub-section S.(3) and (4) of S.59. Government of India Act, which empowers rules of business to be made can be of no assistance to the Crown. These rules relate to the executive business of the Government. They cannot be made to apply to this particular duty. I am of opinion that the Governor cannot delegate his duty of being satisfied within the meaning of R.26 by recourse to the provision of S.59, Government of India Act. It may be contended that it could never have been the intention of the Defence of India Act that the Governor should look into the case of every person sought to be detained. This is quite a reasonable view. The Defence of India Act was made express provision for this difficulty in S.2 (5).

2.(5) A Provincial Government may by order direct that any power or duty which by rule and made under sub-section (1) is conferred or imposed on the Provincial Government, or which being by such rule conferred or imposed on the Central Government, has been directed under sub-section (4) to be exercised or discharged by the Provincial Government, shall, in such circumstances and under such conditions, if any as may be specified in the direction, be exercised, or discharged by any officer or authority, not being (except the case of a Chief Commissioner's Province) an officer or authority subordinate to the Central Government.

The Governor is given express power to make an order directing this function to be discharged by some one else. He has made no such order S.2 (5) except in the case of the District of Chittagong and these cases are not of that District. He is therefore the only person who can discharge this function. He has certainly not discharged this function in the case of any of the nine petitioners except possibly in the case of Sasanka Sanyal. In that case also, although this point was expressly raised and argued at great length there is no positive evidence to show that he did so satisfy himself. This being the position the orders of detention must be considered to have been improperly made and the petitioners are entitled to be released forthwith from such detention. The statements of the Home Minister and the affidavit of Mr Porter disclose that certainly in seven of the nine cases before us the orders of detention were made in gross violation of the provisions of R.26, Defence of India Act.

I leave out of consideration in this connexion the cases of Debabrat Roy and Pratul Ganguly who were detained in 1940. In the case of Birendra Ganguly, Mr Porter said that he passed the orders of detention under R. 26 'in anticipation of the orders of the Home Minister, Bengal, who on 18th September recorded his approval of continued detention'. Now there is no provision in R. 26 for this procedure. There can be no detention under that rule until the detaining authority is satisfied that the detention is necessary for the purposes specified in the rule. There is no scope for an interim detention under R.26 which can be made absolute after satisfaction. Obviously the Home Minister was considered to be the person who was to be satisfied yet an order of detention is made by the Additional Secretary in anticipation of the Minister being satisfied. This seems a somewhat light hearted manner of administering the Defence of India Act. The order of detention of Birendra Ganguly was illegal in its inception and continued to be illegal as there is no provision in the Defence of India Act or in the rules thereunder by which a detention, illegal in its inception, can be converted into a legal one by subsequent ratification. Again, the statement of the Home Minister is that he adopted a certain 'device' in these cases. When cases for detention under R.26 were brought up to him he automatically passed orders of detention under R.26 before satisfying himself that the detention was necessary, thereafter at his leisure he investigated the cases and then confirmed the orders in some cases and set them aside in others. He says he did this because he wanted to give the arrested persons the greater creature comforts a detainee has and which a person under arrest under R. 129 cannot have. I suppose the Home Minister was under the impression that he was tempering justice with mercy. He forgot however that he was disobeying a salutary and essential provision of the law that he was supposed to be administering, viz., that no person should be detained under Rule 26 unless the detaining authority first satisfied himself that the detention for the purposes specified in the rule was necessary. I find it difficult to refrain from remarking, in passing, that the granting of additional amenities like an extra blanket or so would afford cold comfort to a person who is told when these amenities are being given that he is going to be detained under R.26, Government of India Act.

That this was the procedure followed is established not only by the statements of the Home Minister but by the affidavit of Mr Porter. He says in para 8 of his affidavit that on 1st October 1942 the Home Minister directed that as soon as a report of an arrest together with a recommendation by the police for detention was received an order for detention under R.26 should at once be issued as a matter of course. Mr Porter's order in the case of Birendra Ganguli which was passed on 14th September 1942 seems to have been only a piece of intelligent anticipation of this General order. In the cases of Bejoy Nahar, Shibnath Banerji and Noni Gopal Majumdar Mr Porter says expressly that he acted in accordance with this General order. His averment in the last paragraph of his affidavit does not necessarily mean that even in these cases he was personally satisfied that an order for detention was necessary. for the purpose mentioned in R. 26 He says 'I was satisfied that it was necessary to issue the order.' The words used are significant. In view of the general order of the Home Minister issued on 1st October 1942, Mr Porter might well have been satisfied that 'It was necessary to issue the order' once the police report was received without at all troubling to be satisfied that the detention of the petitioners was necessary in order to prevent them from acting in the manner mentioned in the rule.

As regards the petitioner Narendra Nath Sen Gupta, his order of detention was sanctioned by the Home Minister on 17th October 1942, i.e., after the general order of 1st October 1942. In view of the statement of the Home Minister in the Assembly, it is reasonable to hold in the absence of any averment to the contrary that this order was also passed before satisfaction in order to give the petitioners superior comforts. His detention would also be improper even if we were to hold that it was not for the Governor personally to be satisfied. As regards the orders of detention passed on Debabrata Roy and Pratul Ganguly they do not seem to be tainted with the device adopted by the general order of 1st October 1942. These orders of detention were passed in 1940 but they would be improper on the other ground that the Governor had not personally satisfied himself regarding the necessity of the detentions. In the case of Niharendu Dutta Majumdar there is nothing to show who was satisfied. This order of detention is also not tainted by the general order of 1st October 1942 as it was made without any preliminary arrest under S.129 and served in his house in his absence. In his case an interim order of detention to ensure greater comforts was not necessary as he was not in custody at the time of the order. Nevertheless the order is improper as it has not been shown that the Governor was satisfied.

In the case of Sasanka Sanyal, it is also clear that the device of 1st October 1942, was not employed. His custody after arrest pursuant to R.129, Defence of India Rules, was not automatically converted into detention under R. 26 but the order is bad as it has not been shown that the Governor was personally satisfied that the detention was necessary. I thus find that the orders of detention in these nine cases are not only illegal because the Ordinance is ultra vires but also improper because the orders of detention were passed in violation of the safeguards, slender though they be, contained in the rule itself. These rules must therefore be made absolute and the petitioners set at liberty forthwith. It is not for us to criticise the wisdom or the propriety of the Defence of India Act or the rule made thereunder and, if they are found valid to administer them according to law. We realise that in times of emergency the executive have to be given extraordinary powers which may have the effect of keeping out, to some extent, judicial scrutiny of acts done by the executive. But when through some unexpected crevice in these barriers against judicial action a cry against an illegal act does reach this Court, it becomes our duty to be vigilant and to see that the liberty of none of His Majesty's subjects is touched except in strict compliance with the law and neither the clouds of war nor the dust of political upheaval must be allowed to obscure our vision or blur that strict scrutiny which we must always bring to bear upon any action which savours of oppression or injustice. I am tempted to quote the observation of Lord Atkin in 1931 A.C. 662 at page 670 which are very apt in this case.

In accordance with British Jurisprudence no member of the executive can interfere with the liberty or property of a British subject except on condition that he can support the legality of his action before a Court of Justice and it is the tradition of British justice that judges should not shrink from deciding such issues in the face of the executive.

I would only add that this Court shall always endeavour to maintain unimpaired this great tradition.

Rules made absolute.

34: Emperor v. Benoari Lall Sarma and others Respondents – Case No. 8 of 1943 [Varadachariar C.J., Zafrullah Khan and Rowland J.J. (4 June 1943)]

AIR, Vol. 30, Federal Court Calcutta, pp. 36-71

Varadachariar C.J. – This is an appeal by the Crown from a judgment of a Special Bench of the Calcutta High Court in a criminal revision case. It seeks the reversal of a Pronouncement by the High Court to the effect that certain provisions of an Ordinance (entitled the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance) published by the Governor-General early in 1942 are void or ultra vires the Governor-General. It is sufficient at this stage to say that the Ordinance provides for the constitution of three classes of Courts of Criminal jurisdiction, described as Special judges, Special Magistrates and Summary Courts and empowers Provincial Governments to appoint to these offices persons with specified qualifications.

[Omitted: Peculiarities of Ordinance 2 and the difficulty it imposes on the accused – Ed.]

As one reads the summary above given of the provisions of the Ordinance, it cannot escape notice that from the point of view of jurisdiction and powers, it is the High Court that has been most affected. The Summary Courts function along side the Subordinate Magistrates under the Criminal Procedure Code and the Special Magistrates along side the First Class Magistrates under the Code and the Special Judge along side the Sessions Judge: only they have been invested with increased powers and provided with a greatly simplified procedure. Excepting for a limited provision in S.13, the High Court is deprived of all powers over and concern with the administration of criminal justice in the cases dealt with under the Ordinance, deprived even of its powers of transfer or revision and of its special powers under S.491 and all this happens, not in respect of special crimes declared as such by the Ordinance, nor of crimes specially arising out of the war emergency or internal commotion, but even in respect of ordinary crimes under the Indian Penal Code. It was, to say the least, an embarrassing position for the High Court to be called upon to examine the validity of a law which has meted out such treatment to itself. The restrained observation of the learned Chief Justice that 'the position is a difficult one for us to deal with' seems true in a wider sense than the context may suggest.

[Omitted: Elucidation of the provisions of the ordinance — Ed.]

Pausing here for a moment, two results flowing from the provisions already referred to may be noted: (1) Any sentence passed by a Special Magistrate (who corresponds to a First Class Magistrate) is absolutely unassailable if it is a sentence of fine, whatever the amount may be — and S.12 fixes no limit to the fine he may impose — or if it is a sentence of imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years. (2) While a right of appeal is allowed in cases where the maximum sentence imposed does not exceed seven years, such right is denied in cases where heavier sentences, including the death penalty, are imposed, when the appeal will ordinarily lie to the High Court. It is not a recognition of the High Court as such, when the normal cursus curia is excluded and an undefined power of 'review' is conferred on a person nominated by the Government, though it be from amongst the Judges of the High Court. [Sub-head (2).] The provision which vitally affects the jurisdiction and powers of the High Court is that contained in S.26 of the Ordinance whereby, without any reference to the High Court by name, all authority to revise the order or sentence or to transfer any case or to make any order under S.491, Criminal P.C., and all other jurisdiction of any kind is excluded in respect of any proceedings of the Special Courts. In view of the obvious anxiety of the framers of the Constitution, as shown by S.223, Constitution Act, and para 13 of the Instrument of Instructions to preserve the powers and prestige of the High Courts unimpaired, the effect and the implications of this section of the Ordinance require to be closely examined. It may generally be stated that Ss.435, 439 and 526, Criminal P.C., ensure supervision and control by the High Court over the subordinate judiciary, particularly the magistracy, and S.491 (which in India replaces the general law relating to habeas corpus) invests the High Court with the means 'of putting a veto upon any proceeding not authorized by the letter of the law' and in effect 'determines the whole relation of the judicial body to the executive' (Dicey's Law of the Constitution, Edn. 9, p. 222). The High Court is deprived of both these kinds of power when any case is dealt with under the Ordinance. It is not without reason that for more than three quarters of a century it has been deemed necessary and proper to keep the revisional powers of the High Court under the Criminal Procedure Code much wider than revisional powers under the Civil Procedure Code (115 Civil P.C.). Apart from the importance of safe-guarding the life and liberty of the subject, the difficult position of the magistracy in this country demands it, as much in the permanent interests of the magistracy itself as in the interests of the citizen. Those who are familiar with the pages of the Indian law reports know how this revisional power has justified itself. But as has been frequently pointed out, the existence of this power even in reserve is a potent and whole-some influence, apart from its actual exercise. That its existence is as much called for today as it was in the middle of the last century will appear from three instances which we take at random.

In a recent case before the Chief Court of Sind, I.L.R. (1943) Kar. 105, the learned Judges (Davis C.J. and Weston J.) had to deal with an order of a District Magistrate permitting the withdrawal of a prosecution in one case and ordering further enquiry (under S.436) in a counter case. The facts and circumstances set out in the judgment speak for themselves. One or two passages will serve to show what the learned Judges felt about the proceedings in the Court below. The Public Prosecutor is stated to have appeared 'in his capacity as a private advocate' in the petition for further enquiry and 'as Public Prosecutor' in the connected proceedings wherein he asked for leave to withdraw the prosecution from the District Magistrate who had transferred the complaint to his own file. The learned Chief Justice says:

This, in our opinion, was a most improper procedure. It is our experience in this Province that public Prosecutors do not withdraw cases except upon instructions of the District Magistrate, who in this case presided in the Court. These proceedings we think, merely illustrate the difficulties which arise when the District Magistrate fails to follow in letter and in spirit the provisions of the law by which he himself is bound and which it is his duty to respect . . . we think that in accepting the application the District Magistrate allowed himself to be used in a manner which, in our opinion, was clearly subversive of the proper administration of justice in his District.

The other two instances are recent cases heard in the Allahabad High Court one by Ismail J. and the other by the learned Chief Justice. They have not yet been reported, but as they were noticed in the Press, we requested the Allahabad High Court for, and by their kind courtesy have been furnished with copies of the two judgments. It so happens that both of them are cases tried under the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance and in both instances the learned Judges of the High Court before whom the matter was attempted to be brought found that the charges against the accused had nothing to do with the recent disturbances or with any subversive movement; and, though they were of the opinion in both the cases that the conviction was wrong, they felt helpless to do anything in the matter, because of S.26 of the Ordinance. They had to console themselves with an expression of their opinion as to what the law was. In the first case, ALL. Review Case No. 52 of 1943, all that appeared in the evidence was that one day a man was found by the police to have in his house small change to the extent of Rs 99. How he came by it, and when and whether it came to him at all after the rule under the Defence of India Act about acquisition of coins had been framed, there was nothing in the case to show and yet he was convicted and sentenced to eighteen months' rigorous imprisonment. There was no right of appeal nor the power of revision; and this is what the learned judge says in the course of his judgment:

If my interpretation [of the rule] is correct, it follows that the accused has been wrongly convicted. . . . In the present case, I have gone into the merits of the question because I feel that the conviction of the accused is illegal upon a correct interpretation of sub-cl. (d). [Rule 90 (2) (d) of the Defence of India Rules - Ed.].

In the case before the learned Chief Justice, ALL. Cri Revn. No. 408 of 1943 a father and three sons belonging to a zamindar family paying a Government revenue of Rs 5000 per annum and income-tax of Rs 1000 per annum were found to have 157 maunds of wheat stored in their house and some unlicensed arms. On a prosecution under R. 81, Defence of India Rules, each of the four members was fined Rs 2000 (rupees two thousand). The learned Chief Justice says:

'I cannot refrain from observing that the amount of fine imposed by the Special Magistrate was to my mind preposterous' and he adds that but for the provisions of the Ordinance.

I would have taken cognizance of the case in the exercise of my revisional jurisdiction and, in that case, I would have set aside the fine imposed on each of the three sons. I however am unable to do so as the provisions of S.26 of the Ordinance debar me.

There was however an application before the learned Judge objecting to the trial by the Special Magistrate, in view of a notification of the Provincial Government and that gave him an opportunity to say what the Magistrate should do. He said:

I am alive to the fact that, in his capacity as Special Magistrate, Mr Brij Bahadur is immune from the judicial supervision of this Court. He must however appreciate that he is also a Magistrate of the first class and in that capacity he is under the immediate subordination of this Court. It is therefore his duty to take note of all the observations contained in this order and . . . decide to try the case according to the ordinary law.

Under S.526, Criminal P.C., the High Court can direct the transfer of a case from one Court to another, if it is made to appear that a fair and impartial inquiry or trial cannot be had in the former Court. This provision has no doubt been often resorted to by the accused without sufficient justification and unnecessary delay and obstruction have thereby been caused. But none can take exception to the soundness of the principle embodied in it or to the need for its exercise in appropriate cases. In the first instance, the Ordinance excluded this power without substituting any other provision to meet such a contingency (S.14 and S.16 (2) could hardly be held to be a substitute). Later on, certain limited powers of transfer have, by Ss. 25A and 25B, been conferred upon the District Magistrate, the Sessions Judge and the Provincial Government; but the exclusion of the High Court's powers stands.

We have been reminded that the way the High Court's powers have been dealt with in the Ordinance is a question of policy with which the Court is not concerned. This ignores the bearing of this circumstance on the decision of the question whether the exercise of the power conferred on the Provincial Government or the District Magistrate under Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance can be described, in the language of some of the cases, as merely doing something ancillary, subordinate, or incidental, or by itself involves results of such seriousness and magnitude that its exercise could not have been legally entrusted to these authorities. This has also an important bearing on the question of the relation of the Ordinance to the provisions of S.223, Constitution Act. Proceeding now to head (c), the relevant provisions are those contained in Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance. Sections 10 and 16 run in the same terms as S.5, except that in S.16 the District Magistrate or the Chief Presidency Magistrate has been substituted for the Provincial Government. It will therefore be sufficient to note the terms of S.5. It provides that a 'Special Judge shall try such offences or classes or offences or such cases or classes of cases as the Provincial Government or a servant of the Crown empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf may by General or special order in writing direct'.

A later amendment refers to cases transferred under S.25A, such cases need not be separately considered, as they must have been instituted in some other Special Court in accordance with the provisions of the Ordinance. It is at this stage necessary to stress the fact that the Ordinance has not repealed the Criminal Procedure Code in whole or in part or declared it or any of its provisions inoperative in any part of the country or in respect of any defined categories of crimes. All that has been done is to provide that in respect of proceedings before the Special Courts, the provisions of the Code shall apply only so far as they are not inconsistent with the Ordinance, and even the provision in S.26 excluding the powers of revision, habeas corpus, transfer, etc., is governed by words referring to the acts of or proceedings in the Special Courts. It is therefore important to consider (in the words of Khundkar J.) how 'the field of trial by Special Courts is demarcated from the field of trial by ordinary Courts or the category of cases to be tried by the Special Courts has been carved out'.

To appreciate the force of the criticism against the provisions of Ss.5, 10 and 16, it will be useful to know how they are being worked in Bengal, as it has not been suggested that method of administration is not in conformity with the Ordinance. So far as is known, no General rules similar to statutory rules or by-laws have been framed to demarcate the field. Of course, the Ordinance does not require such General rules to be framed and much less to be published. Announcements in the Gazette seem to have authorized the District Magistrates of certain districts to exercise the powers of a 'servant of the Crown' under Ss.5 and 10 of the Ordinance. Circulars seem to have been issued by the Secretary to the Government giving instructions as to how the District Magistrates should exercise their powers under these sections. The case out of which this appeal has arisen was tried by a Special Magistrate as the result of the specific order to that effect by the District Magistrate. In another instance, the District Magistrate is said to have made an order to the effect that 'cases arising out of the recent disturbances shall be tried by Special Magistrates'. Cases are said to have accordingly been brought before Special Magistrates on a certificate from the police to the effect that the cases arose out of the recent disturbances. The learned Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court felt constrained to observe:

This is extremely unsatisfactory from the point of view of the subject. It makes the police the arbiter of a man's right as to how he shall be tried -

We may add, also the authority to decide whether the High Court can exercise any of its powers in the matter or not. Again, the Chief Justice said:

The man's rights as regards appeal and revision are not pre-determined by law . . . No man knows which Court he may be tried in. That is left to the District Magistrate nominally to decide, in fact it may be decided by the police

In another part of his judgment, the Chief Justice stated that a circular received from the Government of Bengal intimated 'that District Magistrates are instructed to use the Ordinance only in cases of hoarding and profiteering'. These are offences created by the Defence of India Rules and have nothing to do with the kind of disorder contemplated in S.1 (3) of the Ordinance. In the Allahabad cases already referred to, it is on the other hand stated that instructions have been issued by the United Provinces Government that the Ordinance procedure should be utilized only in cases arising out of 'the recent disturbances or connected with the existing subversive movement'. We refer to these facts not with a view to express any opinion on the merits or demerits of this state of the law or of the administration of Criminal justice, but only to show that whatever the intention and purpose of the Ordinance gatherable from the preliminary provisions may be, Ss.5, 10 and 16 are so worded that the Ordinance procedure can be utilized by the executive authorities at their will and pleasure, against anybody, for the trial of any crime, without any restriction imposed or guidance given by the Ordinance as to the cases to which its indisputably drastic provisions are to be applied. One aspect of the question accordingly arising for decision in the case is whether Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance do not in effect delegate to the executive authorities therein specified power which should have been exercised by the legislative authority.

One serious point for decision arises out of the provision in S.292 Constitution Act, to the effect that all the law in force in British India before 1st April 1937, shall continue in force in British India 'until altered or repealed or amended by a competent Legislature or other competent authority'. The Criminal Procedure Code and other special laws which contain special provisions relating to the jurisdiction of Courts dealing with crimes provided for in such special laws are among the laws thus continuing in operation. Section 5 of the Code provides:

5. (1) All offences under the Indian Penal Code shall be investigated, inquired into, tried and otherwise dealt with according to the provisions hereinafter contained.

(2) All offence under any other law shall be investigated, inquired into, tried and otherwise dealt with according to the same provisions, but subject to any enactment for the time being in force regulating the manner or place of investigating, inquiring into, trying or otherwise dealing with such offences.

Sections 28 and 29 of the Code run as follows:

28. Subject to the other provisions of this Code, any offence under the Indian Penal Code may be tried –

- (a) By the High Court, or
- (b) By the Court of Session, or
- (c) By any other Court by which such offence is shown in col. 8 of Sch. 2 to be triable.

29. (1) Subject to the other provisions of this Code, any offence under any other law shall, when any Court is mentioned in this behalf in such law, be tried by such Court.

(2) When no Court is so mentioned, it may be tried by the High Court or subject as aforesaid by any Court constituted under this Code by which such offence is shown in the eighth column of the second schedule to be triable.

So long as these three sections have not been 'altered, repealed or amended by a competent Legislature or other competent authority', they must govern every criminal proceeding both as regards the tribunal by which a crime is to be tried and as to the procedure to be followed (including rights of appeal, revision, etc.). It is contended on behalf of the Crown (i) that in view of S.1 (2), Criminal P.C., it is not necessary that the Code should be 'repealed or amended' before the special jurisdiction and powers conferred by the Ordinance and the special procedure prescribed therein can take effect, and (ii) that, in any case, the necessary repeal or amendment has been effected by the Ordinance itself.

Next, S.223, Constitution Act, provides that the jurisdiction of any existing High Court and the respective powers of the Judges thereof in relation to the administration of justice in the Court shall be the same as immediately before 1st April 1937, 'subject to the provisions of any Act of the appropriate Legislature enacted by virtue of powers conferred on that Legislature by this Act'. Counsel for the Crown contends that by virtue of the provision in S.311 (6), Constitution Act, the jurisdiction and powers of the High Court can be modified by an Ordinance and that this has been done by the impugned Ordinance. As already indicated, a further question arises, whether Ss. 5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance do not in effect delegate to the executive authorities therein specified an undefined and uncontrolled power in respect of matters which should have been provided for by the legislative authority itself. It is replied on behalf of the Crown that this is a matter of policy which it is not for the Court to discuss.

The learned Chief justice of the Calcutta High Court was of the opinion that the relevant provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code had not been repealed by the ordinance itself, but that Ss. 5, 10 and 16 empowered the Provincial Government and persons authorized by them 'to repeal ad hoc certain provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code and of the Letters Patent of the High Court'. This is stating the position from the divestitive view-point, if we may use a convenient term, that is, by referring to the manner in which the jurisdiction of the regular Courts is attempted to be excluded. The other learned Judge (Khundkar J.) took the view that the ordinance has conferred on the Provincial Government and its authorized officers a power to do by individual direction in particular cases what should properly have been brought about by legislation or at least by rule. . . . (It) is a power to effectuate jurisdiction of special criminal Courts by making orders in individual cases or groups of cases and the exercise of that power is entirely unconfined by any rule or condition.

In another place, he said:

The jurisdiction of the Special Courts under the ordinance is undetermined until it is attracted to a particular case by the order of an executive authority.

This seems to deal with the matter from what may be described as the investiture point of view, that is, the way in which the Special Courts are invested with jurisdiction to try any particular case. If it should be held that the ordinance had not itself repealed the relevant provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code in respect of any particular case, the question would arise (apart from the appellant's arguments based on S.1 (2) of the Code): Whether on a proper construction of Ss. 5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance and whatever may be the language or drafting device employed, it is not the executive act of particular officers passed in individual cases or classes or cases that really takes away the jurisdiction of the regular Courts and in effect invests the Special Courts with jurisdiction in respect of those cases.

Dealing first with the contention that the material provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code have been repealed or amended by the ordinance itself, the position is — and this is admitted by the Crown — that, in the Province of Bengal, there are now two sets of Courts, the ordinary Criminal Courts and the special criminal Courts, both working side by side, but with fundamental differences in their procedure and very serious consequences to the prejudice of the accused flowing out of these differences. The allotment of a case or of a group of cases to the Special Courts, which will prevent their going before the regular Courts, undoubtedly results from the order, general or special, passed by the District Magistrate (or Presidency Magistrate) under Ss. 5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance. But unless, prior to the moment when the District Magistrate so allots the case for trial by a Special Court, the provision of the Criminal Procedure Code as to the Court by which a particular case is to be tried has been excluded in a manner recognised by law, it is difficult to see what authority the District Magistrate, as an administrative officer, can have to direct it to be tried by any other Court. Counsel for the Crown at one stage suggested that the Criminal Procedure Code would not apply to the Special Courts except to the extent to which it was made applicable by the ordinance itself. But he admitted later on that in view of S.5 of the Code 'all offences under the Indian Penal Code' must be 'investigated, enquired into, tried and otherwise dealt with' according to the provisions of the Code. The same principle applies even to offences under any other law, subject, of course, to any other enactment regulating the manner or place of investigation, enquiry, trial, etc. As already stated, the ordinance itself creates or declares no new offences; and the combined effect of Ss. 5, 28 and 29 of the Code, is that unless those provisions are specifically excluded by law, the code will govern the institution and trial of every criminal case.

We have carefully considered the terms of the ordinance; we find it impossible to accede to the contention that before and independently of the order under S.5, 10 of 16, the relevant sections of the Code are excluded by the ordinance. The material provisions of the ordinance only enact that in respect of cases tried by the Special courts, a certain procedure shall be followed. But this does not bear on the question which cases are to be tried by the Special Courts as distinguished from cases to be tried by the regular Courts. The words in Ss.10 and 16 which exclude particular offences from the jurisdiction of Special Magistrates and Summary Courts respectively cannot affect the question, because their jurisdiction to try any particular case even when it does not fall within the excluded categories arises only on and out of the order of the authorized officer. Section 27 is worded not as a provision excluding the Criminal Procedure Code, but as a provision extending it to proceedings before the Special Courts so far as they are not 'inconsistent with the provisions of the Ordinance'. But even if one should be prepared to read S.27 as an 'excluding' provision, it can take effect only if and after any particular case goes before any of the Special Courts.

The feature of the Ordinance to which the strongest objection has been taken not merely by counsel for the accused but also by the learned Judges of the High Court is that which places it in the power of the District Magistrate — who practically represents the prosecution — to discriminate between man and man in the same locality — it may be even in respect of the same or a similar crime -- and to send one of them for trial by a Special Court, with all the risks and dis-advantages which the special procedure involves, while leaving the other to be tried in the normal course by the regular Courts. It will require no special knowledge of Indian conditions to appreciate what such a power in the hands of the executive means and involves. The limited option allowed by Ss.178 to 183 of the Code to the Government or to a complainant to choose as between two or more Courts bears no analogy. That option is available only in the few cases carefully defined in the Code itself and relates after all only to the locality of the trial. It does not involve a change in procedure nor deprive the accused of the safe-guards and privileges provided for him by the Code. Any real hardship to the accused, if it arises out of such choice of forum by the Government or the complainant can be remedied by suitable orders under S.526.

The Advocate-General of India asked us to presume that the power under Ss.5, 10 and 16 would be exercised by responsible officers and only on reasonable grounds. In answer to this, we must observe that when a question of principle is involved, it is scarcely fair to complicate it by introducing considerations of personalities. It must also be pointed out that S.5 of the Ordinance does not even prescribe that the servant of the Crown to be empowered thereunder should be at least of a certain official grade. The strongest answer however to this argument is furnished by what is stated to have occurred in Parliament in August 1940, when the bill, which subsequently became the Emergency Powers (Defence) (No. 2) Act, 1940, 3 & 4 Geo VI, Ch. 45 was before the House of Commons. When there were complaints as to certain defects in the bill, particularly the absence of a provision for appeal, 'the Government asked Parliament to rely upon their reasonable use of the wide powers remembering the opportunity which Parliament has of annulling Defence Regulations'. The bill was however subjected to fierce criticism in the House of Commons, on the ground that according to its terms, Special Courts could be empowered to impose even the death penalty without any right of appeal. Members were unwilling to rely on an undertaking to provide in the Regulations for appeals from Special Courts. The Government finally promised to introduce an amendment in the House of Lords and provision was accordingly made in the statute itself for review of the decisions, particularly in cases in which a sentence of death was passed. [Butterworth's Emergency Legislation Service-Statutes Supplement No. 6, Preliminary Note on p. 20. Sir Cyril Carr also refers to this incident, in his Lectures on Administrative Law.] When one takes note of the relation of Parliament and of public opinion in England to the working of a statute and of the corresponding situation in this country, especially in relation to ordinances, and when one also remembers that this debate in the House of Commons took place on the eve of the German blitz and in spite of the fact that according to the main statute [2 and 3 Geo, VI, Ch.62, s.8] every order containing Defence Regulations should be laid before Parliament and could be annulled by a resolution of the House, the weakness of the argument based on the trust to be placed in the executive authorities becomes obvious.

As counsel for the Crown attempted to found an argument on Regulation No. 7 of the Defence (War Zone Courts) Regulations, 1940 (dated 7th August 1940), it is necessary to make a passing reference to them. It is specially worthy of note that the Regulations of 7th August 1940, as well as the Defence (Administration of justice) Regulations of 19th June 1940, differ fundamentally from the impugned Ordinance in that they do not make it possible for the executive authorities to discriminate between one accused and another. As we have already pointed out, that is the most serious defect in the impugned Ordinance. The scheme of the English Regulations is to provide that all persons charged with indictable offences before justices in certain areas should, when it is not practicable to hold the trial in that area, be committed to be tried at the assizes at other named places, that is, on the assumption that military exigencies may make it impossible to hold the Court at particular places. The next step is to make provision for a less dilatory and more flexible procedure and even here no room has been given for discriminating one between one man and another. As pointed out in Butterworth's Preliminary Note, the new Regulations replace committal to assizes or quarter sessions by committal for trial by a war zone Court. A comparison of the Regulations themselves and of the rules made by the Lord Chancellor thereunder with the impugned Ordinance will constitute an interesting study in contrast between the methods adopted in England and the methods adopted in this country to deal with the emergency; but we refrain from doing so, as it will take us into a long digression. It is sufficient to refer to Regulation 7 on which learned counsel for the Crown based an argument that something in the nature of an option was left to military or police officers to choose whether an accused should be tried by a war zone Court or by one of the regular Courts. This is based upon a misreading of that Regulation. The following note in Butterworths' publication under that Regulation will explain its scope and effect and also the meaning of the proviso to Para (1) of Regulation 7:

Note — It will be seen from this Regulation that the procedure in war zones in relation to summary offences and up to the committal for trial in relation to indictable offences is, subject to the power of short-circuiting the jurisdiction of justices under the proviso to para (1) [which by virtue of the provisions of Regulation 6 (1) ante will enable proceedings in respect of a summary offence to be initiated before a war zone Court], the normal procedure of information or charge before justices'.

Read in the light of this note and of the context, all that the proviso to para (1), on which counsel relied, means, is that, at the choice of the officers named, the proceedings may be initiated directly in the war zone Court instead of coming to that Court through the normal channel of information or charge before justices. That is what the note refers to as short-circuiting [cf. R.4 of the Lord Chancellor's Rules, dated 19th September 1940]. There is no question of sending one man for trial and sentence by one Court and sending another man accused of the same or a similar crime for trial and sentence by another kind of Court, at the option of any executive officer; and it will be noticed that even the limited power given by the proviso to the officer is available only when he 'considers it expedient by reason of the military situation' to adopt that particular course. The jurisdiction of the war zone Courts over any particular case does not result from the choice or order of an officer of the Crown, but by the general declaration in Regn. 6, that a war zone Court shall have jurisdiction to try any person charged with an offence punishable whether by virtue of any enactment or at common law by the High Court, a Court of assizes, a Court of quarter sessions, or a Court of summary jurisdiction. [See also Regn. 16, which authorizes the Lord Chancellor to make the necessary rules and excludes the operation of all other enactments as to practice and procedure.]

It has no doubt been always recognised that some authority in the State should be in a position to enact necessary measures to meet extraordinary contingencies. Section 72 of Sch. 9 makes ample provision for it; the question is about the manner of exercising that power. Before applying the analogy based on the English practice as to emergency legislation, certain differentiating circumstances must be borne in mind. In England even, emergency legislation is parliamentary legislation or Order in Council passed under the authority of parliamentary statute and it is always subject to parliamentary control, including in the last resort the right to insist on the annulment or modification of the Order in Council or even the repeal or modification of the statute itself. Under the Indian Constitution, the Legislature has no share in or control over the making of an Ordinance or the exercise of powers thereunder, nor has it any voice in asking for its repeal or modification. Again, anything like a serious excess in the use of special emergency powers will, under the English practice, be a matter which Parliament can take note of when the time comes for passing the usual indemnity Act on the termination of the emergency (see Dicey's Law of the Constitution, p. 236, and Carr's Administrative Law, pp. 69 and 70). That is not the position here, as the indemnity can be provided by an Ordinance. As against all this, the only safe-guard provided in the Indian Constitution is that the matter rests entirely upon the responsibility of the Governor-General. This only confirms the argument against delegation of such responsibility, at least without laying down in clear and definite terms the limits and conditions governing the exercise by executive officers of powers conferred upon them by the Ordinance. Today, in India, the situation is complicated by the fact that when large and undefined powers are entrusted to Provincial Governments and their executive officers, the constitutional limitations, conventions and etiquette implied in the theory of provincial autonomy make it difficult even for the authority promulgating the Ordinance to interfere to check the improper use of such powers.

In his book on 'Delegated Legislation' (based on his Cambridge Lectures and published in 1921), Sir Cyril (then Mr) Carr, observed: 'In so far as delegated legislation contains the germ of arbitrary administration every possible safeguard must be devised' (p. 26). He suggested five safeguards, of which two deserve to be noticed here: (a) the limits within which the delegated power is to be exercised are to be definitely laid down, and (b) the further point to be insisted on is publicity. The second safeguard does not merely mean publication, but was explained by the author himself as follows: 'Like all other law, it ought not only to be certain, but also ascertainable.' Reviewing these safeguards after the lapse of about twenty years, and 'in the light of ripper acquaintance' (as he claimed) Sir Cyril, in his recent lectures on Administrative Law, explains the first of the above safeguards as follows:

I meant that the control by the law courts (by way of declaring a rule or order ultra vires) should be made as simple and easy as possible by inserting precise words in the enabling Act (p. 51)

A comparative study of the Ordinances promulgated by the Governor-General during the last two decades will reveal a progressive diminution in the definiteness and completeness of the relevant legislative provision and a corresponding expansion of the limits of executive intervention in the determination of the form and the procedure applicable. The earlier Ordinances were limited to defined categories of crimes with reference to their nature, time, place or purpose and the choice of the forum even in such cases was left to the Governor or the Government to make. The practice has now been extended to all offences and the choice of the forum (with all serious consequences under the present Ordinance) has been entrusted to any servant of the Crown who may be authorized by the Provincial Government. This sufficiently illustrates the truth of Sir Cyril (then Mr) Carr's observation above cited.

As we have already observed, the considerations and safeguards suggested in the foregoing passages may be no more than considerations of policy or expediency under the English Constitution. But under Constitution like the Indian and the American, where the constitutionality of legislation is examinable in a court of law, these considerations are, in our opinion, an integral and essential part of the limitation on the extent of delegation of responsibility by the legislation to the executive. In the present case, it is impossible to deny that the ordinance making authority has wholly evaded the responsibility of laying down any rules or conditions or even enunciating the policy with reference to which cases are to be assigned to the ordinary criminal courts and to the Special Courts respectively and left the whole matter to the unguided and uncontrolled action of the executive authorities. This is not a criticism of the policy of the law – as counsel for the Crown would make it appear – but a complaint that the law has laid down no policy or principle to guide and control the exercise of the undefined powers entrusted to the executive authority by Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance.

We are of the opinion that the Ordinance has not by itself repealed Se. 28 and 29, Criminal P.C. (if such repeal were necessary – as we think it was) that notwithstanding drafting devices, it is only the order of the executive authority passed under S.5, 10 or 16 of the Ordinance, in respect of each case or group or class of cases that in fact operates to repeal those provisions of the Code to divest the regular Courts of their jurisdiction and to invest the Special Courts with jurisdiction to try any particular case or group or class of cases. We are also of the opinion that such executive orders cannot in law have any such effect and that Se. 5, 10 and 126 of the Ordinance are open to objection as having left the exercise of the power thereby conferred on executive officers to their absolute and unrestricted discretion, without any legislative provision or direction laying down the policy or conditions with reference to which that power is to be exercised. The powers of the High Court, though in form taken away by S.26 of the Ordinance are in fact only taken away by the order of the executive officer, because it is only on such order or direction being given that any case becomes a proceeding before a Special Court for the purpose of S.26. We accordingly agree with the High Court that the Court which purported to try and convict the respondents had no jurisdiction to do so.

We would affirm the judgement of the High Court and dismiss the appeal.

Rowland, J. – [Omitted: earlier part of his judgement discussing general points – Ed.]

In the Calcutta High Court, Derbyshire C.J. and Khundkar J. rejected the contention of the present respondents. Derbyshire C.J. said:

‘The argument raised by the applicants was that although under S.72 Government of India Act, the Governor-General was the judge of the emergency which gave him authority to make Ordinances, he could not delegate that judgment to the Bengal Government so as to enable them to say when the Ordinance should be brought into operation. Another argument was that there were two emergencies; (1) when the Ordinance was made and (2) when it was brought into operation in Bengal and that consequently the second emergency is not one contemplated by S.72. In my view there is no substance in this contention. An emergency arose in September 1939 when war with Germany was declared. This was announced in the Gazette of India Extraordinary, dated 3rd September 1939, as follows: 'In pursuance of sub S(I) of S.102 Government of India Act, 1935, I, Victor, Alexander, John Marquess of Linlithgow, Governor General of India, by this Proclamation declare that a grave emergency exists whereby the security of India is threatened by war'. The same day war was proclaimed between His Majesty and Germany. That emergency continues: in December, 1941, it grew graver because Japan declared war on the British Empire and joined Germany and began to invade Burma. Anything might have happened sooner or later and steps had to be taken to deal with whatever might happen. The Governor-General taking a conspectus of the situation with the assistance of his military advisers, was bound to envisage a possibility of an attack being made upon India and took such measures that he might deem proper in respect of that attack. The emergency at that time demanded action on his part and one of the steps he took was to make and promulgate this Ordinance by setting up Special Courts to deal with the situation that might arise later. That emergency did not cease; it continued and grew in intensity until the Japanese were very near the border of India and Burma. That stage of the emergency being reached — it was the same emergency but more acute — it became the duty of the Government of Bengal to consider whether it ought to act under the powers conferred upon it. The Government of Bengal then on 3rd April 1943, brought into operation the Ordinance. This kind of conditional legislation is well known and recognised in the Courts since the case in (1878) 3 A.C. 889.

To me the above reasoning of both these learned Judges appears cogent; the view taken by them is moreover in accordance with the (hitherto I think uniform) current of authority in the other High Courts, witness the decisions following: (1942) F.L.J. (H.C.) 233 from Allahabad; 15 Bom. L.R. 323 from Bombay; (1942) 5 F.L.J. (H.C.) 270 = A.I.R. 1943 Pat. 24 from Patna; I.L.R. 1913 Nag. 73 from Nagpur; (1942) 5 F.L.J. (H.C.) 284 from Oudh, besides an earlier decision of the Calcutta High Court in (1913) 61 L.J. (H.C.) 1:47 C.W.N. 354. I would simply follow those decisions without reiterating the grounds on which they are based but that Sen J. has in the case under appeal taken a contrary view holding, not that there was no emergency but that the Governor-General had not judged that there was an emergency. It followed, he thought, that the rule in 58 I.A. 169 did not apply, or rather, was to be applied in the contrary sense; and he concluded that the Governor-General had no jurisdiction to make an Ordinance. I must therefore examine the reasoning on which that conclusion is based. This part of the judgment occupying 20 pages in the brief is too long to reproduce here in extenso: but I shall try, in summarizing what appear to me to be its essential points, not to do the learned Judge injustice, or expose myself to the charge of parodying rather than depicting his line of thought.

First he accepts the contention that although the preamble states 'an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary to provide for the setting up of special criminal Courts', the contents of the Ordinance themselves show that the Governor General was not of opinion that an emergency existed. He cites from 58 I.A. 169 a passage containing the following dicta: A state of emergency connotes state of matters calling for drastic action which is to be judged by someone. That someone must be the Governor General alone. Emergency demands immediate action.

The learned Judge reasons an emergency exists if the Governor-General thinks that an emergency exists. The Governor-General has power to promulgate an Ordinance only if he thinks or judges that there is an emergency which necessitates the promulgation of the ordinance. I may interrupt the summary by saying that here the learned Judge goes beyond S.72 According to the section there must be an emergency: according to the Judge there must be an emergency which necessitates the making of the particular Ordinance'. By analysis of the preamble the fallacy will appear. It could have been worded thus: 'an emergency has arisen: and that emergency makes it necessary to provide for the setting up of special criminal Courts'. Reading it so, there are two propositions and the incorrectness or supposed incorrectness of the second need make no difference to the truth of the former, which for the purpose of giving power to legislate, is enough.

The argument continues, even if an emergency exists and the Governor-General does not think there is an emergency he cannot promulgate an Ordinance. It is what the Governor-General thinks that matters. My comment is, the statute does not say this. The condition precedent is, under S. 72 the emergency; the Governor General's judgement of it is proof of the emergency, but does not take its place as the condition precedent.

Continuing the argument, the Court, it is said, must decide whether or not the Governor-General has in fact judged that there is an emergency. That is the sole test; whether or not there is an emergency is irrelevant. If I am right in my previous comments, this is not the test at all. But for following the argument, let it be assumed to be so. It is then said that the Court applying this test must act on its finding. If the Governor General had said, 'I do not think there is an emergency, which necessitates the promulgation of this Ordinance would be ultra vires. If he said 'I do not think there is an emergency now but there may be one later', the Ordinance would be equally invalid. We must investigate the state of his mind; a question of fact capable of being determined like any other question of fact.

If that be indeed a question of fact, it is to be determined on evidence: and Mr Banerji for the Crown reminded us of some significant dates of which he contended that we could take judicial cognizance, as matters of history:

Japan made war	7-12-1941
Essential Services (Maintenance) Ordinance 11 of 1941 (Promulgated)	2-12-1941
Bombing of Rangoon	23-12-1941
Second Bombing	25-12-1941
Special Criminal Courts Ordinance of 1942, promulgated	25-12-1942
Penalties (Enhancement) Ordinance 3 of 1942, promulgated	2-1-1942
Motor Vehicles (Drivers) Ordinance 5 of 1942, promulgated	27-1-1942
National Services (Technical Personnel) Amendment Ordinance 6 of 1942 promulgated	29-1-1942

The preamble to Ordinance XI of 1941 recites that an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary to make provision for the maintenance of certain essential services; and the Ordinance imposes penalties on those who being employed on services essential to securing the defence of India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order or the efficient prosecution of war, or for maintaining supplies or services necessary to the life of the community desert their employment. This was to stop the wholesale exodus already going on from Calcutta, which received an impetus when Rangoon was bombed. The preamble to Ordinance III of 1942 recites that an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary to enhance in certain circumstances the penalties provided by law for the punishment of certain offences; and the first of the operative sections (S.3) enhances the punishment for theft in any premises which have been damaged by war operations or evacuated by reason of attack or apprehended attack by the enemy; or for looting of property left unprotected as a consequence of war operations. Other provisions deal with sabotage. The preamble to Ordinance V of 1942, recites that an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary to take powers to require persons capable of driving motor-vehicles to place themselves and their services at the disposal of Government; and the enacting portions provides machinery to this end:

The Japanese entered Singapore	15-2-1942
The Japanese occupied Rangoon	15-3-1942
The Japanese occupied the Andaman Islands, a part of British India	23-3-1942

A steady stream of refugees from Burma estimated at over a million was coming in to India from December 1941 to the time of the monsoon of 1942.

Sen J. has said in his judgement that it is not open to us to take into account historical facts or any extraneous evidence either as to whether an emergency existed or whether the Governor General had judged an emergency to have arisen. But according to Lord Halsbury in 1899 A.C. 143 such topics as the history of the legislation and the facts which give rise to the enactment may usefully be employed to interpret the meaning of the statute, though they do not afford conclusive argument. In my view the Governor-General's mind is not a question for us to inquire into; but if we are at all to enter on such an investigation I do not see why historical facts should be excluded from its purview. Especially significant, I think is the fact that Ordinance II and Ordinance III of 1942, the latter of which was to come into force at once, were made and promulgated on the same day. How can the Governor General in one day both judge that an emergency exists and that it does not exist? Can we presume to impute to the Governor General a weak and vacillating temper? Are we to fancy His Excellency, sitting in his Special Train, the hum of the wheels singing in his ears the refrain 'Emergency, Emergency, Emergency, Emergency'? The train jogs over points, the rhythm changes to 'No Emergency yet no emergency yet'. Then His Excellency makes ordinance II. The wheels resume their old tune 'Emergency, Emergency, Emergency', and His Excellency make Ordinance III. I am not speaking in a spirit of levity. I am very much in earnest, but so strong is my dissent from the line of argument I am examining that without some safety valve I could hardly restrain myself from commenting on it with undue warmth. It is not I who say that the state of mind of His Excellency is a subject for our speculation. I say, once you start speculating where are you going to stop?

But let us resume the argument, still assuming the reasoning to be so far correct. Only the statute, it is said, can be looked to: and the learned Judge refers to S.1(3) of the Ordinance, the terms of which are:

It shall come into force in any Province only if the Provincial Government being satisfied of the existence of an emergency arising from any disorder within the Province or from a hostile attack on India or on a country neighbouring on India or from the imminence of such an attack, by notification in the official

Gazette, declares it to be in force in the Province, and shall cease to be in force when such notification is rescinded:

Provided that any trial or proceeding which was pending at the time of such rescission may be continued and completed as if the provisions of this Ordinance were still in force.

This sub-section, it is stated, contradicts the preamble. Emergency legislation is something drastic and immediate; the Governor General is not vested with prophetic powers enabling him to legislate with respect to some emergency which has not arisen. If the Governor General judged that such an emergency had arisen he would take immediate action by setting up special Courts. He does nothing of the sort. He sets up nothing. He says that the ordinance itself is not in force and shall not come into force until the Provincial Government considers that it should be brought into force by reason of its being satisfied that a certain kind of emergency exists.

Stress is laid on words 'only if' in S.1(S) as showing that the Governor General did not think at the time of promulgating the Ordinance that any emergency which required to be met immediately by this Ordinance actually existed; again my comment is we are not to read into S.72 any such requirement as that it called for a finding as to 'an emergency which required to be met immediately by this ordinance'. This section only speaks of 'an emergency'.

The argument continues, the preamble and S.1(3) are contradictory, as to the existence of the supposed requirement. The learned Judge satisfies himself, by what with due respect, I can only call a round about process of reasoning, that it can be inferred that the Governor General did not think that 'an emergency which required to be met immediately by his ordinance existed and then he said S.1(3) contains a clear and unambiguous statement'.

Do I dream? Am I in Wonderland? Have we met in the person of the learned Judge, what Lord Atkin might call a new Humpty Dumpty? How much over time are the words to earn by meaning what the learned Judge says? For it seems to me that the boot is on the other foot. It is the preamble and not the section which contains a clear statement. As Khundkar J. in the passage quoted has said 'the preamble contains clear words showing that the Governor General had decided that an emergency existed'.

The reason which moved the learned Judge to apply the terms 'clear and unambiguous statement' to S.1 (3) was apparently to bring the matter within the scope of the rule that 'the preamble cannot be made use of to control the enactments themselves, when they are expressed in clear and unambiguous terms'. Manifestly, if the statutory words are not clear and unambiguous the rule does not apply. Applying that rule, the learned Judge says: 'The preamble cannot be used to alter or deduct from or add to this clear and unambiguous statement in the enactment itself'.

I think, with respect, the learned Judge has not appreciated the true scope and meaning of the rule, or the principle underlying it. In my view the rule is a particular application of a wider principle in construing every kind of instrument by which a legal right is created, obligation imposed or power conferred: you are to look to the actual words creating the right, imposing the obligation or conferring the power, as the case may be. If such words are in the enactment, it is to that we must look; if in a preamble, to that. Here the words authenticating the power of the Governor-General to legislate are in the recital, 'whereas an emergency has arisen'. They are clear and unambiguous and we are to look to them only.

The learned Judge notices, and scouts, the arguments that an emergency existed which made it necessary not to set up special Courts immediately but merely to provide the machinery for it. On this point the reasoning of Derbyshire C.J. and Khundkar J. is so clear and convincing that I will content myself with saying that I adopt it and have nothing to add to it.

File No. 3/16/43 – Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

Official Notings (extracts)

H.M. Home's first proposal is that an order should be made by the Central Government under rule 28 of the Defence of India Rules regulating the access of legal advisers to security prisoners. He says that no more than one such interview need be allowed before an application, and that whether more interviews will be required subsequently must depend on the attitude of the court. Further, that it should be provided that any interview should take place within hearing.

2. The point of having recourse to rule 28, as opposed to rule 26(5), is that orders made under rule 28 will attract section 3 of the Defence of India Act, whereas 'determinations' under rule 26(5) will not; the object being to provide something against which the direction of a High Court will not prevail. That being so, apart from the objection to coercing the courts, I doubt whether an order under rule 28 is really necessary to provide for the regulation of interviews before an application is made to a court, since there can then be no question of offering a barrier to a direction by the court, and the access of a legal adviser, unsupported by such direction, could apparently be controlled equally effectively under rule 26(5). If a legal adviser, dissatisfied with the number or nature of interviews he was allowed, proceeded to a court and sought and obtained a direction that he should be allowed more interviews, the case would be taken out of this category and fall under any regulations governing interviews granted in pursuance of a direction by a court.

3. When an application had come before the court, it is possible that the court might direct (a) that a legal adviser should be granted a further interview or interviews, in excess of what the executive authority considered necessary, or (b) that the interviews should take place at a time or in a place or manner to which those authorities took objection.

4. Para 2(3) in Sir Richard Tottenham's note of the 18th May¹ appears designed to meet (a). This seems to me to go beyond H.M. Home's intention where he says that whether more interviews will be required subsequently must depend on the attitude of the court. The only object in making an order attracting section 3 of the Defence of India Act as proposed by Sir Richard Tottenham would be, so far as I can see, to enable the executive authority to refuse an interview when a High Court had directed that one should be allowed. Sir Richard Tottenham's argument in favour of this course will be found in para 1 of his note of the 2nd May.² It is undoubtedly true that the responsibility for detaining prisoners without trial is an executive responsibility; but it is equally true that it has always in British constitutional practice been recognised to be a judicial responsibility to see that such detention is affected in accordance with the law. If a judicial authority considered that to enable it to discharge its responsibility a detained prisoner must be produced, or be permitted to interview his legal adviser, and an executive authority (and a District Magistrate at that) sought to place obstacles in its way, it can hardly be doubted that (except possibly in a case where the executive could produce quite extraordinary reasons involving the safety of the state) the judicial claim would ultimately prevail, and the conflict would be embarrassing and humiliating for the executive. The proper course appears to be not to seek statutory powers to resist the High Courts but to define clearly the conditions under which the executive authority proposes to allow interviews to take place, so that they may be understood by the High Courts and the parties concerned. It would then, I think, be only very rarely, and for particularly cogent reasons, that a High Court would attempt to give directions not in accord with such conditions. In short, we should try to canalize, not to obstruct, the powers of the High Courts. This could be done by providing for such matters as are indicated in paras 2(1), (2), (4) and (5) of Sir Richard Tottenham's note of the 18th May;¹ and the possibilities of doing this sufficiently effectively under rule 26(5) as suggested above may deserve further examination.

2. As regards Defence Department's comments contained in Mr Wakely's note of 11-6-43 on the limited proposals put forward by us, do Legislative Department agree that even if recourse is had to Rule 28, with the result that the orders made under that rule will attract section 3 of the Defence of India Act, the High Court will be able on a habeas corpus application to issue directions contrary to the orders passed under Rule 28? Apart from the legal side of it, I would see some advantage in issuing an order under Defence Rule 28, even though there be the possibility of the High Court issuing contrary directions. We must assume that ordinarily the High Court would not upset reasonable orders issued by us.

V. Sahay, 24-6-43

7. With regard to paragraphs 2 and 3 of Mr Sahay's note, I am in general agreement with paragraphs 2 to 4 of Mr Wakely's note dated the 11th June. Interviews between detenus and Counsel otherwise than at the instance of the Court are under the complete control of the Executive and I do not see that any purpose would be served by an order under rule 28 vis-a-vis such interviews. If, on the other hand, orders were made with the ostensible effect of empowering the authority having custody of the detenu to disregard a direction by the High Court regarding an interview between the detenu and Counsel, I have no doubt that in one way or another the court would hold the order to be ineffective and I can conceive nothing more calculated to antagonize judicial feeling than the making of such order. I have always ventured to doubt whether there is any real ground for the uneasiness which this question has evoked and I venture to inquire whether there has been any case in which a High Court directing reasonable facilities to be afforded has failed to leave the question of reasonable safeguards to the Executive authority as in paragraph 51 of Bose J.'s judgement in the C.P. case and whether all executive requirements are not met if the question of safeguard is so left to the executive authority.

G. Spence, 25-6-43

H.M. last [saw] the file on 17-5-43 at p. 52 of the notes]

2. H.M. may see Punjab Government's letter dated the 21st June 1943⁴ and paragraph 1 and 2 of Sir George Spence's note above on the question of the amendment of section 491 of the Criminal Procedure Code or of section 16 of the Defence of India Act to oust the jurisdiction of the High Court in relation to detenus. I see from today's paper that the Punjab High Court have dismissed Caveeshar's petition and that they allowed the proceedings to be held in camera. It seems to me that we had better leave alone the question of the ousting of the High Court's jurisdiction in habeas corpus application on behalf of detenus for the present.

2. There remain the two points which H.M. desired pursued. The view of the Defence Department and the Legislative Department is that it is unnecessary to pass an order under rule 28 to secure the object as a direction from the High Court overriding the provisions of the order could not be disobeyed, and that the purpose would be equally served by rules framed under rule 26(5) of the Defence of India Rules. This may be accepted and in that case all that is to be done is to see whether the provincial security prisoners' detention rules and our own rules include provisions on the lines of paragraphs 2(1), (2), (4) and (5) of Sir Richard Tottenham's note dated 18-5-43.⁵ His third rule would obviously be futile if the High Court has to have the overriding power to determine the number of interviews. The Punjab High Court appear to have been quite reasonable in the Caveeshar case, and I think expediency requires that we should not attempt to challenge the right of the High Court to order reasonable facilities being given to detenus in this matter.

3. As regards the second point about the provision set out in Mr Bartley's note dated the 16th January, it is to be noticed that in the Caveeshar case we got the opportunity of arguing against the application for production before the order was made and so far as I know there has been no trouble on this score with other High Courts, and my own inclination would be to drop action on this point.

V. Sahay

I accept the above Conclusions.

Express Letter

From

Punjab, Simla

To

The Additional Secretary,

Home Department, New Delhi

No. S-701 BDSB

dated Simla E., the 14th June, 1943

Subject: Interrogation of persons detained under rule 129, Defence of India Rules.

Reference: Your express letter No. 44/2/43 - Poll (I), dated May the 25th, 1943.¹

The value of special interrogation centres and specially selected and trained interrogating staff has been realized in the Punjab for some years, and a part of the Fort at Lahore has been set aside for the interrogation of political suspects in police custody. The value of interrogations as a means to unravelling conspiracies against the State and in connection with subversive activities has been proved on many occasions, the most important of which is perhaps the 'Bose Conspiracy', the Intelligence Bureau note on which has no doubt been studied by the Home Department. Practically all the information in this note was obtained by interrogation. It is, however, necessary to emphasise that it is undesirable to set any time-limit to interrogations and that, therefore, there should be no hesitation in extending the detention of suspects detained under rule 129 by an order under rule 26 to admit of their further interrogation if they do not make complete statements within the period of 2 months allowed by rule 129. Interrogation involves a study of psychology, and the best results are obtained by applying the principles of psychology and not by maltreatment. It may, therefore, take weeks or even months before a suspect makes a complete statement. The information on which the note on the 'Bose Conspiracy' is based took months to extract and could not have been obtained if the detention of the conspirators had been circumscribed by an arbitrary time-limit. Interrogation as an aid to intelligence is nothing new. It is relevant to recall the methods by which Sir William Sleeman exposed the Thags in India, namely, by the interrogation of known suspects in special interrogation camps. The knowledge acquired by such interrogations enabled him to build up a system of intelligence which eventually led to the suppression of Thagi in India. Again, in more recent times, the Nazi Spy Conspiracy in America, before America came into the war, was exposed by the interrogation of a group of Nazi agents whose disclosures provided much unknown and unsuspected information. In Delhi, the underground Congress movement remained largely unknown, thereby infecting the rest of India, until the interrogation of those who were known to be connected with it revealed their secrets. Had there been proper interrogation centres and trained and selected interrogating staffs in the provinces mainly affected by the Congress rebellion, it should have been possible by skilful interrogation of some of the ringleaders to have exposed the organisation and training behind the rebellion and to have established whether there was any Congress Axis contact. The uncertainty regarding a Congress-Axis connection and responsibility for Axis sabotage may be contrasted with the complete disclosure of the 'Bose Conspiracy' which was uncovered by interrogations.

No. S/1375-2/43.

Dated, 16th June 1943.

From G.W. Priestley Esq., C.I.F., I.C.S.,
Chief Secretary to the Government of Madras,
Fort St George, Madras.

To The Additional Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department, New Delhi.

Sir,

Interrogation of persons detained under Defence of India Rule 129 – Ref. Home Department's letter No. 44/2/43 – Poll (I) dated 25th May 1943.¹

I am directed to say that the practice in force in this Province is that persons arrested under Rule 129 are committed to custody, (i) in the Presidency Town of Madras, in the Penitentiary; and (ii) elsewhere in the Province of Madras, in the subsidiary jail or where there is no subsidiary jail, in the District or Central Jail concerned. In exceptional cases the police have been authorized to detain a person arrested under Rule 129 in police custody for a period not exceeding 7 days by order in writing of police officers of and above the rank of Deputy Commissioner in the Presidency Town of Madras or District Superintendent of police elsewhere. The Government of Madras are now considering a proposal to extend this by 15 days. Individuals who have been arrested under this Rule are interrogated locally by the Special branch, C.I.D. Officers. In the Special Branch, there are a number of officers who have had considerable experience of interrogation and no special additional arrangements are considered necessary at the moment in this Province as regards staff. Local people are kept in Police custody in various suitable local centres and they are interrogated by the Special branch Officers deputed for the purpose. But it may be noted that in this Province the C.I.D. have not so far had to handle any really important Congress or Socialist leaders of All India importance. Special arrangements will be necessary for such persons.

2. I am also to say that the Government of Madras agree with the Government of India's statement that satisfactory interrogation is impossible when a suspect is kept in a jail, and that the question of where an interrogation centre can suitably be set up in Madras City is being investigated by the C.I.D. This would also solve the difficulty of interrogation of such important persons as those referred to at the end of paragraph 1 above.

Your obedient servant,

38. District Judge, Assam, quashes a conviction in an appeal from Sylhet — (Congress flag hoisting permitted)

File No. 3/68/43 – Home Poll (I)

Heading of Judgement of Appellate Court

Court of Sessions, Appellate Jurisdiction

The 21st June, 1943.

Sylhet Criminal Appeal No. 57/2 of 1943.

Appeal from the order of S.N. Maitra, Esq., I.C.S., Addl. District Magistrate, of Sylhet dated 19.4.1943 in C.R. Case No. 412 of 1943.

Nirendra Nath Deb . . . Accused Appellant.

For the Appellant: Babu Kiranendu Syam, Pleader.

For the Crown: Khan Bahadur Abdur Rahim Choudhuri, P.P.

Judgment

This is an appeal against the conviction of the appellant under Rule 38(5) of the Defence of India Rules for having done a Prejudicial act within the meaning of Rule 34(6) (K) of the Rules in contravention of Rule 38(1).

The undisputed facts available from the evidence are as follows: The appellant was found hoisting a tri-coloured flag usually known as the congress flag in a public ground on the 26th of January last, which is observed by the congress as 'Independence Day', at about 9 a.m. There is no evidence to show that any member of the public was present at such hoisting excepting the four persons who were sent up for trial on the charge. There was no gathering near the flag or near about and no speech was made or slogans uttered.

The learned Magistrate observed that the Sylhet District Congress Committee was declared an unlawful association but this was admittedly not under the Defence of India Rules or for any action which came within the meaning of 'prejudicial' under the Rules. There is nothing to show that the hoisting of the flag has any connection with the District association declared unlawful. The action of the appellant itself has therefore to be judged independently. Assuming that the intention of the appellant was 'to win support for and strengthen the hold of congress', can this be said to be an act 'to influence the conduct or attitude of the public or of any section of the public in manner likely to be prejudicial to the defence of British India or to the efficient prosecution of the war' simply because 'the Policy of the congress is not helpful to the defence of British India or to the efficient prosecution of the war', as has been observed by the learned Magistrate? I doubt if a positive answer follows beyond reasonable doubt. The congress flag itself or the hoisting of such a flag is not said to have been banned. Such hoisting in a vacant place in the absence of any gathering or even looker-on and unaccompanied by any speech or ceremony or demonstration or any other objectionable procedure, which might directly help or encourage any activity against the defence of India or the efficient prosecution of the war, is, in my opinion, too far-fetched for being construed as 'prejudicial' to attract the operation of Rule 38(5) of the Rules. After a careful consideration of the matter, therefore, I am of the opinion that the conviction and sentence of the appellant cannot stand. The appeal is, under the circumstances, allowed and the conviction and sentence set aside.

N.N. Sen Gupta,

Addl. Sessions Judge.

Subject: Interrogation of persons detained under Defence of India Rule 129.

Reference Sir Richard Tottenham's express letter No. 44/2/43 – Poll (I), dated 25th May 1943.

By a notification dated 22nd November 1940, the Provincial Government specified jail custody for Defence of India Rule 129 prisoners. The same custody was specified in an amending notification issued on 7th May 1942. This Government considers that no new procedure is necessary at this stage when conditions are particularly quiet, arrests under Defence of India Rule 129 are few and far between and the need for interrogation by a qualified and expert staff is no longer apparent. Should circumstances arise which threaten a revival of disorders, the Provincial Government would consider amending its existing orders so as to provide for detention in Police custody in special cases. It seems doubtful, however, whether 'specially selected and trained interrogating staff' can be made available other than the normal police staff at district headquarters. Moreover, interrogation is certainly not necessary in all cases because Defence Rule 129 has been used with advantage in this province mainly for preventive purposes, especially the segregation for short periods of hot-heads to whom it is desirable to allow time to cool off.

The Additional Secretary to the Government of India,
Home Department, New Delhi.

Ranchi, the 23rd June 1943.

Subject: Interrogation of persons detained under the Defence of India Rule 129.

Sir,

I am directed to refer to your Express letter No. 44/2/43 - Poll (I) dated the 25th May, 1943¹ on the above subject. In reply I am to say that in order to provide facilities for interrogating persons arrested under rule 129 of the Defence of India Rules, the Provincial Government in their notification No. 502CW-1(19)/43 dated the 15th February 1943 (copy enclosed)² have specified jail custody or police custody as the custody to which persons arrested under this rule should be committed. They at the same time issued instructions to their local officers that (i) Police custody should not ordinarily be treated as the custody to which such persons should be committed and direct that they should be committed to Police custody only when the District Magistrate concerned, the Deputy Inspector General of Police, Criminal Investigation Department or his Special Assistant considers it necessary or desirable for the purpose of providing facilities for interrogation and so directs the persons making the arrest. (ii) Such detention should as far as possible be at the Police stations. (iii) The period of such detention should not exceed 15 days unless the Provincial Government passes an order extending the period.

The above arrangements are in the opinion of the Provincial Government adequate for serving the purpose in view and the necessity for the entertainment of a special staff and fixing up special interrogating centres has not yet been felt in this Province.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

41. Governor of Bihar to the Viceroy (law and order situation and the effects of judgements)

Linlithgow Collection

[NAI Acc. No. 2385]

From H.E. Sir Thomas Rutherford, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., Governor of Bihar.

June 23rd, 1943.

No. 455-G.B.

Dear Lord Linlithgow,

I have not very much to add in the way of amplification or comment to the Chief Secretary's report, Copy of which is attached.¹

I am looking into the reason why nothing was done on the Santal Parganas Deputy Commissioner's appeal for seed paddy, sent in January, until it was brought to my notice by him and representatives of the Santals in June.

2. I see Twynam has commented on the results of the recent Calcutta High Court's findings on the law and order position: the debacle in this Province will probably be even worse. As you know, many cases arising out of the August rebellion and the subsequent wave of disorder were still under trial by special magistrates and judges; the necessary retrials ab initio and the probable flood of appeals in decided cases will give a set-back to the arrangements I had set going for a concerted attack by all courts on the disturbing pendency of cases and consequent long detention in jail of undertrials. The bottleneck however is the wretched investigating officer who, besides trying to attend a number of courts to give evidence and instruct the prosecutor, has also to attend to the current crime of his station. Sanction has been given for the recruitment of a large number of sub-inspectors and assistant sub-inspectors in accordance with the programme of Police reorganization, but they will not be available for duty after their training till nearly a year has elapsed. I have told the Inspector-General of Police to order his Superintendents to empower as many of the existing assistant sub-inspectors in the thanas, as can reasonably be trusted to investigate cases and that they (the Superintendents) should 'shroff' all pending charge sheets and order the withdrawal of cases wherever there is doubt of securing a conviction. Many of the charge sheets have, I suspect, been rather wholesale and supported by what in the eyes of the courts may be insufficient evidence.

3. The Chief Secretary informs me that there are about 45 applications arising out of the Calcutta and Federal Court judgments filed in the Patna High Court which will be heard during the vacation by the two most junior Judges, namely, Brough and Sinha. I am not very confident about the results. These two judges on a reference from the Judicial Commissioner, Chota Nagpur, have upheld an obviously illegal order under section 562, Cr. P.C., on the ground that, 'leaving aside the legal position, the decision of the learned magistrate seems to have been dictated by sound and sensible considerations'. I enclose a copy of the High Court's order and Judicial Commissioner's reference from which it will appear that the accused were not only in possession of a wire-cutter but a bottle of inflammable mixture for causing arson, and that one of the accused tried to stab a constable.

6. This Hanumannagar affair in Nepal is a most unfortunate affair as it now seems almost certain that Jai Prakash Narayan was one of the prisoners rescued. Our police only got wind of it 5 days late in circumstances which have been stated in a letter from Lacy to Hassan of the External Affairs Department and so far they have not been able to trace any of the attacking gang, if any have come back over the border. In that letter the External Affairs Department have been asked whether they would concur in Betham being asked to sound the Maharaja on a proposal to allow a party of our Gurkha Military Police into the area where Jai Prakash is now believed to be to assist the local authority.

7. Many thanks for Your Excellency's telegram received today agreeing to my revised proposals for abolition of prohibition.

Yours sincerely,

T.G. Rutherford

In the matter of Lachminarain Sahu, Ramyad Sahu, Madan Kumar Chaube and Sambhunath Tewari (Accused) versus The King-Emperor.

Through the Public Prosecutor, Ranchi.

For the accused: Messrs Baldeo Sahey and Akhauri Badri Narayan.

For the Crown: Mr Harinandan Singh for Assistant Government Advocate.

Before: The Hon'ble Mr Justice Brough.
The Hon'ble Mr Justice Sinha.

Brough, J. – This is a reference by the learned Judicial Commissioner of Chota Nagpur under Section 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and under Section 439 the accused showed cause why the conviction should not be set aside.

The facts of the case are that Lachminarayan Sahu, Ramyad Sahu, Madan Kumar Chaube and Sambhunath Tewari were arrested at about 10 p.m. on the 12th December 1942 at Argorah railway station; which is the next station to Ranchi, in suspicious circumstances. Sambhunath Tewari had in his possession a pair of wire-cutters, and three torches were also seized from the accused. They were charged that they on or about the 11th of December 1942 had gone to the Argorah railway station to cut the telegraph wires and remove the railway line and thereby committed an offence punishable under Section 35 (1) (4) of the Defence of India Rules and in answer to the questions put to them under Section 364 of the Code of Criminal Procedure which was – ‘Did you on the 11th December 1942 go over to cut wire at the Argorah station’ – all the accused replied ‘Yes, Sir. I may be pardoned. I won't do such thing in future’. The prosecution called some witnesses who were not cross-examined. They called the Inspector of Police who made the arrest. He stated that about 10 p.m. he saw the four accused on the eastern side of the Argorah railway station platform. They were all flashing torch light in the upward direction, he arrested them and discovered among other things the items to which I have made reference. The Station Master also gave evidence to say that ‘on the 11th December 1942, they (that is the accused) came to my station at 9 p.m. They flashed their torch light’. In those circumstances the learned Magistrate found them guilty under Rule 35 (1) (4) of the Defence of India Rules and ordered them to be released under Section 562 (1) on a probation of good conduct for one year on their executing a bond of Rs 200 each with surety of the like amount. Lachminarain Sahu, Ramyad and Sabhunath Tewari executed bonds and obtained sureties, but Madan Kumar Chaube did not execute a bond or obtain a surety and was committed to prison and his case is not before this court. The learned Judicial Commissioner on reviewing the record of the case took the point that the offence under Rule 35 of the Defence of India Rules, that is to say, doing an act with intent to impair the efficiency or impede the working of, or to cause damage to any telegraph line or post as defined in the Telegraph Act, 1885, was punishable under Clause (5) of Ordinance III of 1942 with death and was therefore not an offence in respect of which the Magistrate was empowered to ask for surety under Section 562 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. He also pointed out that in fact the accused had not committed an offence directly under Rule 35 (1) of the Defence of India Rules, but that what they had done was deemed to be an offence under that rule by virtue of Rule 121 which says ‘any person who does any act preparatory to, a contravention of, any of the provisions of these rules shall be deemed to have contravened that provision’. I think that is clear that the admission of the accused that they intended to cut wires coupled with the proof of the fact that four of them proceeded together at night to a railway station where there were telegraph wires, one of them being equipped with a wire-cutter, constitutes the doing of an act preparatory to an offence under Rule 35 (1) of the Defence of India Rules. At first sight it appeared that section 5 of Ordinance III of 1942 did not, therefore apply because that Ordinance was passed after the Defence of India Rules and Section 5 in terms only applied to persons who had contravened Rule 35 and did not extend to persons who were deemed to have contravened that rule. But it appears that that point had occurred to the Government of India and in June 1942 they passed another Ordinance-Ordinance XXIX of 1942-which amended Section 5 of Ordinance III by the addition of the words 'contravenes or is deemed to have contravened'. It is therefore clear that an offence under Rule 121 of the Defence of India Rules read with Rule 35 is punishable with death and therefore in my judgment Section 562 of the Code of Criminal Procedure did not apply to the offence. The learned Magistrate in answer to the Judicial Commissioner set out the reasons which induced him to act as he did and those reasons commend themselves to me very much. He says — 'The accused persons who are admittedly impressionable youth all along pleaded for mercy and undertook not to engage themselves in any anti-Government or subversive movement. The object of punishment is reformatory and not punitive. I find that persons convicted in connection with the civil disturbance movement are being released from jail on executing bonds of good behaviour. I thought that the accused persons might be useful citizens of the Empire and that jail life would have had bad effect on their morale. In these circumstances I thought it expedient to use the provisions of Section 562 (1), Criminal Procedure Code'.

Leaving aside the legal position, as I say, the decision of the learned Magistrate seems to me to be dictated by sound and sensible considerations, and if his view was right, as I think it was right, at the time of the trial, it is even more right at the present time. These boys who are aged 18 and 19 have been at liberty on sureties for good behaviour for six months and no suggestion has been made that they have not been keeping their undertaking. I cannot but feel that irrespective of any view I might have taken if I had been trying the case, that any attempt now to impose any punishment on these boys would only have a bad effect. Therefore, although I agree with the view of the learned Judicial Commissioner that the order made by the Magistrate was one which in the circumstances he ought not to have made and had no jurisdiction to make, yet in my view the interests of justice are best served by this Court declaring to interfere in anyway with the order that has been passed.

45: Sushil Kumar Bose – Accused (Petitioner) v. Emperor [Derbyshire C.J., Khundkar and Sen J.J. Special Bench] (12 July 1943)

AIR, Vol. 30, 1943, Calcutta, pp. 489–511

Misc. Case No. 65 of 1943, Decided on 12th July 1943.
[Law Institute – New Delhi]

Sen J. – This is an application by Sushil Kumar Bose convicted and sentenced by a Special Court established by the Special Courts Ordinance, 2 of 1942, invoking the powers given to us by S.491, Criminal P.C. The application is based on the ground that ordinance 2 is ultra vires of the Governor-General's ordinance making powers. The Crown meets the application by placing reliance on ordinance 19 of 1943 which has repealed Ordinance 2 and made certain provisions with respect to the rights of persons sentenced under Ordinance 2 the contention is that this new Ordinance will govern these proceedings. On behalf of the petitioner it is argued that this Ordinance is ultra vires the powers of the Governor-General. It will now be necessary to relate certain facts regarding Ordinance 2 of 1942. This Ordinance provided for the constitution of 3 classes of Courts of criminal jurisdiction viz., Special Judges, Special Magistrates and Summary Courts. The jurisdiction of each Court was not defined but it was provided that each Court would try only such cases as the Provincial Government or a servant of the Crown empowered by the Provincial Government in that behalf may by general or special order in writing direct.

The validity of this Ordinance was questioned before us in the case of Emperor V. Benori Lall Sarma. The Chief Justice and Khundkar J., held that Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance were ultra vires the powers of the Governor-General and that consequently the Special Courts were not legally vested with Jurisdiction to try cases. I held the view that not only were those sections invalid on the grounds stated by the Chief Justice and Khundkar J., but that the entire Ordinance was ultra vires the powers of the Governor-General inasmuch as the Ordinance showed on the face of it, that, in the opinion of the Governor-General and emergency necessitating the Ordinance had not arisen at the time the Ordinance was promulgated and also on the ground that the Governor-General had delegated to the Provincial Government the function of deciding whether or not an emergency requiring the application of the Ordinance had arisen. The unanimous opinion of the Court was that the special Courts had no jurisdiction to try the petitioner and we set aside the convictions and sentences and directed the release and retrial of the petitioners according to law.

An appeal from our decision was taken to the Federal Court by the Crown. The majority of the Federal Court, Rowland J. dissenting, dismissed the appeal. They held the view that unless Ss.28 and 29, Criminal P.C., were repealed, the special Courts of the Ordinance would have no jurisdiction to try cases. They held further that, notwithstanding drafting devices, the Ordinance by itself had not repealed these sections, but that it was the executive order to be passed under Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance in respect of each case or group of cases that would, in fact, operate to repeal these provisions of the Code, to divest the regular Courts of their jurisdiction and to invest the special Courts with jurisdiction to try any case or group of cases. They added 'We are of opinion that such executive orders cannot in law have any such effect'. They also held the view that the powers of the High Court though in form taken away by S 26 of the Ordinance were, in fact, taken away only when an executive order was passed under Ss.5, 10 or 16. Their Lordship's view was that the powers of the High Court could be taken away only by a Legislature. Lastly, they took the view that the Governor-General had, by the provisions of Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance delegated his legislative powers to the executive in a manner which amounted to an application of his legislative powers and that the Constitution Act did not empower him to do such a thing. In the result, they found that the Special Courts had no jurisdiction to try the respondents. Rowland J., rejected the unanimous opinion of this Court and also the view that I alone held, viz., that the whole of Ordinance 2 was ultra vires as the Ordinance, on the face of it, showed that the Governor-General was of opinion that an emergency requiring the Ordinance had not arisen at the time the Ordinance was promulgated. He has expressed disagreement with my view in language which I cannot hope to emulate. He describes His Excellency the Viceroy sitting in his special train and hearing the wheels humming 'Emergency, Emergency', and then 'no Emergency yet, no Emergency yet'. Then he goes on to say:

I am not speaking in a spirit of levity. I am very much in earnest but so strong is my dissent from of the line of argument I am examining the without some safety valve I could hardly restrain myself from commenting on it with under warmth.

A little later his Lordship observes:

Do I dream? Am I in wonder land? Have we met in the person of the learned judgment what Lord

Atkin might call a new Humpty-Dumpty? How much over time are the words to earn by meaning what the learned Judge says? For it seems to me that the boot is on the other foot.

I believe there is a sound rule that metaphors like strong drinks should never be mixed. Such mixtures lead only to confused thinking, I must confess that the mixture of Viceregal trains, dreams and boots is too potent for my assimilation. Is it my judgment that is solely responsible for making his Lordship feel once like an over-heated locomotive with an inadequate safety valve drawing the Viceregal special train and then like innocent Alice, wondering at thing she cannot understand? I may have thought it was, were it not for the fact that the other two learned Judges, who were trained in the profession of law reacted differently from Rowland J., who, in the words used by Turner L.J. of the Judicial Committee in the Sivagunga case, is 'an unprofessional Judge', 9 M.I.A. 539 at p. 601 Their Lordships, the Chief Justice of India and Zafulla Khan J. after setting out in great detail the arguments on the points concluded:

The contentions put forward on behalf of the respondents in this part of the case found favour with Sen J. in the Court below and they undoubtedly rise substantial questions. In view, however, of the conclusions at which we have arrived on the main ground of attack against the validity of the Ordinance we do not consider necessary to pronounce an opinion on these questions.

Having introduced the technique of likening Judges whose opinion differ from his to characters in fiction, Rowland J., will, I am sure, not take it amiss if I say that his manner of criticism of points of law which he does not appreciate makes me wonder whether in him we have not a re-incarnation of that well-known character in fiction – Bumble the beadle – who, disliking an interpretation of the law exclaimed: 'The law is an – ass' idiot' (Oliver Twist, Chapter 41).

Rowland J.'s judgment cannot, of course, have any authoritative value, it may have a persuasive value. I am however not persuaded. I shall therefore deal with the new Ordinance from the same standpoint as that which I took when examining the repealed Ordinance 2 of 1942 and even at the risk of again disturbing his Lordship's composure I shall try and avoid that attitude which Lord Atkin deprecates in the very case from which Rowland J., sought to draw inspiration. I refer to the observations of Lord Atkin, which probably escaped the notice of Rowland J. They are as follows:

I view with apprehension the attitude of Judge who on a mere question of construction when face to face with claims involving the liberty of the subject show themselves more executive minded than the executive: 1942 A.C. 206 at p. 244.

The new Ordinance avoids some of the defects of the one it repeals. There is nothing, on the face of it, to show that the Governor-General was of opinion that an emergency necessitating the measure had not arisen at the time of its promulgation. It comes into force at once, there is no delegation of the function to decide whether an emergency exists, there is no delegation of legislative powers to the executive nor is there any abdication of legislative powers, nevertheless, in my opinion, one of its sections, viz., S.3, is tainted with, what I may term, the original sin of the old Ordinance and is therefore ultra vires. What does the new Ordinance purport to do? Section 2 repeals ordinance 2 of 1942. Section 3 (1) gives effect to and continues in effect every sentence passed by a special Judge, special Magistrate or summary Court constituted by the repealed Ordinance and seeks to transform it into a sentence passed at a trial held in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal procedure Code by either a Session Judge, an Assistant Session judge or a Magistrate of the First Class respectively. Sub-section

(2) subjects the sentences so confirmed to such rights of appeal or revision as they would have been subjected to if they have been passed at trials held in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code by the above mentioned Courts from the date of new Ordinance. Sub-section (3) is immaterial for the purposes of this case.

The argument of the learned Advocate-General is this: 3 is ultra vires because it deals with a subject which is within one or other of the lists of subjects with which the Governor-General may deal by Ordinance. The contention on behalf of the petitioner is that although the Ordinance purports to deal with such a subject it is really validating that portion of Ordinance 2 which has been declared to be ultra vires by the Federal Court. Mr Sadhan Gupta put the point with great succinctness and clarity thus: Every sentence passed under the old Ordinance has been validated by Ordinance 19. There cannot be a valid sentence without a valid conviction, there cannot be a valid conviction without a valid trial, there cannot be a valid trial unless there was a proper Court and there cannot be a proper Court unless it has jurisdiction validly conferred upon it. By validating the sentences passed by the Courts constituted under Ordinance 2, the new Ordinance validates the jurisdiction given, to those Courts by Ss.5, 10 and 16 of Ordinance 2. The Federal Court having held that the Governor-General as a Legislature had no power to confer jurisdiction in the special Courts in the manner in which he had tried to confer it by the above-mentioned sections, it is not open to the Governor-General as a subordinate Legislature to enact either directly or indirectly that jurisdiction was good.

In examining these arguments there is one thing which we must always remember and it is this: There is a fundamental difference between a Sovereign and a subordinate Legislature. No Court can question the validity of a law made by a Sovereign Legislature like Parliament inasmuch as it has unfettered legislative powers. Bodies or persons given legislative powers by Parliament are in a different position they are subordinate or non-sovereign legislatures and as such their Acts may be adjudicated upon by Courts which, in a proper case, may declare them to be ultra vires. The Governor-General as ordinance-maker is such a subordinate legislature. He derives his legislative powers from the Government of India Act of 1935. Now a subordinate or non-sovereign Legislature has definite limits upon its law making powers. It can legislate only within the ambit of the powers which are conferred upon it by the enactment which creates it. Any law which it passes outside this ambit is ultra vires. It follows from this that a non-sovereign legislature which has made a law which is ultra vires of itself cannot by a subsequent act declare such law or any part thereof to be intra vires. To permit this would be to permit a Legislature with powers limited by some other authority to enlarge its powers by its new act without reference to the authority creating it. Now, if this cannot be done directly, obviously, it cannot be done indirectly by means of drafting or other devices. If authority is needed for this proposition I would refer to the case in 1899 A.C. 626 at p. 627 and to the case in 1940 A.C. 513 at pp. 533 and 534. These principles are obvious and simple but their application in particular cases has not always been easy, owing to the difficulty of determining whether a piece of legislation, which purports or appears to do something within the powers of the Legislature, is really doing something which is outside such powers.

Now let us test the validity of the present Ordinance by the application of this principle. On the face of it, the Ordinance appears to be Legislating with respect to a subject regarding which the Governor-General has the power to make an Ordinance. What this Court has to see is whether in the guise of Legislating with respect to this subject the Governor-General is, in fact extending his legislative powers beyond the prescribed limits. I shall examine the question first from the standpoint that Ss.5, 10 and 16 only of Ordinance No. 2 of 1942 are ultra vires of the powers of the Governor-General. The Federal Court's decision put shortly is that the Governor-General had not the power by Ordinance to subject persons to trial by Courts which were given jurisdiction solely by executive order. Now let us see what S.3 (1) of the new Ordinance does. Let us suppose that the section stopped after the words 'shall have effect' it would then read thus:

Any sentence passed by a special judge, a special Magistrate or a summary Court in exercise of jurisdiction conferred or purported to have been conferred by the said Ordinance shall have effect.

Would such a provision be valid? The Governor-General had no power to make a law subjecting persons to be tried by Courts upon which jurisdiction was conferred by executive order only. The Governor-General however made such a law and the petitioner was subjected to trial by a Court upon whom jurisdiction was conferred in this manner. The Federal Court has declared that such a law was ultra vires and that trials and convictions held under such a law were illegal. The Governor-General thereupon makes another law repealing, it is true, the old law, but validating, sentences passed by the special Courts which had been given jurisdiction by the invalid law. Is not the Governor-General by this device really validating those very sections of Ordinance 2 of 1942 which were declared to be ultra vires by the Federal Court? Is he not trying to do indirectly what he could not do directly and thereby enlarging his powers beyond the limits prescribed by the Constitution Act? In my opinion he is doing so and my reasons are those stated by Mr Sadhan Gupta which I produced in the earlier part of the judgment. By validating the sentences the Governor-General is really validating the sections by which he conferred jurisdiction upon the special Courts sections which have been declared to be ultra vires by the Federal Court. To permit the Governor-General to do this would be to permit to ratification of an ultra vires act by a person guilty of it. This cannot be done. (Street on Ultra vires, p. 441). To my mind it is quite clear that if S.3 (1) stopped after the words 'shall have effect' it would be ultra vires.

Let us see whether the addition of the other words makes any difference. These words only mean this: although the sentence were passed by the special Courts of Ordinance 2 in accordance with the procedure laid down to be sentences passed in accordance Procedure by Courts constituted under that Code. What is being done? To use a homely metaphor, a new label is being put on the bottle containing the same old medicine. Nothing is being really changed, only a fiction is being introduced. The position therefore is not altered and section 3 (1) remains ultra vires.

We must next examine whether sub-section (2) of S.3 make any difference to the validity of the section. By this sub-section the sentences are made subject to certain rights of appeal and revision. The learned Advocate-General very frankly stated that the provision of this sub-section would have no effect on the validity of the section. If it was ultra vires without sub-section (2) it would remain ultra vires even after the addition of sub-section (2). This must be so. The sentences passed under the old ordinance were not invalid because they were not subject to the right of appeal and revision granted by sub-section (2). They were invalid because section 5, 10 and 16 of the old Ordinance were ultra vires and these sections were ultra vires because the Governor-General had in enacting them delegated his legislative powers to the point of abdication in favour of the executive and left it entirely to the executive to vest jurisdiction in special Courts by order. This defect is not removed by sub-section (2). Section 3, therefore, remains ultra vires.

True, the present Ordinance legislates, in form, with respect to a subject which lies within the ambit of the ordinance making power of the Governor-General, but in fact the ordinance is in the words of Street 'the satisfaction of an ultra vires Act by the party guilty of it'. By maintaining the sentences passed by ordinance 2 it seeks to obliterate or cover the illegality of Ordinance 2. The illegality of Ordinance 2 cannot be obliterated by clothing acts done thereunder with a fictional garb of legality nor can it be obliterated by giving the convicted persons a right of appeal or revision.

In my opinion the present Ordinance is nothing but an attempt to keep in force by legislative devices something which the Governor-General could not legally bring about.

After the decision of the Federal Court regarding Ordinance 2, we must hold that the Governor-General as Ordinance maker had no power to make a law which could subject the petitioners to the trials in which they have been sentenced. As such trials could not have been authorized by antecedent legislation they cannot be validated by a subsequent Ordinance. It follows that the sentences also cannot be validated. In these proceedings we are not concerned with Ss.4 and 5 of the Ordinance and I express no opinion regarding them. In my view, S.3 (1) is ultra vires the Governor-General's ordinance-making powers and the other sub-section of S.3 being consequential to sub-section (1) must fall with it. I shall now deal with the matter on the footing that the entire Ordinance 2 was ultra vires inasmuch as the Governor-General was not of opinion that an emergency requiring the Ordinance had arisen and also because he delegated his function of deciding whether an emergency existed to the Provincial Government. There is nothing in the decision of the majority of the Federal Court which discourages me from adhering to that view. In this aspect of the case also, S.3 of ordinance 19 could be ultra vires.

The position may be stated thus: There being in law no emergency the Governor-General had no power to make any Ordinance. Therefore he had no power to make any law subjecting the petitioner to be tried and convicted by the special Court of Ordinance 2. Nevertheless he made Ordinance 3 and the petitioner was subjected to trial, convicted and sentenced. Then he declares that an emergency had arisen and makes an Ordinance repealing the old Ordinance but validating the sentences passed under it. What is the Governor-General doing in effect? He is really validating Ordinance 2 which he had no power to promulgate by antedating the present emergency. By the employment of drafting devices he is taking powers which the law has not given him viz., the power to make an ordinance where in law no emergency exists.

My Lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Kundkar have expressed the opinion that S.3 is not ultra vires: as I differ from them I feel that I should give my reasons for so doing.

If the intention of the Governor-General in enacting Ordinance 19 was to have all the convictions and sentences automatically quashed by the Courts he could very easily have said so. There was no need declare that the sentences should be deemed to have been passed in accordance with the Code of Criminal procedure nor was there any need to make elaborate provisions for appeal and revision. I may contrast the point of view held by me with that held by the majority of this Court as follows: I have held that S.3 is clothed in the garb of legality in order to effect something which is illegal, and therefore it is ultra vires. The view taken by My Lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Khundkar is that S.3 may appear to be clothed in the garb of illegality but as it intends to effect something legal it is ultra vires. For the reasons above I respectfully differ the view taken by My Lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Khundkar.

By the Court – We direct that the conviction in this case be set aside and that the applicant be released but that he be re-arrested and dealt with in the ordinary Courts according to the ordinary process of law. It will be for these in charge of this case to see that this person is re-arrested, brought before the Magistrate and dealt with. This direction is without prejudice to the powers of the prosecution under S.494, Criminal P.C. Certificate under section 205, Government of India Act, is granted in this case.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to the Home Department express letter No. 44/2/43 – Poll (I) dated the 30th June 1943,¹ which asked for a report in connection with the earlier Home Department express letter of the same number dated the 25th May 1943.²

In the Delhi Province the usefulness of police interrogation has long been recognised. No special staff is ordinarily maintained to carry out the interrogation of detenus, the work being done by the ordinary staff of the Provincial C.I.D. Persons detained in Police custody are kept either in certain special cells in the Red Fort or in police station lock-ups.

In the second matter, namely, that of Shibnath Banerjee, the rule also calls upon the opposite parties to show cause why Shibnath Banerjee should not be set at liberty. The two rules arise out of the same set of circumstances which are as follows: (1) Niharendu Dutta Mazumdar, (2) Shibnath Banerjee, (3) Bejoy Singh Nahar, (4) Debabrata Roy, (5) Narendra Nath Sen Gupta, (6) Birendra Ganguly, (7) Pratul Chandra Ganguly, (8) Nanigopal Mazumdar and (9) Sasanka Sekhar Sanyal who I will refer to hereafter as the detenus were held in detention under R.26, Defence of India Rules. On 22nd April 1943 the Federal Court declared R. 26 to be invalid having regard to the wording of the section of the Defence of India Act under which the rule was made. A day or two after 22nd April 1943 the said detenus obtained a rule from Sen J. under S.491, Criminal P.C., and on 7th May 1943 these rules came on for hearing before a Bench of this Court consisting of Mitter, Khundkar and Sen J.J. That hearing lasted until 31st May 1943. At a date before the hearing came on, the Government of India had amended the section of the Defence of India Act under which R.26 was made, in such a way as purported to validate R.26 as from the date that it was made.

On 31st May 1943 an order was made by the Court that the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Mr J.R. Blair should produce all the nine detenus before the Court on 3rd June 1943, when judgment would be given. It was represented to the Court that Sasanka Sekhar Sanyal was ill and the Court directed that he should only be produced if medical opinion was that he was fit to be produced. Another of the detenus, Birendra Ganguly was in a distant place where it was impossible to produce him in time and the Court apparently dispensed with his production. However the remainder of the detenus were produced in Court on 3rd June 1943 when judgment was given. Mitter J. delivered judgment first holding that all the detentions were illegal and that the rules should be made absolute. Khundkar J. delivered judgment next holding that the detentions were legal and that the rules should be discharged. Sen J. began delivering judgment at about 2.40 p.m. and finished somewhere just before 3.30 p.m. agreeing, in substance, with Mitter J. The final order of the Court was in accordance with the judgment of the majority that the said detenus should be released. The detenus had been brought to Court under an armed jail guard, and a strong force of police was stationed both inside the Court room, in the Court building outside the Court room and also outside the Court building to prevent any demonstration or disturbance of the peace.

Before the order for the release of the detenus was made, there was the armed jail guard standing near them and, of course, there were many policemen in uniform and doubtless others not in uniform in the Court. Mitter J. when he made the order of release specifically said 'let the police clear off' and thereupon the armed guards and a number of policemen left the Court room. There does not appear to have been any further application made for any of the other policemen, who may have been in the Court room, to go away although Mr Gupta, counsel for the detenus, stated to the Court that he did not know whether, having regard to the way things were going on, he would not again move the Court for another habeas corpus order or a rule for contempt of Court. It then appears that the Judges left the Court room and adjourned for the day. They did not come back to Court. Meanwhile, inside the Court room, the detenus talked with their friends and relatives and apparently some of them had tea which had been brought there. Mr Niharendu Dutt Mazumdar, one of the detenus, during this time got up from his seat in the Court room, walked to the door and went through it into the corridor outside. There were a number of people in the corridor outside. Mr Dutt Mazumdar made his way a matter of a few yards or so along the corridor and was then spoken to by Inspector Syed Hasan, who certainly got hold of one of his arms, if not two. Mr Dutt Mazumdar said to the Inspector 'what do you mean' and the Inspector said 'I arrest you', whereupon Mr Mazumdar asked if there was any order. Mr J.C. Gupta, counsel for Mr Dutt Mazumdar, by this time got to the place and heard the Inspector say 'never mind about it' or 'it does not matter' or some similar words to that effect. Mr Gupta protested against Mr Dutt Mazumdar being handled by the Inspector, thereupon the Inspector, according to Mr Gupta, handed Mr Dutt Mazumdar over to two or three sergeants who were present, who took him forcibly, Mr Gupta says, to the Inspector's room, which was close by. Mr Dutt Mazumdar, according to Mr Gupta, asked to be taken before the Judges, but this was not done although some counsel not engaged in the case apparently saw Mitter J. in his Chambers and told him what had happened, whereupon Mitter J. said that he was functus officio and that must be a matter for another application. No such application was made on that day. Mr J.C. Gupta also proceeded to Mitter J. and on hearing what Mitter J. said to the other Barrister left Mitter J.'s Chambers. At this point of time Mr Janvrin, Deputy Commissioner of Police, Calcutta, who is of the Special Branch and in charge of the police who were employed in connexion with this matter at the Court on that day, had arrived on the scene in the corridor. Mr J.C. Gupta protested to Mr Janvrin against the manner in which the police had handled Mr Dutt Mazumdar.

Mr Janvrin's version is that Mr Dutt Mazumdar was told by Mr Gupta to go to the Inspector's room which he did voluntarily and that he was not dragged. Thereupon Mr Gupta and Mr Janvrin had a conversation. Mr Gupta says he asked Mr Janvrin whether he had any warrant for the arrest and, whether he had authority to execute it in the Court premises. Mr Gupta thereupon accompanied Mr Janvrin to the Inspector's room where Mr Janvrin showed Mr Gupta a file containing committal orders under Regn. 3 of 1818 signed by Mr Blair, Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal. Mr Gupta's version then is that he told Mr Janvrin that if he wanted to arrest the other detenus in the Court room he, Mr Gupta, would go and tell them about it. According to Mr Gupta, Mr Janvrin said he would arrest them inside the Court room and thereupon Mr Gupta went to the detenus inside the Court room and came back and told Mr Janvrin that he might go and read out the order of arrest to them. Mr Janvrin and the Police Inspector Mr Shib Chandra Chatterjee then went into the Court room with Mr Gupta and one copy of the order was read out and the names of the six persons inside the Court room were called out and then, according to Mr Gupta, those six detenus were arrested and came out with Mr Janvrin and were taken to the Inspector's room and, subsequently, removed in motor cars which were waiting. Mr Janvrin's version is that Mr Gupta said that if he, Mr Janvrin, would show him the written order under which he was acting he would get his other clients to offer themselves for arrest, that he showed him the file containing the orders of arrest and commitment and that Mr Gupta then went to the Court room where his clients were taking tea and returned and suggested that he might read the orders out to them. Thereupon Mr Janvrin said that he went into the Court room with Mr Gupta and Inspector Shib Chandra Chatterjee, who read out the orders and called out the names. The six detenus then came out of the Court room and Mr Janvrin, who was at the top of the staircase at the end of the corridor, directed them to go to the Inspector's room which they did Mr Janvrin followed them and when they asked him if they were under arrest Mr Janvrin said 'yes' and they were taken away in the cars.

In an earlier part of his affidavit Mr Janvrin stated that he was instructed by the Commissioner of Police to effect the arrest of the detenus if they were released, and that the arrests were to be made on the verandah outside the Court room or, if necessary, inside the Court room but after the Judges had left if the released persons refused to come out of the Court room. There is a further allegation that when Assistant Commissioner of Police Abdul Gaffur was asked the same afternoon by two barristers how it was that Mr Dutt Mazumdar was arrested in the Court precincts he replied that the police had the permission of the Chief Justice. Many of the detenus were men of some position in Calcutta — some of them including Mr Dutt Mazumdar being Members of the Legislative Assembly — and it was obvious that the police expected trouble. There undoubtedly was a considerable amount of excitement outside the Court from 3.30 p.m. onwards, and the affidavits must be read in that light. I think the best description of arrest is contained in Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd Edn, vol. 9, p. 84 where it says that 'arrest consists of actual seizure or touching of a person's body with a view to his detention. The mere pronouncement of the words of arrest is not an arrest unless the person sought to be arrested submits to the process and goes with the arresting officer'.

The corresponding provision of the law in India appears to me to be contained in S.46 (1), Criminal P.C., which provides:

In making an arrest the police officer or other person making the same shall actually touch or continue the body of a person to be arrested, unless there be a submission to the custody by word or action.

Section 8, Criminal P.C., Provides that:

The police officer or other person executing a warrant of arrest shall notify the substance thereof to the person to be arrested and, if so required, show him the warrant.

I have come to the conclusion that Mr Dutt Mazumdar was arrested in the corridor outside the Court room a few yards from the Court room door, that a certain amount of force was used by Inspector Syed Hasan, probably more force than was necessary. Inspector Syed Hasan did not show any warrant or authority for the arrest to Mr Dutt Mazumdar before arrest but Mr Mazumdar was told of it a little afterwards in the Inspector's room when Mr Gupta was shown the warrants and committal orders by Mr Janvrin. As regards the other detenus, I think that technically they were arrested after their names were read out together with the warrants and committal orders by Inspector Shib Chandra Chatterjee, in the Court room—the moment of arrest being when they got up in order to follow Mr Shib Chandra Chatterjee out of the Court. No force whatever was used in their cases. At the time these arrests were effected the Court had risen and was, as Mitter J. said, functus officio.

It has been argued that arrests inside the Court building are improper. I cannot agree with that contention. Persons going to and from the Court upon the business of the Court in connexion with litigation are exempt from arrest under civil process but there is no such exemption in respect of Criminal process as the case in (1843) 12 L.J. Q.B. (N.S.) 49, referred to hereafter shows. If such general exemption were to obtain, the Court building would become a sanctuary for Criminals and the administration of justice in them would become impossible. There have been cases where arrests on Criminal process have occurred in the Sessions Court when a prisoner has been acquitted and discharged on one charge and re-arrested in the Court, while the judge is sitting, on another charge.

[Omitted: references to a judgement of Lord Denman in 1843 in the Queen's Bench, involving Capt. Douglas, an officer of the East India Company — Ed.]

It is here necessary to consider the legal position of these detenus when they were discharged. They were, each of them, free to go as they pleased to their homes—free from arrest on civil process; but not free from arrest on Criminal process. The freedom from arrest on civil process is a privilege which has been established by long usage and decisions. Does that extend to freedom from arrest under the Provisions of Regulation 3 of 1818? Regulation 3 of 1818 is entitled 'The Bengal State Prisoners Regulation'. The preamble sets out that:

Whereas for reasons of State . . . and the security of the British dominions from foreign hostility and from internal commotion occasionally render it necessary to place under personal restraint individuals against whom there may not be sufficient ground to institute any judicial proceeding, or when such proceeding may not be adapted to the nature of the case, or may for other reasons be un-advisable or improper; and whereas it is fit that, in every case of the nature herein referred to, the determination to be taken should proceed immediately from the authority of the Government . . .

'2. First. — When the reasons stated in the preamble of this Regulation (may seem to the Government) to require that an individual should be placed under personal restraint, without any immediate view to ulterior proceedings of a judicial nature (a warrant of commitment shall be issued by the Government) to the officer in whose custody such person is to be placed.

Second. — The warrant of commitment shall be in that one of the forms set out in the Appendix to this Regulation which is appropriate to the case.

Third. — The warrant of commitment shall, in relation to a person to be confined for reasons connected with defence, external affairs or the discharge of the functions of the Crown in its relations with Indian States, be sufficient authority for his detention in any fortress jail or other place in any Governor's Province or Chief Commissioner's Province, and in relation to any person to be confined for reasons connected with the maintenance of public order in a Province shall be sufficient authority for his detention in any fortress, jail or other place in that Province'.

Then follow other provisions which are not necessary to set out. The form of commitment in the Appendix to Regulation 3 of 1818 has been followed in the present case. It is in these terms:

Government of Bengal
Home Department
3rd June, 1943

To
The Superintendent, Presidency Jail, Calcutta.

Whereas the Governor for good and sufficient reasons, being reasons connected with the maintenance of public order, has seen fit to determine that Shibnath Banerjee, M.L.A., shall be placed under personal restraint at the Presidency jail, Calcutta, you are hereby required and commanded, in pursuance of that determination, to receive the person above named into your custody, and to deal with him in conformity with the orders of the Government and the provisions of the Bengal State Prisoners Regulation, 1818.

By order of the Governor,
J.R. Blair,
Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

The authority to arrest under Regulation 3 of 1818 is given by the State Prisoners Act of 1850 which states:

'The warrant of commitment of any State Prisoner under the Bengal State Prisoners Regulation of 1818 may, if it is issued by virtue of the powers conferred by that Regulation on Provincial Governments . . . be directed to . . . the officer in charge of any jail any where within the province in question; but any such warrant issued under that Regulation whatever the powers by virtue of which it is issued shall be sufficient authority for the arrest of the State prisoner anywhere in any Governor's Province and for his detention until he can be handed over to the officer to whom the warrant is directed.

It has been contended by counsel in support of the rule that the Governor was absent from Calcutta on or about 3rd June, and that the warrant of commitment set out above was not his work, but really the work of the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Mr Blair, and the latter being the person who signed the previous order of detention under R. 26. The Advocate-General for the respondents has drawn attention to S.59 (2), Government of India Act, which provides as follows:

Orders and other instruments made and executed in the name of the Governor shall be authenticated in such manner specified in the rules to be made by the Governor and the validity of an order or instrument which is so authenticated shall not be called in question on the ground that it is not an order or instrument made and executed by the Governor.

The order in question was authenticated in the usual way in which orders in the name of the Governor are authenticated namely, by the Chief Secretary or Additional Secretary to Government. We have thus to take it that the warrant of committal under Regn. 3 was executed by the Governor under his powers under Regn. 3 of 1818, by virtue of the State Prisoners Act of 1850 recited above, that is authority for the arrest of a state prisoner anywhere in Bengal. The question is — does it authorize the arrest of the detenus in the manner and at the time and place in which the arrest was made? The Court which made the order of release had risen and adjourned for the day and the Court room would, in the ordinary way be given over to the clerks of the Court to clear up and later to the Court Keeper's staff for the purpose of cleaning. The Court was, as Mitter J. remarked when visited in his Chambers by a Barrister and Mr J.C. Gupta, counsel for the detenus, functus officio. The police would have been entitled to arrest any one in criminal process in that Court Room at any time after the Court had risen — to take an extreme case, at midnight — without the permission of the Chief Justice. They must not, however, create a disturbance so as to disturb any other work of the Courts that may be going on. There is no evidence that they did so disturb the work of any other Court. In a similar way, subject to similar reservations, the police were entitled to effect an arrest under a criminal process in the corridor.

The arrests in question were certainly not made pursuant to any civil process, nor were they made pursuant to any recognised criminal process. The arrest and detention under Regn. 3 of 1818 are neither civil process nor criminal process. If it were necessary for me to decide what it was I should hold that it was something sui generis, a more akin to criminal process than civil process, because it is a restraint on the freedom of the subject imposed by the state purporting to be for the safety of the state, which is one of the chief features of arrest on Criminal process. Moreover, it bears some resemblance to the procedure outlined under S.107 (3), Criminal P.C. However, that is not necessary to decide since the Act of 1850 provides that the warrant of commitment shall be sufficient authority for the arrest of the state prisoners anywhere in a Governor's province. That provision, and in particular the words 'anywhere in a Governor's province' however is subject to the exceptions and qualifications laid down in Denman C.J.'s judgment. It must not be in the face of the Court so as to create a disturbance of the Court's business and it must not be a fraudulent proceeding for evading the order of the Court which is made in habeas corpus proceedings or proceedings under S.491. Criminal P.C., analogous to habeas corpus proceedings. The arrests were not made in the face of the Court and were not done so as to disturb the business of the Courts.

The remaining question is — were the arrests a fraudulent proceeding to avoid or frustrate the order of the Court? Counsel in support of the rule has pointed out that the decision to arrest the detenus under Regn. 3 of 1818 was made even before the order of release under S.491 was made. In a similar way the information on which Capt. Douglas was arrested was taken out the day before he was brought before the Queen's Bench by habeas corpus proceeding and yet the arrest was upheld. It was stated in the affidavit of Mrs Shibnath Banerjee that she had seen Mr Shibnath Banerjee, one of the detenus, eight days after his return to prison. He was in the same jail as before and apparently kept under the same conditions. It must be pointed out however, that the detenus are certainly entitled to more rights and privileges under the present custody than they were under the former since they are now entitled to adequate allowances for themselves and their families according to their rank in life and are entitled to opportunities for presenting to the authorities their case against detention. Opportunities for presenting their case against detention do not exist and are not provided for under R.26 although they are provided for under Regn. 3 of 1818. We have to decide whether the arrests were a fraudulent proceeding to get round and flout the orders of the Court given under S.491 in which case there would, as Lord Denman pointed out, be a contempt of the Court. It is for those in support of the rule to satisfy the Court that is so. Mrs Shibnath Banerjee in her affidavit states:

Your petitioner believes that the respondents A.E. Porter and J.R. Blair anticipated that the said detenus might be released on that day and so authorized the Police officers including the respondent Janvrin and the respondent Shib Chandra Chatterjee to act in the aforesaid manner in order to openly defy the Court.

In para 29 she submits that 'from the acts and conduct of the respondents the conclusion is irresistible that it was a vindictive act on the part of the respondents concerned calculated to bring the authority and dignity of the Court into contempt and to disgrace it in the eyes of the public by a defiant disregard of the order of the Court without the slightest excuse or justification'.

The order of release was made upon consideration of the circumstances under which the order for detention under R.26 had been made and also upon consideration whether R.26 having regard to the Ordinance amending S.2 (2) (x), Defence of India Act was legal. The facts upon which the order of detention under R.26 was grounded have never been disclosed. Indeed, there is no provision in R.26, Defence of India Act, for their disclosure. No challenge has here been made as to the validity of Regn. 3 of 1818 and no evidence was produced showing the grounds on which the order is based. We are left to gather as best we can from the surrounding circumstances whether this is a fraudulent proceeding to get round the order of the Court and flout the Court, the onus being on those who support the rule. Those who support the rule are in the same position as indeed are we, since the grounds of detention in each case are not revealed. There is a presumption under S.114, Evidence Act, that official acts are done with regularity. But that is a presumption only and is rebuttable. It may be that the grounds of detention are the same as in the former case, but as there was no evidence of or any decision on the grounds of detention in the former case, but only a decision on the validity of the order of detention and the provision of law under which it was made, we are not precluded from thinking that the grounds for the order of detention in the second case may be as are stated in the warrant of committal 'good and sufficient reasons connected with the maintenance of public order'. On the other hand they may not be. Since by the provisions of S.491, Criminal P.C., the Court is precluded from enquiring into whether a person is illegally or improperly detained in custody under the provisions of Regn. 3 of 1818 under the State Prisoners Act of 1850, I am unable to see how we can be the judges of whether there are good and sufficient reasons connected with the maintenance of public order for detaining these persons under Regn. 3 and the Act of 1850. I do, however, note that the times are abnormal in that there is a formidable enemy on our borders and that there has been grave disorder in India, although not a great deal comparatively in Bengal. It is possible in the circumstances that the arrests were made for good and sufficient reasons connected with the maintenance of public order.

There are one or two other circumstances which have some bearing on the question as to whether there was an intention to flout the Court. One is that when the Court ordered the Chief Secretary, Mr J.R. Blair, to produce the detenus before it, the Court's order was obeyed. The second is that when the Court ordered, in the words of Mitter J., 'the police to clear off', they did so. The burden is upon those who support the rule to convince the Court that there was a fraudulent intention to get round and flout the authority of the Court. On the materials before me, I am unable to come to the conclusion that the arrests were ordered as part of a fraudulent proceeding intended to flout the Court or its order. I am unable to conclude that there was in that respect any contempt. That disposes of the case against Mr Blair and Mr Porter. Next as regards the making of the arrests: It has been suggested that Mr Dutt Mazumdar was arrested without there being any warrant of commitment to justify it. Mr Janvrin in his affidavit says he got the warrant on 3rd June, but does not state the time of the day.

[Omitted: Some detailed discussion of the facts concluding thus — Ed.]

As far as Mr Janvrin was concerned, when the police were ordered to clear off, he together with the armed guard and several policemen left the Court. I can find no ground for saying that either Mr Janvrin or the police generally acted in contempt of this Court. . . .

As regards the Police Inspector Syed Hasan, although he was entitled to effect an arrest at the time and place that he did, in my view he showed discourtesy to Mr Dutt Mazumdar who was a member of the Legislative Assembly although he had been and subsequently became a detenu, and used more force than was necessary. This was not an arrest under the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure, so that the Inspector was not bound to show the warrant to Mr Dutt Mazumdar before arresting him. But he ought, in common courtesy, before seizing him, to have told him that he was under arrest and by what authority he was being arrested and to have asked him to come with him instead of seizing him by the arms and applying force to him in order to effect his removal. I can only regret that due courtesy was not shown to Mr Dutt Mazumdar and that premature and possibly unnecessary force was applied. That, however, is not contempt of Court and is a matter for adjustment between Mr Dutt Mazumdar and those who arrested him.

There is one matter to which I must draw attention. During the hearing it emerged that Regulation 3 contains provision which enable the detenu to be told what are the grounds on which he is detained and further provisions enabling that detenu to show cause why he should not be detained. I enquired from the Advocate-General whether there was any similar provision in R.26, Defence of India Rules. He told me, and as far as my research goes his answer is correct, that there is no corresponding provision either for informing the detenu of the grounds of his detention or for enabling him to show cause against it in the Defence of India Act or Rules. Under S.16, Defence of India Act, no order made thereunder shall be challenged in any Court. As the result of a legal accident R.26 has been challenged and declared invalid by the Federal Court. That declaration of invalidity enabled this Court to examine some, if not all, of the circumstances relating to the detention of these detenus. In the ordinary way these detentions do not come before the Court. It was a surprise to me when I found that there was no provision under R.26 to inform the detenu of the grounds on which he was detained and no provision for his being allowed to show cause against his detention.

There is a very old principle of law which is expressed by the Latin maxim audi alteram partem which means 'hear the other side'. So long ago as 1724, the Court of King's Bench had occasion to deal with that maxim. That was in the case in (1724) 1 Strange's Reports 557 where the University of Cambridge deprived Dr Richard Bentley, a famous scholar of his academical degrees without giving him first an opportunity of being heard. The Court of King's Bench laid down the principle that he could not be deprived of those rights without the opportunity of being heard in his defence and they did so in language which was emphatic but quaint. That case was followed in 1863 in (1863) 14 C.B. (N.S.) 180. There the Wandsworth Local Board under the powers which it had under the Metropolis Local Management Act of 1885 pulled down a house belonging to Mr Cooper on the ground that it was built in contravention of the law, but before doing so gave him no opportunity of showing cause why the house should not be pulled down. The Court held that Cooper ought to have been given an opportunity to show cause before the house was pulled down and followed and approved of what was said in the case of Dr Bentley and even recited some of the quaint language. In Regulation 3 which was passed in 1818 there is a provision of enabling the detenu to be told what are the grounds for his detention and for enabling him to show cause against it. That same principle of audi alteram partem was followed by the Legislature in this country in 1818.

In 1940 under the Emergency Powers Act of 1939 passed in England on the outbreak of the War Regulation 18B was made providing for the detention of certain persons who were not brought to trial. Rule 26, Defence of India Rules, appears to be based upon Regn. 18B. Regulation 18B follows the principle I have referred to because it gives those detained an opportunity of having the grounds for their detention stated and showing cause against it. Regulation 18B (3) provides:

For purposes of this Regulation there shall be one or more advisory committees consisting of persons appointed by the Secretary of State; and any person aggrieved by the making of any order against him, by a refusal of the Secretary of State to suspend the operation of such an order by any condition attached . . . may make his objections to such a committee.

(4) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to secure that any person against whom an order is made under this Regulation shall be afforded the earliest practicable opportunity of making to the Secretary of State representations in writing with respect thereto and that he shall be informed of his right, whether or not such representations are made, to make his objections to such an advisory committee as aforesaid.

(5) Any meeting of an advisory committee held to consider such objections as aforesaid shall be presided over by a Chairman nominated by the Secretary of State and it shall be the duty of the Chairman to inform the objector of the grounds on which the order has been made against him and to furnish him with such particulars as are in the opinion of the Chairman sufficient to enable him to present his case.

Provisions similar to that are completely omitted from R.26, Defence of India Rules. I draw attention to this matter in the hope that those responsible for this legislation may consider it. In my opinion all the rules should be discharged.

Mitter J. — Nine rules had been issued on Mr A.E. Porter, Additional Secretary to the Government of Bengal and others under S.491, Criminal P.C., to show cause why nine persons detained in the different jails of Bengal under orders passed under R.26, Defence of India Rules, should not be released on the ground that their detentions were illegal. Two of the persons so detained were Mr Niharendu Dutta Mozumdar, M.L.A. and Mr Shib Nath Banerjee, also an M.L.A. Those rules were issued after the Federal Court declared in *Talpade's case*¹ that R.26 was ultra vires the powers given by cl.(x) of sub-section (2) of S.2, Defence of India Act of 1939. Before the rules were heard an ordinance 14 of 1943, was promulgated by the Governor-General under the powers given by S.72 of Sch.9, Government of India Act, which purported to validate with retrospective effect the said rule. Those rules were heard by a Special Bench of this Court consisting of Khundkar and Sen J.J. and myself. The hearing lasted for over three weeks and was concluded on 31st May 1943, when judgment was reserved. On that date the Court intimated that judgment would be delivered on 3rd June. An order was also made for the production of eight of the persons so detained, including Mr Niharendu Dutta Mozumdar and Mr Shib Nath Banerjee in Court on 3rd June at 11 o'clock in the forenoon. With regard to the ninth man who was ill at the time the order was that he was to be produced if he was in a fit state of health. This order was duly communicated to the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal on 31st May. On 3rd June seven persons, including Mr Niharendu Dutta Mozumdar and Mr Shib Nath Banerjee were produced in Court.

A sufficient explanation was given by the Government for the non-production of the eighth man. The Judges of the Special Bench were divided in opinion, the majority holding that Ordinance 14 of 1943 was ultra vires the powers of the Governor-General and even if it was ultra vires the material conditions required for a detention under R.26, Defence of India Rules, had not been fulfilled. In accordance with the opinion of the majority, the order of the Court was that the nine persons be forthwith released. As there were indications at the time of the pronouncement of the order for release that the seven persons who had been produced in Court would still be kept under restraint in spite of the order for release, the policemen (and there were quite a large number) who were in the court room were directed to leave the Court room so that free movement of the said seven persons may not be interfered with. That direction was obeyed and the policemen and the jail guards went out of the Court room. The Policemen, however, just stepped outside into the adjoining corridor, which is the passage to the court room and lined themselves up. Soon after the pronouncement of the order for release my learned brothers and I left the Court room at about 3.40 p.m. The other Courts were then sitting. It is the common case that within a few minutes thereafter, but within the Court house² (that is before 4 o'clock) and when other Courts were still sitting, Mr Niharendu Dutta Mozumdar stepped out of the court room accompanied by his Advocate Mr J.C. Gupta. He was immediately arrested in the corridor by an Inspector of Police, Syed Hasan, who was standing there but was not in uniform. He was taken into the Inspector's room in the Court building which is at a short distance from the place where he was arrested. Mr Shib Nath Banerjee and the remaining five persons who were still in the Court room were arrested, later on, but after Court hours and when all the Judges had risen. Whether they were arrested in the Court room itself or just outside is a disputed question but in the view I am taking is not a material one. Juline Janvrin, Deputy Commissioner of Police Special Branch, was admittedly in charge of the police force. He was sitting by the side of the standing counsel at the time of the delivery of the judgment but left the court room with the police, when just before pronouncing the order of the Court for release I ordered the police men to go out of the Court room. He admits that he received on 2nd June 1943, instructions from his superior officer, the Commissioner of Police, to see to the maintenance of order and to arrest the detenus in case they were released by the Court.

The first rule has been obtained by Miss Mira Dutta Gupta. It is a rule on Syed Hasan, Abdul Ghafar, Edwin James Brewer and Juline Janvrin, all police men, to show cause why they should not be committed for contempt of Court. The alleged contempt of Syed Hasan, Brewer and Janvrin has relation to the arrest of Mr Niharendu Dutta Mozumdar. The substance of the contempt of Abdul Ghafar is alleged scandalisation of the Hon'ble the Chief justice.

The second rule has been obtained by Mrs Shib Nath Banerjee. The rule is in two parts: (1) Why Mr Shib Nath Banerjee should not be released and (2) Why Mr Blair the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Mr Porter, the Additional Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Juline Janvrin, Shib Chandra Chatterjee (an Inspector of Police) and Charles Luke, the Superintendent of the Presidency Jail, should not be committed for contempt of Court. This rule has relation to the arrest and detention of Mr Shib Nath Banerjee.

It is unnecessary at this stage to deal in detail with the affidavits in answer. It is sufficient to state that it has been stated therein that both Mr Niharendu Dutta Mozumdar and Mr Shib Nath Banerjee were arrested on 3rd June and are being kept in detention, as on that date warrants of commitment had been issued against them by the Government under Regn. 3 of 1818. The true copies of the warrants have been set out in the affidavit of Janvrin and the originals were produced for our inspection. The warrants purport to be by order of H.E. the Governor and are authenticated in the manner required by the rules framed under S.59 (2), Government of India Act.

So far as the matter of contempt is concerned, there are certain common questions of fact and law which I will now consider. The following points have been discussed as pure questions of law; in view of the fact that facts bearing on the said points are admitted, (1) that no person can be arrested in the Court room or within the precincts of the Court while the Court is sitting. An arrest of a person released by the order of the Court at such a place while the Court is sitting is contempt; (2) that a person released in pursuance of a writ of habeas corpus or by an order passed under S.491, Criminal P.C., cannot be arrested even outside the precincts of the Court and even on the public highway till he reaches home. If he is arrested before he reaches home, the arrest itself would be illegal.

In urging these two points the learned Advocate appearing for the petitioners contend that it would be contempt of Court, even if the arrest is under a valid warrant. The learned Advocate-General who has appeared to show cause has controverted both these propositions. He has gone further and has argued that a warrant of commitment issued under Regn. 3 of 1818 gives authority to a person to defy to our face an order for release passed under S.491, Criminal P.C. I will deal with these points first. I may at once say that I cannot accept the extreme contention of the learned Advocate-General, but at the same time I cannot accept the contentions of the learned Advocates appearing for the petitioners on the aforesaid two points in its relation to the facts of this case. I am prepared to accept the contention that a warrant of commitment under Regn. 3 of 1818 would give authority to arrest a person after he regains his liberty in pursuance of an order of release passed under S.491, Criminal P.C., but for considering the question of contempt of Court other factors, which I will indicate, later on, would have to be taken into consideration.

[Omitted: Judge discusses the case of Ameer Khan — Ed.]

. . . A detention under Regn. 3 of 1818 or detentions without trial under similar provisions of law would be purely executive acts, and for this proposition there is the weighty authority of the House of Lords, 1942 A.C. 206. I cannot accordingly accept the extreme contention of the learned Advocate-General.

For supporting the first contention Mr Ghose appearing for Miss Mira Dutta Gupta has cited before us a number of old decisions of the English Courts.

[Omitted: References to cases — Long's, Oldfield's case, Weighley's case — Ed.]

. . . As I understand the law a party to criminal proceeding enjoys no privilege for arrest or re-arrest, whenever the arrest takes place. A man who has been acquitted on a Criminal charge enjoys no such privilege. He can be arrested immediately upon another Criminal charge within the precincts of the Court after his acquittal. I am reserving my opinion as to whether he can in an emergency be arrested in the Court room itself while the Judge is sitting. But a party to a civil proceeding — and the same privilege is enjoyed by witnesses also — is privileged from arrest under a civil process on his way from his home to the Court premises, in the Court premises, and on his way back till he reaches home. A habeas corpus proceeding (and a proceeding under S.491, Criminal P.C., is of the same nature) is in essence a civil proceeding, for, it is concerned with the private right of a citizen, namely, the right of personal liberty. The true nature of a proceeding by habeas corpus, whether civil or criminal, should be determined by its object, which is not to punish, but to give relief from a civil wrong. It is the remedy which the law gives for the enforcement of the civil right of personal liberty. Spelling on Injunction and other Extra-Ordinary Remedies (vol. 2, pp. 978 and 987-8, Edn 2). The General observations in Blake's case on which Mr Ghosh has relied must be taken with facts of that case. It does not mean that an order for release made on a writ of habeas corpus implies that the person released must be allowed to reach his home. It means that he cannot be arrested on a Civil process on his way home after his release on a writ of habeas corpus, as a proceeding under that writ is in essence a civil proceeding.

This leads us to the question as to whether a warrant of commitment under Regn. 3 is a civil process. The matter has been dealt with in some detail by my Lord the Chief Justice. I agree with his reasons and conclusions. I may add that it is not a civil process for the reason that the essence of a civil process is that it is set in motion at the instance of a private person for the enforcement of his rights against another private person. For these reasons I hold that the arrest of a person under a warrant issued under Regn. 3 of 1818 in the Court room when the Court is not sitting or within the precincts of the Court even when the Court is sitting would not by itself constitute contempt. The second rule issued at the instance of Mrs Shib Nath Banerjee is concerned with the arrest of her husband in the Court room but after Court hours. The arrest was in pursuance of a warrant issued under Regn. 3 of 1818. The warrant was in existence then. In fact it was read out by the Inspector of Police to Mr Shib Nath Banerjee at the time of his arrest. On the conclusion on the points of law indicated above the act of arrest cannot amount to contempt, unless it can be established by the petitioner that the issue of such a warrant was a mere device by which the order of this Court for release was intended to be circumvented. I agree with the conclusion of my Lord the Chief Justice, to the effect that there is not sufficient evidence which would lead us to the conclusion that the issuing of the warrants of commitment under Regn. 3 was a mere device. The averment in Mrs Shib Nath Banerjee's affidavit that the warrants under that Regulation were mere contrivances is based on statements of facts based on information and belief.

A statement made on information is really hearsay and that on belief is in effect opinion. It is only in interlocutory applications that statements on information or belief are admitted in evidence, because of the special provisions of the Civil Procedure Code (O.19, R.3) 41 Cal. 173 at p. 199. The only relevant statement, which is from knowledge, is that contained in para 34 of her affidavit. It is a statement which has not been denied. The circumstances may raise a strong suspicion that the original detentions under R.26, Defence of India Rules, were intended to be continued only under another name, but as in a contempt proceeding the evidence must be clear I cannot hold that an appeal to Regn. 3 was made a device to frustrate the order of release. In this view of the matter, it is not necessary to consider the precise effect of S.59 (2), Government of India Act, but I may state that nothing has been said in the argument of the learned Advocate-General which would induce me to modify the views I have expressed in my judgment in the proceedings under S.491, Criminal P.C., made on behalf of these nine persons. I accordingly hold that there is no case against Mr Blair, Mr Porter, Shib Nath Chatterjee and Luke. On this finding also we cannot direct the release of the detinue Shib Nath Banerjee. The last paragraph of S.491, Criminal P.C., also stands in the way of granting that prayer. I therefore agree that the second rule so far as it concerns the persons named above should be discharged. Julius Janvrin also is not guilty of contempt for the acts he did or directed in connexion with arrest of Mr Shib Nath Banerjee.

I will now consider the merits of the rule issued at the instance of Miss Mira Dutta Gupta. That rule concerns the arrest of Mr Niharendu Dutta Mozumdar. He was arrested before 4 o'clock; shortly after the order of his release had been passed. There are two versions of the place where he was arrested, the manner of his arrest and what followed his arrest. The version given by Miss Mira Dutta is that as soon as Mr Dutta Mazumdar came out of the Court room into adjoining corridor accompanied by his Advocate Mr J.C. Gupta, Syed Hasan suddenly pounced upon him from behind without any word of warning and forcibly grabbed him by the folds of his upper garment. Mr Dutta Mazumdar who was taken aback said 'what do you mean'. The answer was 'I arrest you'. Mr Dutta Mazumdar then asked for the authority, but the answer from Syed Hasan was 'never mind about it'. Thereafter on the direction of Syed Hasan two sergeants caught hold of him and dragged him to the Inspector's room. Syed Hasan's version is that he did not use any force, but simply followed Mr Dutta Mozumdar when he came out of the Court room and when he was about to cross the bridge he touched his elbow. He and Mr Gupta turned round. He asked Mr Dutta Mozumdar to come to the Inspector's room. Thereupon he declined and demanded his authority; on being told that he was under arrest he went to the Inspector's room. I will deal with other parts of his affidavit in another connexion. It is quite apparent that he is trying to shift the place of arrest to a place at some distance from the exit of the Court room and attempting to establish the fact that no force was used in effecting the arrest. He admits that Mr J.C. Gupta was then accompanying Mr Dutta Mozumdar. One significant fact is that he does not say that he never uttered the words 'Never mind about it' or words to that effect. Janvrin was not admittedly at the place of the arrest but though near it, has chosen not to give his version of the matter.

Mr J.C. Gupta has filed an affidavit which corroborates substantially the statements made by Miss Mira Dutta Gupta. Her version is also supported by the affidavits filed by Mr Jyotish Chandra Maitra, by Mr Manindra Banerjee, both Barristers-at-law, Mrs Amita Dutta Mozumdar and Sakti Charan Mitter, a clerk of Mr Meyer another barrister. In this state of the evidence I decline to believe what Syed Hasan has said and must hold that: (1) the arrest took place just outside the eastern door of the Court room at about 3.45 p.m. or so, (2) that Syed Hasan suddenly pounced upon Mr Dutta Mazumdar from behind and used unnecessary force, (3) when asked about his authority to arrest, declined to furnish the information but simply said 'Never mind about it', and (4) at his direction two sergeants caught hold of Mr Dutta Mozumdar and forcibly dragged him into the Inspector's room. I will leave out for the present the part played by Abdul Gaffur, for his alleged contempt rests upon another set of facts. I will state what followed afterwards and my conclusions thereon.

According to the version of Syed Hasan and Janvrin, Mr J.C. Gupta had a talk with the latter shortly after Mr Dutta Mozumdar's arrest and before Mr Gupta went to see me in my Chamber. Mr Gupta has given a different version. I cannot rely upon the version given by Syed Hasan. He has lied, as I have already said, on an important matter. I will show later on that Janvrin's affidavit is unsatisfactory. His affidavit is evasive and it shows an attempt on his part to hide material facts. There is nothing in the affidavit of Mr J.C. Gupta which would induce me to discard any portion thereof. In fact the learned Advocate-General has not chosen to comment on any portion of the said affidavit. That respectful attitude assumed by the learned Advocate-General towards Mr Gupta cannot be attributed to the fact that Mr Gupta is also a member of the same profession, for the learned Advocate-General did not feel oppressed by any sense of delicacy when he charged (and I may observe without any justification) two other barristers Mr Josho Prakash Mitter and Mr Girija Gupta Bhaya, Advocates of position, not only with false statements, but also for manufacturing false evidence. I accordingly give preference to the version of Mr J.C. Gupta where it differs from the versions given by Syed Hasan or Janvrin. Relying on Mr Gupta's affidavit I have arrived at the following findings: (1) that shortly after the arrest of Mr Dutta Mozumdar, Mr Gupta saw me in my chambers (that was a few minutes after four o'clock according to my recollections); (2) that Mr Gupta did not meet Janvrin, nor had he any talk with him before he saw me in my chamber (3) that after returning from my chamber he spent some time in answering queries of several persons as to what the Judges had said, and in pacifying an excited crowd who had been shocked to see the rough manner in which Mr Dutta Mozumdar had been handled in the immediate precincts of the Court room, (4) that thereafter he met Janvrin, when the latter took him to the Inspector's room and for the first time showed him the file containing warrants under Regn.3 of 1818. This was just a short time before the arrest of the other six persons including Mr Shib Nath Banerjee in the Court room.

The time when Janvrin showed the warrants to Mr Gupta is important. In para 7 Janvrin states that Mr Gupta met him while Mr Dutta Mozumdar was still in the corridor. I cannot believe that statement. The opening line of para 8 is that Mr Gupta 'returned after a while', and told him that if he would show him any written order under which he was acting he would offer his other clients for arrest. Mr Gupta denies that he ever made such an offer. In the said sentence Janvrin is obviously hinting at Mr Gupta's return from my chamber. He wants to give an impression by the words used in the opening of para 8 that Mr Gupta saw the warrants under Regn.3 almost immediately after his return from my chamber. From the affidavit of Mr Gupta it appears that there was a considerable interval of time between his return from my chamber and the time when he was showed those warrants. That Mr Gupta's version on the point is true is in a way admitted by Janvrin in the last portion of para 8 of his affidavit. That portion suggests that Mr Gupta was shown those warrants just before Janvrin and Shib Nath Chatterjee went into the Court room to arrest the other six persons. Janvrin admits that these persons were then having tea. There was a huge crowd in Court on that date. At the time of the arrest of Mr Dutta Mozumdar that crowd had not dispersed. The crowd was there when Mr Dutta Mozumdar was arrested. The manner of his arrest raised excitement and resentment. The crowd saw Mr Gupta leaving the place to see the Judges and awaited his return. The six persons could not have been supplied with tea in the Court room till after a considerable interval of time had elapsed after Mr Dutta Mozumdar's arrest. These facts lead to the irresistible inference that the warrants issued under Regn.8 were shown to Mr Gupta after a considerable interval of time had elapsed after Mr Dutta Mozumdar's arrest. It would not be a speculation if that interval be taken to be an hour or so. There was thus sufficient time for the preparation and issue of those warrants after the arrest of Mr Dutta Mozumdar.

In para 3 of his affidavit, Janvrin has stated that on 2nd June 1943 he was instructed by the Commissioner of Police to arrest the detenus if they were released, in the veranda outside the Court room, and if necessary, inside the Court room but after the Judges had left. In his affidavit he gives details of the disposition of the police force placed under him on 3rd June. He had entrusted the duty of arrest to plain clothes officers of the Special Branch. Syed Hasan was one of such officers. In his affidavit Syed Hasan says that he got orders from Janvrin on 3rd June that the detenus should not be allowed to contact with the public, but should be taken to the Inspector's room on their release and only if they refused to go there they were to be arrested. The statement that they were not to be arrested in the first instance is undoubtedly false. It is against Janvrin's statement. It has been made to meet the petitioner's case as to the manner in which he made the arrest of Mr Dutta Mozumdar. One thing, however, is clear from this statement, that he was not to allow the detenu to come in contact with the public after their release. The statement cannot refer to the conditions before their release for, before their release they were not to be and actually were not in charge of the police but of the jail guards who had brought them from jail. It is admittedly the case that no warrant was shown either to Mr Dutta Mozumdar or to Mr Gupta at the time the former was arrested. Nothing was said at that time about warrants under Regn.3. When asked about his authority to arrest he gave reply, 'Never mind about it', which shows that he had not then in his possession the warrants of arrest which were issued to the Commissioner of Police on 3rd June 1943. The original warrant of arrest which concerned Mr Dutta Mozumdar was shown to us by the learned Advocate-General. It was of the same form as the copy which has been annexed as EX. A to the affidavit of Janvrin filed in the other rule. His reply also shows that he had not been told by Janvrin about the existence of such a warrant. It is unthinkable that the warrant, if it had been issued then, would not have been handed over by Janvrin, to the persons to whom he had entrusted the duty to arrest or that the man would not be told beforehand the nature of authority by which he was being empowered to arrest. The petitioner has made the definite case that the warrants under Regn. 3 were not in existence at the time of Mr Dutta Mozumdar's arrest. Janvrin could have definitely refuted that case by making a clear and unambiguous statement about time of the day when he got those warrants. Instead of making a clear statement he makes a vague statement in para 5 of his affidavit that he got those warrants on 3rd June 1943. Certainly he had them on 3rd June, just before the arrest of Mr Shib Nath Banerjee and the other five, for they were shown to Mr J.C. Gupta, about that time, but the question is whether he had them in his possession before that time. This evasive statement confirms what I infer from the other circumstances, which I have detailed above, that the warrants under Regn.3 of 1818 against Mr Dutta Mozumdar and others had not been issued at the time of Mr Dutta Mozumdar's arrest. He was arrested simply because the Commissioner of Police had on 2nd June instructed Janvrin to arrest all the detenues immediately on their release. The arrest of Mr Dutta Mozumdar accordingly constitutes contempt as there was no legal warrant for his arrest at the time and those concerned with his arrest are liable to commitment. It is no answer to the charge of contempt that the police officer who directed the arrest or who actually arrested him had to act on the orders of the superior officers. That fact can be taken into consideration only for determining the punishment to be meted. I have already found that Mr Dutta Mozumdar was arrested immediately after he stepped out of the Court room at a place very near the eastern door of the Court room. He was arrested a few minutes after we rose. Just before the order of release was passed, because the policemen present in the Court room showed such a degree of alertness which indicated that they would close up on the detenu immediately after the order of release, I directed the policemen present in the Court room to move outside. That order was obeyed. The obedience to that order cannot lead to the only inference that all the policemen had, irrespective of their instructions, the genuine desire to obey all lawful orders of the Court. They had to move out, for otherwise they would have been guilty of contempt in the face of the Court and there would have been no scope of inventing explanations. The description of the proceedings in Court as tamasha by Janvrin, a statement which has not been denied by him, showed which way the wind was blowing. To say the least it is the height of impudence on his part to describe proceedings of this Court in that manner and that itself constitutes contempt. I cannot gather words strong enough to express my disapproval of his conduct. After the policemen went out of the Court room accompanied by Janvrin they lined up at the corridor and close to the exits from the Court room. This has been stated in para 18 of the petition of Miss Mira Dutta Gupta and has not been denied. Syed Hasan admits that Janvrin's instructions were that the detenus on their release were not to come in contact with the public. I accordingly hold that so far as Mr Dutta Mozumdar is concerned he was not freed from constraint. So far as the other six persons are concerned they enjoyed liberty for a short time but there was only a parody of liberty in the case of Mr Dutta Mozumdar. Even if the warrant for his arrest had been issued at the time he was arrested, the Court's order cannot be said to have been obeyed.

In the connected rule I have given my reason for repelling the extreme contention of the learned Advocate-General that it would have not been contempt even if on the pronouncement of the order of release the policemen were to fling the warrants issued under Regn. 3 of 1818 at our face and say that they would not carry out the order of release. What has been done in the case of Mr Dutta Mazumdar virtually amounts to flouting the order of release, though not exactly in that dramatic fashion. There cannot be any doubt in my mind that the acting was such as would convey to the mind of the public that the power of the police is supreme. The remark of Syed Hassan to the effect 'never mind about it' would only confirm that belief. It would convey the idea 'never mind the High Court's order, I arrest you and would not deign to give you the authority under which I am arresting you, for do you not know that I am a police officer'. There cannot be any doubt that the manner in which Mr Dutta Mazumdar was arrested would calculate to affect the dignity of the Court. While I am of opinion that Judges should not be over-sensitive of their personal dignity, they must always be jealous of the dignity of the Court and nothing savouring of contempt must be allowed to pass unnoticed, uncensured or unpunished. This leads me to consider the question raised by the Advocate-General as to whether an act calculated to affect the dignity of the Court is contempt. He has given a bold answer in the negative. He has admitted that words spoken or acts done which are calculated to affect the authority of the Court is contempt, but says that authority does not mean or include dignity. For that purpose he has referred us to the following passage of Wilmot C.J.'s undelivered judgment in (1765) Wilmot 243: 97 E.R. 94 as quoted at pp. 240 and 241 of 63 Cal. 217.

[Omitted: The Judges exposition of passages in the judgement of Wilmot C.J. — Ed.]

I now come to the case of Abdul Ghafur. In her affidavit in support of her petition Miss Mira Dutta Gupta stated that that officer had given out that the arrest was made in the Court precincts with the permission of the Hon'ble the Chief Justice. That petition was moved in Court on 8th June 1943, when a rule was issued. A statement has been made from the Bar that at that time the Court asked the Advocate appearing for her to put in as many affidavits as could be had to corroborate her statement on that point. In pursuance of that request, two Barristers-at-law, Mr Girija Gupta Bhaya and Mr J.P. Mitter swore affidavits on 10th June following. In those affidavits they say that as soon as they came out of the Court room they met Abdul Gaffur, whom they know from before, in the corridor just outside the Court room. On their enquiry, Abdul Ghafur told them that the arrest was made there as the police had the permission of the Hon'ble the Chief Justice. They met Mr N.K. Basu, Advocate on their way to the Bar Library and told him what Abdul Ghafur had said and later on communicated the matter to their barrister friends in the Bar Library including the Advocate-General and the Standing Counsel. Abdul Ghafur in his affidavit denies having made that statement. He admits meeting the said two gentlemen, but says that the meeting place was not in the corridor, but in the passage leading to the Inspector's room which is behind the staircase. It seems to me that the last mentioned statement is false. The place of meeting would naturally be in the passage leading to the Court room where the two gentlemen had come out after listening to the judgments of the Court.

After Mr Ghosh had placed the affidavits he tendered all the persons who had sworn affidavits in support of his client's case for cross-examination. The learned Advocate-General did not, however, choose to cross-examine any one of them. In the course of his argument he, however, contended that the statements made by those two gentlemen were false and Abdul Ghafur's version was correct. He even went to the length of suggesting that those two gentlemen were conscious of the fact that their statements were so improbable that no Court would believe them, so they introduced the name of Mr N.K. Basu, of the Standing Counsel and of himself. He however did not deny the fact as to whether Mr J.P. Mitter had spoken of the incident to him immediately after. On that point he was silent. These gentlemen filed affidavits by reason of the General request from the Court. I do not wish to discuss the matter further. All I say is that I believe these two gentlemen and that the attack on their credit was neither merited nor justified. The statement made by Abdul Ghafur to those gentlemen constitutes contempt of the same type as was considered in 63 Cal. 217 where this Court on its own motion took notice of the contempt and meted out punishment. That statement made by Abdul Ghafur is false. Even if no permission of the Honourable the Chief Justice for arresting in the precincts of the Court was necessary, the implication of the statement, which clearly suggests if I may use the expression used in 63 Cal. 217, 'hobnobbing with the executive' is not taken away. It constitutes contempt. As my learned colleagues are of different opinion regarding Janvrin, Syed Hassan and Abdul Ghafur, it is unnecessary for me to consider the question of punishment, but I cannot help observing that the attitude maintained by them does not seem to me to be proper. They are public servants whose duties require them to be in the service of law. No regret was expressed by them either in their affidavits nor by the Advocates appearing for them, even on behalf of Syed Hasan after all of us had expressed our views in the course of the argument that he had acted in an unseemly way in arresting Mr Dutta Mozumdar and had used force when no force was necessary.

Khundkar J. – As regards Miscellaneous case No. 54, which arises out of the rule obtained by Mrs Shibnath Banerjee, I agree with my Lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Mitter J. that this rule should be discharged, and as I concur in the reasons for so holding which are contained in the judgments just delivered, it is unnecessary for me to add anything to what has been stated therein regarding this rule.

[Omitted: Judge gives some reasons on points where he differed from Justice Mitter -- Ed.]

In my judgment, the arrest of Mr Dutta Majumdar very soon after an order for his release was made by the Court, cannot in itself amount to contempt. It was however insisted that the precipitancy of the arrest, and its execution in the corridor of the arrest, constituted a flaunting by the arresting officers of their commission in the sight of the Court. This, it is contended, was a flagrant affront deliberately offered to the dignity of the Court. Here I think there may be some danger of a confusion of thought. An arrest carried out in obedience to lawful command, in a place covered by that command is one thing. It must not be forgotten that an arrest in pursuance of a warrant of commitment under Regn.3 may be effected anywhere. A gratuitous insult to the Court is another thing. An act in itself lawful can be carried out in a manner which is offensive. But where the act does not in itself constitute contempt, we must be careful to distinguish the act from circumstances connected with the manner of its performance which are not necessary to the act but are adventitious or extrinsic to it. What is really reprobated in the argument here is the incidence or bearing of time and place on the arrest, and not the arrest itself. It is necessary therefore to refer again to what actually took place. The police had left the Court room under the eyes of Judges and in obedience to their orders. The Court had risen for the day and the Judges had retired. Mr Dutta Majumder had gone out of the Court room, and was walking along the corridor outside. It was then that he was arrested. It cannot be denied that the purpose of the arrest was to carry out a duty laid by lawful command on the arresting officer, and therefore it calls for some exercise of imagination to visualize such an arrest, in the circumstances just mentioned, as a flaunting of the arresting officers authority in sight of the Court. I do not think there is any authority for holding that the principles of contempt would extend so far. In (1843) 12 L.J.Q.B. 49 it appears from the report at p. 52 that the events surrounding the Captain's arrest bore a striking similarity to what occurred here:

Kelly. – 'Captain Douglas cannot be detained in the manner. He has been discharged by the Court.'

Per Curiam. – 'The judgment of the Court must have some effect. Capt. Douglas is free to go where he pleases.'

Capt. Douglas then left the Court. Immediately after he had left the Court, he was arrested upon a capias issuing out of the office of the Sheriff of Middlesex.

In the present case the Court said the police were to 'clear off'. The police did clear out, the Court adjourned, and Mr Dutta Majumder was arrested outside the Court shortly afterwards. The rule that arrest in the Court precincts constitutes contempt rests on another foundation disturbance or interruption of the Court's proceedings. The principle of the cases in which it arose is indicated in the judgments of my Lord the Chief Justice and my learned brother Mitter J. and I need say nothing further regarding that aspect of the case. But of one thing I am quite satisfied here, that it cannot in any fairness be said that the place of the arrest or the time of the arrest were deliberately selected only to insult the Court. The sufficient answer to this would be that the Court was not there. Quite distinct from this question of insult, however is the second point above indicated, viz., that the manner in which Inspector Hasan acted when arresting Mr Dutta Majumdar was calculated to lower the authority of the Court.

Before I go further, I would like to say something about this officer's behaviour towards Mr Dutta Majumdar. The Inspector has denied the allegations of rudeness and aggression made against him, but formidably arrayed against his denial are an imposing number of affidavits to which we may freely refer. The Court has to decide this question of fact on the preponderance of the materials before it. It is the word of one against the word of many, and no one was cross-examined. There seems to be little room for doubt that the Inspector laid hands on Mr Dutta Majumdar, and when asked by the latter the meaning of the affront, answered rudely 'never you mind' or words to that effect. There was no justification for such conduct. Mr Dutta Majumdar was not an escaping criminal. He is a gentleman of education and social position, member of the Bar, a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Province, who finds himself under constraint on account of his political views and activities. To treat him as Inspector Hasan did was unwarrantable. But apart from the courtesy due to Mr Dutta Majumdar's station in life, the conduct of the Inspector merits the disapproval of the Court for a reason that is broader based. It has often been justly remarked that the police in this country are prone to forget that they are the servants of the state and not its autocrats. Acts of churlishness and truculence on the part of individual police officers towards members of the public are unfortunately not of infrequent occurrence, and they do not enhance the reputation of the police as guardians of law and order. Such conduct calls for an expression of the Court's severest displeasure whenever it is brought to its notice. This however is a different thing from saying that the affronts offered to Mr Dutta Majumder by the Inspector constituted a contempt of Court on his part as well as on that of his superior officer, Mr Janvrin. The proposition that the boorish treatment bestowed upon Mr Dutta Majumder was contumacious of the Court rests upon the assertion that its arrogant character had the tendency of lowering the dignity of the Court in the public estimation. The haste with which the arrest was effected and the place where it was carried out were referred to in this connexion, but those are matters with which I have already dealt.

The point I have to consider here is whether, assuming there was some degree of physical violence in the arrest, that circumstance, coupled with the brusque words 'never you mind' with which Mr Dutta Majumder's demand for an explanation was summarily dismissed, would be injurious to the dignity and therefore the authority of the Court. The learned Advocate-General has, in reply to this argument, contended that the impression which an act may create in the public mind is not the test of contumacy. The real test is the reason for the act. The reason here was the order for the arrest. This involves the doctrine that mere impressions in the public mind are too transitory and variable to afford a standard for judging contempt of Court and appearances are often misleading when one is searching for the underlying substance of a justifiable issue. On the face of it this view is plausible. But I think one must, in the first instance, look for what is meant by the expression 'lowering the dignity of the Court'. The Court's dignity is a precious and delicate thing, and a disturbance of its balance may have far-reaching consequences to the administration of justice. Public confidence in the ability of the Court to administer justice must be maintained, and the public estimation of the Court's authority, power and dignity though not the only factor in securing that confidence, is an important one nevertheless. In Oswald's book on Contempt of Court it is stated that contempt 'in the legal acceptance of the term, primarily signifies disrespect to that which is entitled to legal regard'. 'Insolence to the Judge by insulting words or conduct', says this author, constitutes contempt. In Halsbury's Laws of England vol. 7 the matter is presented thus.

It is not from any exaggerated notion of the dignity of individuals that insults to judges are not allowed, but because there is imposed upon the Court the duty of preventing brevi manu any attempt to interfere with the administration of justice.

In Viner's Abridgment, title Contempt A, referred to in (1838) 132 E.R. 910 contempt is described as 'a disobedience to the Court or an opposing or a despising the authority, justice or dignity thereof. It commonly consists in a party's doing otherwise than he is enjoined to do, or not doing what he is commanded or required, by the process, order, or decree of the Court'.

In (1846) 10 Ir. Eq. Rep. 93 one class of cases in which Courts of Equity exercised the authority of committing for contempt was thus described:

When the Court which issues the attachment has awarded some process, given some judgment, made some legal order or done some act which the party against whom it issues, or others on whom it is binding, have either neglected to obey, contumaciously refused to submit to, incited others to defeat by artifice or force, or treated with terms of contumely or disrespect in the face of the Court, or of its minister charged with the execution of its acts.

(1765) 97 E.R. 94, to which reference has been made by my learned brother Mitter J. was a case of libel upon the Court of King's Bench Division by publication of a pamphlet which attacked that Court and the Chief Justice, Lord Mansfield, and charged them with having introduced a method of proceeding to deprive the subject of the benefit of habeas corpus. Wilmot J. drew up an opinion on the case, which was never delivered in court, because the proceedings were dropped. The opinion was published after his death, and it has been frequently referred to with approval and respect. It was not followed by Fletcher J. in (1818) MOO. P.C. 36n 13 E.R. 15n who expressed his view of it in a passage quoted by Mukherjee J. in 63 Cal. 217 at p. 242.

The hasty and warm ebullition of a mind fraught with arbitrary notions, irritated and excited by a severe attack upon the whole Court, especially upon his venerated and adored Chief Justice, and the very reverse of what is called a considered, digested and ulterior opinion.

Although I have reproduced the quotation, I do not think it is of any particular importance in the present case, because as already just indicated, Almon's case was concerned with a libel on the Courts, and not with any other act which tended to undermine its authority. I have no doubt that, if the police had refused to obey the order to leave the Court room, that would have been contempt. I have no doubt that if the arrest of Mr Datta Mazumdar had been carried out when, and where it was, without lawful authority and the Court just having ordered his release, that also would have been contempt. But I cannot gather from any decision which has been brought to my notice that the affronts put upon Mr Dutta Mazumdar, should in the circumstances of this case, be regarded as an insult to the Court, or that it undermined the authority of the Court, by lowering the dignity of the Court in the public estimation. The last mentioned conclusion can be distilled from judicial decisions only by the discursive application of General words which enshrine the principle, that acts which are subversive of the Court's authority or which otherwise display a tendency to undermine public confidence in the administration of justice, amount to contempt.

I come now to the third point argued in the case against Mr Janvrin and Inspector Hasan, which was that no warrant of commitment under Regn. 3 was in existence when Mr Dutta Mazumdar was arrested. The onus of shewing this is on the petitioner. These warrants are dated 3rd June 1943, the day of the arrest. In para 3 of his affidavit Mr Janvrin speaks of the orders he received from the Commissioner of Police on 2nd June and in that paragraph he says that he was instructed to effect the arrest of the security prisoners if they were released. It is pointed out that the warrant for his arrest was not shown to Mr Dutta Mazumdar when he was arrested. The fact that Inspector Hasan said nothing about a warrant is referred to. The events which took place between the arrest and the production of the warrants for Mr J.C. Gupta's inspection are dwelt on. Arguing the inference from all these circumstances the conclusion is sought to be reached that the warrants under Regn. 3 were brought into existence after Mr Dutta Mazumdar had been arrested. My learned brother Mitter J., has been persuaded to accept this conclusion. After giving the matter anxious consideration, I find myself, with the greatest deference to my learned brother, unable to agree. These warrants, seven in number, were drawn up and signed in the Secretariat Buildings. If they were not in existence when Mr Dutta Mazumdar was arrested it is unlikely in the extreme that Mr Janvrin would have been in possession of them when Mr Gupta spoke to him. Pondering Mr J.C. Gupta's affidavit with the utmost care I cannot see how, as suggested, an hour must have elapsed between the time when Mr Dutta Mazumdar was arrested and the moment when the file containing the warrants was shewn to Mr Gupta. Mr Gupta went to my learned brother Mitter J.'s chamber when Mr Dutta Mazumder was arrested. The chamber is not far away. He returned from there almost immediately. He spoke to some persons and then met Mr Janvrin and was shewn the warrants. The argument advanced necessarily involves the assertion that the warrants were prepared in the Secretariat Offices and delivered to Mr Janvrin in less time than it took for the events just indicated to happen. Official business takes time to transact. Its routine is elaborate and its march unhurried. The warrants, seven in number, would require to be drawn up or at least filled in. They would have had to be signed; their reference numbers or other marks would have had to be entered in some register; they would have had to be placed in a cover, and handed to a messenger who would require to be instructed as to the person to whom they were to be delivered and the place at which he would be found. The messenger would have had to cover the distance which separates the Secretariat Buildings from the High Court. Arrived here he would have had to find Mr Janvrin in a crowd of people who were standing about in the corridors between the Sessions Court room and the Inspector's room. The warrants, it is asserted, were not in existence when Mr Dutta Mazumder was arrested, yet when Mr J.C. Gupta came to Mr Janvrin the latter produced them from a file with what would look like the dexterity of a conjurer producing rabbits from a hat. It is an argument I am unable to accept. The case against Assistant Commissioner Khan Saheb Abdul Gaffur remains to be considered. The affidavit of Mr Girija Gupta Bhaya contains this statement:

I came out of the Court room accompanied by Mr J.P. Mitter, Barrister-at-law and met Mr Ghafur, Assistant Commissioner whom we both knew. In the corridor just outside the Court room I enquired from Mr Ghafur how Dutta Mazumder could be arrested in the Court precincts whereupon the said Mr Ghafur said that the Police had the permission of the Chief Justice. Mr Mitter was with me when the said Mr Ghafur said so.

Thereupon Mr Mitter and I returned to the Bar Library and on the way near the Advocates' Library we met Mr N.K. Basu Advocate and Mr Mitter said to Mr Basu, 'Have you heard that the Chief Justice has permitted arrest of these men in the Court. Can he do that?' Mr Basu smiled and said 'I reserve my judgment'

After I came back to the Bar Library, I spoke to the Standing Counsel amongst other friends about what I had been told by Mr Ghafur.

The affidavit of Mr Josho Prokash Mitter contains the following statement:

I came out of the Court room with Mr Gupta and met in the corridor Mr Ghafur, Assistant Commissioner of Police, whom both of us knew. Mr Gupta enquired from him how it was that Dutta Mazumder had been arrested in the Court precincts, whereupon Mr Ghafur informed Mr Gupta that the Police had the permission of the Chief Justice. I returned to the Bar Library club accompanied by Mr Gupta. On the way I met Mr N.K. Basu and asked him if he had heard that the Chief Justice had permitted the arrest of these persons in the Court precincts and whether the learned Chief Justice could do so. Mr Basu returning to the Bar Library Club I spoke about it to Mr S.M. Bose, Advocate-General.

Now, if the statement imputed to Khan Saheb Abdul Gafur that the Chief Justice had accorded permission for the arrest of Mr Dutta Mazumder is contempt by reason of its being a slander of the Chief Justice, then as the learned Advocate-General remarked, the repetition of this statement would amount to a publication of the slander. But in my opinion, good sense requires that the matter should not be looked at in vacuo. Excitement was probably running high, and what it would be unpardonable to repeat under normal circumstances, might very well be overlooked when uttered in a mood of excitability at a time when public curiosity was in a ferment. I think we may safely acquit these gentlemen of any intention to defame the Chief Justice. But if a technical publication of slander may be condoned in the cases of two barristers learned in the law, I cannot see how we can for that slander punish a police officer who must be less acquainted with the lore of defamation and contempt. After all did this officer intend to be disrespectful? This is not the case of one who says in words that have been measured and weighed and deliberately selected that the Chief Justice has become a creature of the executive. These were the words of an excited person who had no time to consider the legal implications of an answer he was making to the question of another excited person. Surely the Court is not expected to visit with punishment every unguarded impromptu utterance which may possibly contain an innuendo which is defamatory of the Court or of a Judge. I say 'possibly' for can we be sure, in all the circumstances, that the statement 'that the police had the permission of the Chief Justice' carried the implication that the Chief Justice was subservient to the executive? I do not find it difficult to think of more than one construction quite innocuous which these words might bear. The Khan Saheb, who had nothing to do with the arrests, might very well have heard that the permission of the Chief Justice had been obtained for the unusual policing precautions taken in the High Court building on that day. He would have known at the same time that the Deputy Commissioner in charge of the police party had authority to arrest the security prisoners. Slipshod association of ideas and carelessly chosen words might have led him to say something which gave Mr Gupta Bhaya and Mr Mitter the impression which they seem to have received. Thus I think is quite probable and I am therefore not prepared to say that the statement attributed to this officer was within the mischief of a contempt which consists of a slander on the Court or on a Judge.

In 63 Cal. 217 Mukerji J. gave careful consideration to the alternative meanings of the word 'hobnobbing' before accepting the view that 'hobnobbing with the executive', meant 'mixing freely in a cringing spirit with a view to curry favour' with the executive. Reading that case as a whole, there can be little doubt that the Court unanimously found that the article complained of was a calculated and deliberate contempt, and as the Chief Justice said, 'capable of great public mischief'. That case bears little parallel to the case alleged here either as regards the intention of the delinquent, or, the consequences to the administration of justice of the words which were employed. The basic principles of libel have been set out in many well known text books on that subject but few surpass in clarity and simplicity of expression the now ancient work entitled 'The Law of Libel' by Holt. I would like to quote the passage with which the author concluded his Chapter in Libels against Courts of Justice:

It is necessary as we have shewn, that Courts of Justice should have power to punish for contempts, but it is a power which has its justification in necessity alone, and should rarely be exercised, and never but in those cases where the necessity is plain.

In Miscellaneous case No. 58 the complaint against Sergeant Brewer was not developed, and I do not think it necessary therefore to say anything about it. As already stated at the beginning of my judgment, I am of the opinion, that both rules should be discharged.

By the Court. - These rules are discharged.

Rules Discharged.

48. Official Notings reg. interrogation (15.7.1943-17.7.1943) (extracts)

File No. 44/2/43 - Home Poll (I)

A Summary of the replies so far received to our letter of 25-5-43¹ is put up.

2. It will be seen that in most provinces there are no special interrogation centres and that interrogation is conducted by officers of the special Branch. (Coorg and Baluchistan may be omitted from consideration at present.) Apart from the Punjab, Madras, Bombay & U.P. are alive to the need for interrogation. The U.P. consider their present arrangements, viz., interrogation by officers of the S.B., or Hqrs staff of the C.I.D. quite satisfactory. Madras consider their arrangement satisfactory for ordinary purposes, but not for the interrogation of leaders of all-India importance. The question of establishing an interrogation centre is under consideration. Bombay are satisfied with the arrangements in Bombay City. Though they had to send 2 fifth-Columnists to the C.S., D.I.C., recently. Our suggestions will be borne in mind by them when considering the proposed reorganization of the C.I.D. We should perhaps ask to be informed of the decisions on (1) the question of an interrogation centre in Madras (2) the reorganization of the Bombay C.I.D.

3. The Bihar, C.P. and Assam replies are hardly satisfactory. Bihar do not say who conducts the interrogation at present (cf. J.S.'s pencil remarks on S.No. 13). Bihar had the worst of the Congress Disturbances and Jai Prakash Narain & his C.S.P. group belong to that province. The importance of adequate arrangements for interrogation of suspects there need hardly be stressed. We should perhaps ask for more information which would justify their present attitude. If pressed, they might of course plead paucity of suitable officers as a difficulty.

4. As regards C.P., we may agree that the qn. of detention in police custody might be taken up when the need arises but there should be no harm in providing for police custody as an alternative to jail custody in advance against real emergency. They add that specially selected and trained interrogation staff would not be available. This was exactly the reason why we suggested that steps should be taken to provide such staffs. As regards the last sentence of the C.P. letter, the main point of our letter was that interrogation by special staff should be undertaken in respect of the more important persons. We may perhaps explain the position to the P.G.² and suggest that the question of providing special staff should be further pursued.

5. Assam also plead lack of officers as one of the reasons why special staff are not necessary. Lack of officers may be a practical difficulty but can hardly affect the question of necessity for the staff. Assam might perhaps be encouraged to increase their C.I.D. strength so as to include a proposition of officers for such special duties. Assam do not refer to the custody in which suspects are kept while being interrogated. We should perhaps ask for information on this point.

6. The Punjab suggestion regarding the duration of detention for interrogation should perhaps be put to P.G.'s in any further communication to them.

Bengal reply is important and must be awaited.

Bengal, N.W.F.P. and Delhi replies have been added to the file. A reminder to the remaining provinces is also put up.

2. The summary has been brought up to date. Bengal have not found any necessity for special interrogation centres; nor have they had any difficulty in the matter of providing trained staff for the interrogation from the Provincial C.I.D. They do not propose to adopt our suggestions. The N.W.F.P. reply shows that certain C.I.D. officers function practically as a special staff for interrogation though there are no special interrogation centre. In Delhi the Red Fort apparently forms a special centres though there is no special staff.

49 Official Notings reg. interrogation of prisoners (continuation of Doc. 48) — (dt 19.7.43–24.7.43) (extracts)

File No. 44/2/43 – Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

The summary of replies received from Provincial Government may be seen. Though incomplete, important replies are now on the file.

2. We need not concern ourselves here with the question of the conditions of custody of security prisoners under Defence Rule 129. This has been dealt with in detail in another reference to Provinces, the replies to which are still coming in and will be submitted separately when complete. The question at issue on this file is the interrogation of prisoners under rule 129 and the efficiency of Provincial arrangement in this respect. It will be seen that all Provinces claim to be more or less alive to the necessity for thorough interrogation in such cases. The extent to which specialized arrangements have been made for interrogation varies very greatly, however, from the Punjab where special accommodation in Lahore is provided and where interrogation has long been one of the principal police methods of gaining information, through U.P., Bengal, Bombay City and to a lesser extent Madras, where interrogation is largely undertaken by the existing Special Branch staff, to Bihar C.P. and Assam where one may legitimately infer that little if anything is done at all in the way of interrogating these prisoners.

3. Our letter will, I think we may legitimately hope, have roused Provinces to some more adequate idea of the importance of these interrogations. Further practical steps to raise Provincial efficiency depend almost entirely on staff and I suggest this is now a matter for Police section to pursue with the different Provinces concerned. D.I.B. may see.

I am not sure that we did not make a mistake in confining our letter to 'persons detained under D.R. 129'. It may be equally important to have arrangements for the interrogation of persons detained under D.R. 26 – but there we are up against this difficulty that the Security Prisoners Rules contemplate detention in a jail.

If D.I.B. has any immediate remarks to make on the Provincial Replies we should be glad to have them as soon as possible, since H.M. will no doubt wish to see this file before the end of the week.

I have been through the replies received to Home Department's Express Letter of May 25th addressed to all Provinces, and confess to a good deal of disappointment with most of them. With few exceptions, none of the Provinces seems to recognise that, although the subject of H.D.'s letter was linked with Rule 129, D.I.R., good interrogation is one of the main pillars of detection in all circumstances, and that, whether in an emergency of the present kind or under more normal condition, it will be to the advantage of provinces to have at their disposal an expert interrogation staff working on scientific lines as the instrument for bringing to light the true facts about crime of all sorts and so providing an additional means to prevention of similar occurrences in the future. Perhaps it is that provinces have shied off the idea conveyed by the word 'centre' and prefer to carry on in their more or less haphazard methods for interrogation when and where necessary. The emphasis might I think, have been on the word 'staff' although experience has shown that there are certain psychological advantages attending to the existence of place known to be set apart for interrogation purposes.

2 There are the making of good interrogation organisations in several provinces, but to my mind the only province which has shown really first class results from interrogation on a systematic basis and with entire disregard to the matter of time taken, is the Punjab. Compared with the Punjab, the rest are nowhere. We cannot very well tell provinces this, and I am uncertain whether there would be any advantage in returning to the charge to insist on Provinces taking the matter more seriously. I propose to discuss the subject thoroughly in the course of my forthcoming tours and will endeavour to bring home to the authorities concerned what they stand to gain by having a scientific set-up for this work. If the delay consequent on giving effect to this proposal is considered undesirable, I will discuss an alternative with Additional Secretary.

(I would be glad to have H.D.'s file back as soon as it can be made available in order to take copies of the replies from Provinces).

Advocate-General and Assist. Government Advocate — for the Crown.

Brough J. — These applications have been made by a number of persons sentenced under the powers purported to have been conferred by Ordinance 2 of 1942 (Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 1942) who contend that notwithstanding Ordinance 19 of 1943 (Special Criminal Courts Repeal Ordinance, 1943) their detention is illegal and under S.491, Criminal P.C., seek an order of this Court that they be set at liberty or brought to trial according to law. Ordinance 2 was promulgated on 2nd January 1942 by the Governor-General under S.72 of Sch. 9 to the Government of India Act, 1935. The Ordinance, originally limited by S.72 above to a period of six months, was extended by the India and Burma (Emergency Provisions) Act of 1940 and an Order in Council made thereunder and remained in force until repealed as hereinafter mentioned. The Ordinance was not complete in itself, it came into force (S.1 (3)) in any Province only on notification by the Provincial Government; that notification could be given originally only on the existence of an emergency arising from a hostile attack on India but by ordinance 42 of 1942 promulgated on 19th August 1942 the power was extended to cover an emergency arising from any disorder in the Province. The Provincial Government brought the Ordinance into force in this Province by Notification No. 90CC dated 21st August 1942. Even that notification was not enough to set the Special Courts to work trying cases, as the Ordinance also left it (Ss.5, 10 and 16) to the Provincial Government or a servant of the Crown empowered by the Provincial Government in that behalf to direct what cases or classes of cases the several Courts should have jurisdiction to try. Under these sections various orders have been made directing the trial of cases by the several Special Courts set up by the Ordinance. It is by these Courts and under these orders that the various applicants have been tried.

The validity of the Ordinance was soon after it came into force challenged in this and other High Courts. There is no need to discuss the cases in detail. This Court decided in 22 Pat. 175 that the Ordinance was not invalid and similar decisions were given by the Courts of Bombay and Asslhabad. On 21st April 1943, however, the validity of the Ordinance having been challenged before it on grounds not taken before any other Court a Special Bench of the Calcutta High Court declared the Ordinance to be ineffective to confer jurisdiction on the Special Courts: A.I.R. 1943 Cal. 285. That decision was carried on appeal to the Federal Court in A.I.R. 1943 F.C. 36 which on 4th June 1943 dismissed the appeal. The effect of that decision was that all the trials which had been held throughout India under the powers thought to have been conferred by Ordinance 2 were found to have been without jurisdiction. Consequently on the next day 5th June 1943 the Government of India Published Ordinance 19 of 1943. The question for determination in these cases is simply what, if any is the legal effect of Ordinance 19. On 12th July 1943 while this case was being argued the Calcutta High Court gave a decision on a similar point but no report of the judgement except those in the daily press was available up to the time the argument was concluded and the Court did not think it necessary or desirable to postpone the decision in these cases on that account. Ordinance 19 begins with the following preamble:

Whereas an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary to repeal the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance 1942 and to provide for certain matters in connexion with such repeal and then follow five enacting sections purporting to be made and promulgated by the Governor-General under S72 of Sch. 9, Government of India Act, 1935. Section 1 brings the Ordinance into effect at once: Section 2 repeals Ordinance 2 of 1942: Section 3 deals with cases the trial of which under Ordinance 2 had been concluded: Section 4 declared all pending proceedings under Ordinance 2 to be void and transferred them to the appropriate Magistrate for disposal according to the ordinary law: Section 5 granted an indemnity to servants of the Crown for acts done under powers purported to have been conferred by Ordinance 2. It is S.3 which is material for the present cases and it reads as follows:

3. Confirmation and continuance, subject to appeal, of sentences. - (1) Any sentence passed by a Special Judge, a Special Magistrate or a Summary Court in exercise of jurisdiction conferred or purporting to have been conferred by or under the said Ordinance shall have effect, and subject to the succeeding provisions of this sections, shall continue to have effect, as if the trial at which it was passed had been held in accordance with the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 (5 of 1898), by a Sessions Judge, an Assistant Sessions Judge or a Magistrate of the First Class respectively, exercising competent jurisdiction under the said Code. (2) Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law, any such sentence as is referred to in sub-section. (1) shall, whether or not the proceedings in which the sentence was passed were submitted for review under S.8, and whether or not the sentence was the subject of an appeal under S.13 or S.19 of the said Ordinance, be subject to such rights of appeal as would have accrued, and to such powers of revision as would have been exercisable under the said Code if the sentence had at a trial so held been passed on the date of the commencement of this Ordinance. (3) Where any such sentence as aforesaid has been altered in the course of review or on appeal under the said Ordinance, the sentence as so altered shall for the purposes of this section be deemed to have been passed by the Court which passed the original sentence.

As the decision of the Federal Court in A.I.R. 1943 F.C. 36 was the effective cause of the promulgation of ordinance 19, so it will also be the most important factor in determining its validity. It will, therefore, be convenient at the outset to see what the Federal Court did and did not decide. It did not decide that the whole Ordinance was beyond the legislative powers of the Governor-General under S.72 although the majority of the Court (Varadachariar C.J. and Zafrullah Khan J.) stated that the arguments on this point raised substantial and important questions. There being no decision of the Federal Court on this point it is so far as this Court is concerned concluded by the decision of the Special Bench in A.I.R., 1943 Cal. 285. What the Federal Court decided as I understand the judgment of Varadachariar C.J. who delivered the judgment of the majority (Rowland J. dissented)¹ was that it was only the executive orders made under Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance that outside the jurisdiction of the High Court and abrogated the operation of the Criminal procedure Code (particularly Ss.5, 28 and 29) and that such executive orders could not have such effect in law and that therefore Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance were beyond the legislative powers of the Governor-General with the result that all trials purported to have been held under the Ordinance had been without jurisdiction. That judgment created a situation in which some action by the legislative authority was essential. Ordinance 19 makes provision for the trial of all future cases (including pending cases) under the ordinary law and for indemnity to Government servants for past acts; the propriety of these provisions has not been questioned. The Advocate-General further contended that it had obviated the necessity of a retrial of every case the trial of which had already been concluded, while meeting the objections which had been raised in the course of the argument before the Federal Court owing to the deprivation of the right of appeal. It is argued however on behalf of the petitioners that the Ordinance has not succeeded in achieving this object for reasons which fall into three main classes; it is said first that legislation of this type is ultra vires, secondly that this particular legislation is ultra vires and thirdly that as a matter of construction this Ordinance is ineffective.

It will be convenient to deal with the last and narrowest point first. For this purpose it is to be assumed that the Ordinance is not open to objection on the ground that it or any material part of it is beyond the Legislative powers of the Governor-General. It appears that my view on this point differs from that which I understand found favour with the majority of the Calcutta High Court. I therefore express the opinion I have decidedly formed with some diffidence, although I derive some comfort in that on this point. I am, I think, in agreement with Sen J. I find S.3 perfectly clear and but for the arguments which have been addressed to us and the decision of the Calcutta High Court I would have contented myself with saying that it means what it says. I will however try to elaborate though not I think to improve the language of the section: 'The sentence of a Special Court notwithstanding that it had no jurisdiction to pronounce it, shall have the same effect as an equivalent sentence passed by a competent Court at a trial held strictly in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code and shall continue to have such effect subject to the proviso that the sentence may be considered and affirmed, reduced, set aside or enhanced, on appeal or in revision by the same Court and, on the same grounds, as if it had been passed by a competent Court at a trial held in strict accordance with the Criminal Procedure Code.'

It is said that to give legal effect to the sentence alone without dealing with the trial and conviction is ineffective. As between the Crown and the prisoner it is the sentence and the sentence only that matters: the question is whether the Crown is entitled to hang, imprison or fine these petitioners as the case may be, or is it not? If the Ordinance does no more than give the Crown a right to bring these petitioners and others tried under Ordinance 2 to trial under due process of law it does nothing. That right exists independently of these Ordinances in regard to any person who is properly chargeable with the commission of an offence. These trials were without jurisdiction so that no person tried at any of them could plead either his previous conviction or acquittal as bar to a future trial unless S.3 of Ordinance 19 has, as I think it has, given him a right to plead his sentence as a bar under S.403, Criminal P.C., to future proceedings. I conclude therefore that S.3 does give legal effect to the sentences subject to the right of appeal and liability to revision. It is then said that, although the sentence is legal, as the trial at which it was passed was not held in accordance with the Code of Criminal Procedure, as soon as it is brought before the appropriate Court in appeal or in revision it must be quashed. The point is a short one depending solely on the meaning of a dozen words in this Ordinance; the material words are be subject to such rights of appeal . . . and to such power of revision . . . as if the sentence had been passed at the trial held in accordance with the Code of Criminal Procedure.

To my mind to hold that it is open to the appellant or petitioner to say on appeal or in revision that the trial was not in fact held in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure and that therefore the sentence must be quashed is to give no effect to the last clause of the words I have just quoted. For all purposes, it must be assumed that the trial at which the sentence was notionally passed was held in accordance with the provisions of the Code. I certainly do not say the Court may not exercise its inherent jurisdiction to set aside a sentence if the prisoner is not shown to have had a fair trial, but technical objections that this or that section of the Code have not been complied with cannot be entertained. Assuming the Ordinance to be in other respects valid, I do not conceive it to be the duty of this Court to give General directions for a retrial of the petitioners. Retrial would be a question for the Courts sitting in appeal or revision after consideration of the merits of each case as I do not think a retrial should be ordered merely because the Special Courts did not conform to the Code of Criminal Procedure, so that the sentences are not based on a legal conviction.

In this connexion a special objection was raised by Mr Awadhesh Nandan Sahay in Criminal Miscellaneous cases Nos 81, 82, 83, 86 and 101 of 1943. The petitioners in these cases had been sentenced to death and Mr Sahay contended that their case was not covered by S.3 of Ordinance 19 and therefore there was no course open to the Court but to make an order under S.491 (a) of the Code, directing them to be brought to trial according to law. Section 3 provides that the sentence of death is to have effect as if it had been passed by a Sessions Judge at a trial held in accordance with the Code. By virtue of Ss.31 (2) and 374 such a sentence so passed is of no effect until confirmed by the High Court. Section 3 makes no reference to confirmation, it might perhaps have been better if it had, but I do not think the omission is material. An appeal or application in revision does not follow automatically from a sentence, and therefore the right to appeal and the liability to review had to be expressly conferred. But under the Code what is generally known as a 'death reference' follows automatically on the passing of a death sentence by a Sessions Judge. I see no reason why the same consequence should not follow from the sentences which are to have effect as if they had been so passed by a Sessions Judge. It is objected that there is no one to make the reference as the Special Judge has ceased to exist, but the Code does not lay down who is to submit the proceedings to the Court and I see no reason why the proceedings should not be submitted by the person who happens to have custody of them. I therefore hold that, if it legally can, the section does have the effect contended for by the Advocate-General.

It is convenient at this point to deal with two points outside the main line of argument Mr Chakraborty, whom we permitted to address the Court although the case in which he had been instructed had been withdrawn, submitted that S.3 (1) of Ordinance 19 was repugnant to S.2 (the repealing section). I can see nothing in that point. In the first place, S.2 is really only a gesture of courtesy to the Federal Court as after their decision there was nothing effective to repeal and secondly, the Ordinance was purely procedural and the repeal of a procedural statute cannot affect matters concluded at the date of the repeal. All that S.3 (1) required was that the sentences referred to should be ascertainable, and that they clearly are. Mr M.N. Pal argued that Ordinance 19 did not apply to pending cases' by which he meant cases in which the sentenced person had filed an application under S.491 which had not been disposed of by 5th June 1943. He did not apparently include persons who had filed such applications which had been, as is now known, wrongly dismissed by various High Courts who had not the advantage of the argument addressed to their brethren in Fort William. The Ordinance is retrospective or nothing; its terms are to my mind precise on this point 'Any sentence passed', I see no reason to exclude the case of persons who had filed applications under S.491. It remains to consider the more important and difficult point of the constitutional validity of the Ordinance. The division of the objections into general and particular is perhaps not strictly scientific but it is sufficiently accurate to be useful. The general objections are based on Ss.210 and 212 and on S.202, Government of India Act, 1935.

First it is said that the decision of the Federal Court in A.I.R. 1943 F.C. 36 is an absolute bar to legislation by any legislative authority in India on the same subject. That proposition is too wide. The true proposition is that a decision of the Federal Court in a constitutional matter (not being a question of conflict between different Legislatures) having been given on certain premises no Legislature can enact legislation which will affect the validity of the premises but if the same or similar results can be reached by legislation the validity of which depends on different premises the previous decision will be no bar. In other words, a Legislature may, if it can, get round the decision but may not overrule it. This objection therefore on examination proves to be a particular objection and not a general one and I will return to it in due course.

Secondly, it is said that as S.3 of Ordinance 19 is repugnant to the Code of Criminal Procedure and does not alter, repeal or amend it in express terms, it is therefore invalid by virtue of S.202, Government of India Act, 1935. No authority was quoted to support that proposition and I can find no warrant for it. Ordinance 2 attempted not a general repeal of the Code but to make it inapplicable to certain cases, and the intention of Ordinance 19 is the same. All that could have been done therefore would have been to insert some such words as 'Notwithstanding anything in the Code of Criminal Procedure'. I am not prepared unless constrained by authority and none has been referred to, to hold the insertion of these words essential, if the meaning of the enactment is clear without them. It is true these words were used in the United Provinces Regulation of Remissions of Rent Act, 1935, which was considered by the Federal Court in 1940 F.C.R. 110 but the Court gave no indication that they were essential to the validity of the Act. It was admitted that had the Code been an enactment passed after the coming into force of the Government of India Act, 1935, this argument would have been untenable. The argument is based only on S.202. But that section is only providing in terms for the continuance of the law in force before the Act, and making applicable to it the principles which will apply automatically to all law made after the Act and I must hold that pre-Act law can be modified by repugnancy just as post-Act law can be.

It was faintly argued that the Governor-General under S.72 of Sch. 9 had no power to repeal, or modify any existing law. If that were so, S.72 would be practically useless because the field of human experience is nowadays so well covered by legislation that it is almost impossible to devise a new law which does not to some extent cover the same ground as an existing one. In my opinion, however, that contention is contrary to the plain words of the Act which says that an Ordinance under S.72 'shall have . . . the like force of law as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature'. The Indian Legislature may by Act repeal or modify an existing law and therefore the result of S.72 is that the Governor-General may by Ordinance do the same. This view is in accordance with what I understand to be the view of the Federal Court in A.I.R. 1943, although the point did not actually arise having regard to the decision on another point and is that adopted by the Special Bench of this Court in 22 Pat. 175. I hold therefore what I have called the general objections to the validity of the Ordinance to fail.

Finally I turn to consider the particular objections to this piece of legislation. It is to be borne in mind that the pronouncement of the Privy Council in (1878) 3 A.C. 889 that within their own sphere the powers of the Indian Legislature are as large and ample as those of Parliament itself is still good law notwithstanding the Government of India Act 1935 and the burden of shewing the existence of some restriction is on those who assert it, this was laid down in 1940 F.C.R. 1106 which decided there was no objection to retrospective legislations per se. The true effect of S.3 (which is the only one material) is, as I have already held, to direct the execution of sentences and provide for appeal and review in an ascertainable number of specific cases which were determined in good faith but in fact without jurisdiction under the ordinary rules of substantive law and evidence though not of procedure by persons who were selected from among the officers ordinarily exercising judicial functions in criminal matters. It is said to be invalidly enacted on a number of grounds which are substantially distinct.

First it is said that under S.72 the legislative powers only arise on the existence of an emergency and that there was no emergency. The Governor-General whose words I have already quoted has declared that an emergency has arisen necessitating the ordinance. In my opinion, in face of that declaration, the decision of the Privy Council in 58 I.A. 169 precludes this Court from either enquiring whether an emergency exists or whether the Ordinance is conducive to the peace and good Government of British India and apt to meet the emergency.

Secondly it is said the legislation was merely a colourable device to flout the decision of the Federal Court and therefore void on the analogy of the order of the Punjab Government considered in A.I.R. 1943 Lah. 41. This argument too seems to me untenable. The Ordinance goes a long way to meet the criticisms made on Ordinance 2 of 1942. It makes no attempt to perpetuate the special Courts as it would appear it could have done by suitable provisions and as to the past it restores the jurisdiction of the High Court the absence of which formed the principal, though not the only, ground of complaint against the system set up by Ordinance 2. It seems to me impossible to say it is merely a colourable device.

Thirdly it is said the subject matter of the Ordinance is not within the powers of the Federal Legislature under S.100, Government of India Act, 1935 and therefore not within the legislative powers of the Governor-General under S.72 of Sch.9. In other words, that the subject matter of the Ordinance is not comprised in any one of the three lists in Sch.7. This objection was perhaps the most strongly urged and at the same time the most unreal of all objections put forward. It is admitted that a proclamation under S.102 having been made all three lists are equally now the field of the Federal Legislature and that if any subject matter is omitted from the totality of the three lists the Governor-General may under S.104 bring it in and allot it to a list. If therefore the subject matter of this Ordinance is not to be found in Sch. 7 the Governor-General can in the exercise of his discretion put it there and it will make no difference for this purpose which of the three lists he selects.

In my opinion however it is covered by the item Criminal Procedure (Item 2 in List III). Ordinance II of 1942 was clearly 'Criminal Procedure'. It was argued by Mr Baldeva Sahai for certain petitioners that as the procedure under which the sentences were passed was invalid the execution of such sentences is not a matter of Criminal Procedure. If the trials had been valid, execution of sentences is clearly a matter of 'Criminal Procedure' as it is the subject matter of one of the chapters of the Code of Criminal Procedure. I do not think the expression can be so narrowly construed as is contended. I see a very real and important difference between a sentence passed by mere executive act and one passed after an investigation before an officer purporting to exercise judicial functions and to decide judicially. This Court has only to decide on the circumstances of the case before it; howsoever difficult it is to draw an exact line between two opposites it is often not so difficult to determine which side of the line a particular case falls. In my judgment the giving of directions as to the execution of these sentences and the hearing of appeals and revision application arising out of them is a matter of Criminal Procedure.

The Advocate-General further contended that in any case the Governor-General's powers under S.72 of Sch. 9 are not limited by S.100 of the Act. He referred to the history of the section starting with the East India Council Act of 1861 and the Government of India Act, 1915 and the amendment to that Act made in 1919. Under the 1915 and 1919 Acts; the 'restrictions' referred to in S.72 of that Act appear to have been limited to those imposed by S.65 (2) and (3). These restrictions are in part repeated in S.110 (b), Government of India Act, 1935 (S.65 of the earlier Act not being one of those continued). The 1935 Act however clearly imposes new restrictions beyond those of S.110 (b) for instance S.112. The power of the Indian Legislature by reference to which the 'restrictions' referred to in S.72 of Sch. 9 are imposed is given by reference to the power of the Federal Legislature (S.316). The restrictions on the power of Federal Legislature are wider than those on that of the Indian Legislature under the repealed Act. These restrictions in my view include S.112 and equally and other section in fact constituting a restriction. Among these I must include S.100. I might add that in all the cases in which the validity of Ordinance 2 has been challenged this point has been assumed although it never became necessary to decide it.

Fourthly, it is said that it is a cardinal feature of the Indian constitution that the legislative and judicial functions should be distinct and accordingly that the Legislature cannot act as a judge. For the purposes of this case, I would accept this proposition which I am inclined to think is correct. In my view, however, to direct the execution of a sentence determined after investigation by another person is not to exercise judicial functions. The question to be determined by the Governor-General in his legislative capacity was whether having due regard to the peace and good Government of the country the totality of the investigations which had taken place were so contrary to the principles of justice that even with rights of appeal and liability to revision, it would be inexpedient to use them as a basis for the subsequent execution of sentences. I cannot see how that can be described as the exercise of judicial function. The Ordinance, in my opinion, gives legislative force to an executive act which is a proper exercise of legislative functions.

Lastly, it is said that this Ordinance is invalid by virtue of the decision of the Federal Court in A.I.R. 1943 F.C. 36. This, I think, is the crucial point. The principles which I endeavoured to enunciate in an earlier part of this judgment are clear enough, it is the application of them to the particular case which gives rise to the difficulty. As I understand the judgment of the Federal Court, it was the delegation of the power to bring the Ordinance into effective operation in practical effect of Ordinance 19 is that the legislative authority ratifies the invalid acts of the officers of the Crown. Ratification is a familiar legal conception and of course, it is not possible to ratify an act which is ultra vires of the ratifying body. If authority is needed I would refer to (1875) 7 H.L. 653. But the Federal Court did not decide that it was ultra vires to set up Special Courts and give them jurisdiction. It was the method of giving them jurisdiction which was ultra vires. I see no reason therefore why if it can avoid the error of method the Legislature cannot ratify the invalid acts. The legislative authority has in this case applied its own mind to the case covered by the new Ordinance which are specific ascertainable cases. Therefore, in my opinion, the ratification is effective and the new Ordinance is not made invalid by the decision of the Federal Court on the old one. I might observe that the contrary view of Sen J. is based on the assumption that the whole of Ordinance 2 is invalid. As I have already stated, I am bound by the decision in 22 Pat. 175 to hold the contrary. Sen J.'s views do not therefore help me.

Much argument was addressed to us about the words, trial, conviction and sentence. This is not a question of words. I do not think either that by verbal dexterity the difficulties of ultra vires have been avoided or that from verbal infelicities nothing effective has been achieved. Having given the matter the best consideration I can, I am of opinion, that the substance of the Ordinance that is to say, the execution of the sentences passed by the Special Courts, subject to such modification as may be made on the merits on appeal or in review, has been expressed with sufficient clarity and is not ultra vires. I would, therefore, dismiss these applications. A certificate is granted under S. 205, Government of India Act, 1935, so that the petitioners or any of them who so desire may appeal to the Federal Court.

Sinha J. – I agree.

Applications dismissed.

51: The Governor of Bihar to the Viceroy

Linlithgow Collection

[NAI – Acc.. No. 2385]

From H.E. Sir Thomas Rutherford, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., Governor of Bihar.

July 20th 1943.

D.O. No. 556-G.B.

Dear Lord Linlithgow,

I enclose a copy of the Chief secretary's report for the first half of July.

2. Law and Order – Following shortly on the attack on the Railway Station and post office at Bidhupur in Muzaffarpur district has come an attack on the 16th of this month on the post office at Jamdaha in the same district by an armed band. The method of attack suggests that the C.S.P. is behind these outrages. I have just received a report that Sia Ram Singh, an important leader in the South Bhagalpur dacoity campaign, on whose head is a reward of Rs 5,000, appeared on the 14th with followers, numbering about 10, before an Inspector, Sub-Inspector and Constable who were busy investigating a house-breaking case, and announced who he was, after telling the villagers who had been watching the police proceedings to clear off. The Inspector made a half-hearted attempt to arrest him, but was easily thrown off. The Inspector and Sub-Inspector were foolish in going into this area unarmed even though they were on ordinary police work. The villagers though summoned to assist gave no help, and it is proposed to levy a collective fine. It is an unfortunate incident, but it shows what a good intelligence system Sia Ram has.

The police this time of Patna district have again successfully ambushed party of dacoits. They caught them on the 15th in the act of attacking a house. Two were killed and seven are in hospital in a precarious condition.

Of the two dead dacoits one is a village chaukidar.

The Patna High Court (the same Judges as I mentioned before) have issued a notice to Government in connection with an appeal against a conviction under the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, to show cause why Defence of India Rule 130-A should not be declared ultra vires. There is no mention of this matter in the appeal petition. Intimation has been sent to the Home Department of this new move.

I have written to you separately about the R.A.F. murder cases. I have also been looking into another case of the looting of a police station which seems to have been lost by investigation, delays and bad supervision.

3. Agrarian – Whatever may be the state of the towns and labour not employed by the State and big employers, the landholders who get their rents in kind and the cultivators who have sufficient land to live off are flourishing. Agricultural Income-tax shows considerable increase in a number of districts. Large numbers of mortgages are being paid off and I note that, even in the Chota Nagpur Division, prices of land are reported to be almost double.

[Omitted: Two paragraphs dealing with the food situation.]

Yours Sincerely,

T.G. Rutherford.

[Most Secret & Personal.]

No. 562-G.B.

Dear Lord Linlithgow,

My last letter to Your Excellency about the Ainsworth case was dated the 22nd March.¹ I have now received information that the criminal proceedings instituted against Ainsworth by the brother of the deceased man have been discharged under Section 4 (a) of the Indemnity Act. The way being thus clear for recording a departmental censure, the Chief Secretary has written to the Inspector-General of Police a letter approved by me of which I enclose a copy. In this letter no direct use has been made of the Commissioner's enquiry into the incident because, as Your Excellency will remember, we are anxious to maintain the secrecy of that document and to insure against its use in any future judicial proceedings which might still occur if the order of discharge were challenged in the High Court. A General reference has however been made at the beginning of the letter to the Commissioner's findings.

2. Ainsworth has recently made a formal application for transfer to the North-West Frontier Province, and I have given direction that this application may now go forward.

3. After a decent interval has elapsed, I propose to have confidential enquiries made into the circumstances in which dependents of the deceased man have been left and then to consider whether any ex gratia payment should be made to them.

Yours Sincerely,

T.G. Rutherford.

No. 1961 -C.

Government of Bihar, Political Department. (Special Section.)

From Y.A. Godbole, Esq., C.I.E. I.C.S., Chief Secretary to Government.

To The Inspector-General of Police, Bihar.

Ranchi, July 19th, 1943.

Sir,

I am directed to address you regarding the incident which occurred at Arrah on the 20th September 1942 resulting in the death of a prisoner in 'Police custody'.

2. Government have carefully considered the report of the Magisterial enquiry under Section 176, Criminal Procedure Code, and the findings of the Commissioner of the Patna Division.

The admitted facts are that four persons were arrested by sowars of the Military Mounted Police near the Collectorate while engaged in shouting slogans and distributing subversive leaflets. They were taken to the residence of Mr Ainsworth, Assistant Superintendent of Police, where he interrogated them with the permission of the Superintendent of Police. Mr Ainsworth in his statement before the Magistrate admits that as the prisoners refused to speak he caused them to be beaten with canes on the buttocks, both by himself and by sowars of the Military Mounted Police under his orders, until information was obtained from them which later led to the seizure of a depot for the dissemination of subversive propaganda. The prisoners were then taken to the thana and from there to the jail in a motor truck. On the way prisoner Kailashpati Singh collapsed and on arrival at the jail the Medical Officer found him to be in a very serious condition and sent him to the Sadr hospital. Before reaching the hospital the prisoner expired. Post mortem examination revealed that, apart from marks of beating on the buttocks, three of his ribs and two metacarpal bones of one hand were broken.

3. The prisoner was in police custody from the time of his arrest to the time of his death and these injuries were therefore inflicted while he was in such custody. The evidence indicates that the injuries were not inflicted before he reached the Assistant Superintendent of Police's bungalow. It is clear that the more serious injuries were not caused by beating with canes and that the accused suffered other violence beyond that which Mr Ainsworth and the sowars of the Military Mounted Police have admitted. The violence which caused the fatal injuries to Kailashpati Singh could have occurred either during the course of the interrogation at Mr Ainsworth's bungalow or during removal by the police to the thana and jail. The three other fellow prisoners of Kailashpati Singh speak of having been beaten with sticks or lathis, slaps and fist-blows. But none of them were able to say who were the persons who beat Kailashpati Singh and only one of them was able to identify any of the police who took part in the affair. These witnesses also speak of maltreatment in the truck while they were being taken to the thana and jail. Further enquiry has not thrown any added light on the affair. The evidence on record, therefore, establishes that these four persons were beaten on the buttocks under the orders of Mr Ainsworth but does not establish when, how or by whom the more serious injuries which proved fatal to Kailashpati Singh were inflicted. It does indicate that Mr Ainsworth was not present throughout the whole transaction and there is no evidence that these particular injuries were caused in his presence. But it is clear that they must have been inflicted either by the police or troops who were present during the interrogation and removal to the thana and jail.

4. Mr Ainsworth was the officer directing the interrogation and he was responsible for the safe custody and treatment of the prisoners in his charge. He himself ordered and took part in the beating of the prisoners in order to extract information and seems to have shown himself reprehensibly callous as to how they were treated by his own men or others. Government are unable therefore to absolve him from responsibility for this unfortunate incident. If it had occurred in normal times there would have been no alternative to dismissal. But in considering Mr Ainsworth's action they have borne in mind the exceptional conditions of the time. Mr Ainsworth was engaged in the task of restoring order in the face of a rebellious outbreak of unprecedented magnitude and was working in circumstances of considerable strain, difficulty and personal danger. Government therefore do not consider that it would be fair to judge by ordinary standards actions which, reprehensible though they are, were done in the heat and stress of the moment. They are also mindful of the fact that Mr Ainsworth throughout the operations against rebels displayed courage, initiative and leadership of a high order and that he contributed very largely to the restoration of order in the district. These meritorious services must count in mitigation of conduct which has prevented the recognition of his services that might otherwise have been made.

5. Government have decided therefore to exercise clemency in this case, and to take no further action beyond recording their grave displeasure at the impropriety of Mr Ainsworth's conduct and at the callousness displayed by him and the men under his orders.

6. I am to request that this censure be communicated to Mr Ainsworth.

7. Government leave the conduct of the sowars of the Military Mounted Police who were concerned in this affair to be dealt with by you, as the disciplinary authority in respect of them vests in the Inspector-General of Police.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
Y.A. Godbole,
Chief Secretary to Government.

To
All Provincial Governments and Chief Commissioners, Delhi,

Baluchistan.

No. 44/37/43 - Poll (I)

New Delhi, the 21st July 1943

[Omitted para¹ -- Ed.]

2. As you are doubtless aware, we are under continual pressure, which is renewed with each successive session of the Legislature, to liberalize the conditions of detention of security prisoners. We have so far resisted this pressure. Our stand has been based on the view that the Government of India could not be expected to intervene in matters of detailed treatment of security prisoners in Provinces and that their general responsibility for the administration of the Defence of India Rules, and of security prisoners detained thereunder, was satisfied provided that they ensured that uniform standards were maintained in matters of importance. The validity of this stand depends of course on the extent to which provincial Governments do in fact adhere to our principles in their treatment of security prisoners, and to the extent that the principles laid down do in fact cover all matters of real importance concerning the treatment of security prisoners. On the first point, we believe that considerable divergences of practice in respect of these matters of principle have been allowed to creep in; we would repeat the request made in our letter of the 21st January, 1942, that these principles, which we consider hold equally good today, should be accepted by Provincial Governments and that if you find any difficulty in accepting them, you should refer the matter to us without delay. In the attached Memorandum we indicate some of the directions in which we understand that Provincial practice has diverged from our principles. On the second point, we consider that correspondence and interviews, neither of which were treated as matters of principle in our Memorandum of 21st January, 1942, should now be so treated; we think further that principles should be enunciated embodying the views we have from time to time expressed on the separate treatment of Congress security prisoners; and the succeeding paragraphs of this letter lay down the further principles which we propose to adopt.

(3) Interviews, We remain of the opinion expressed in our letter No. 44/6/42 – Poll (I) of 20th February, 1943,¹ in which we inclined to the view that, since letters to near relatives were already allowed, interviews with such relatives on personal and domestic matters would do little harm provided that jail administration was strict and the interviews were properly supervised. We still feel, however, that at the present stage, we cannot press Provincial Governments which desire to maintain the existing restrictions to relax them; and we cannot at present insist, as a matter of principle, on uniformity of practice in this respect.

Memorandum

Divergences of practice in respect of matters of principle regarding the treatment of security prisoners laid down in the Memorandum attached to Home Department letter No. 43/46/41 – Poll (I), dated 21st January 1942,² and in Home Department letter No. 44/37/43 – Poll (I), dated the 21st July 1943.

1. Segregation. In our Memorandum of 21st January 1942, importance was attached to the principle of complete separation of security prisoners from all other classes of prisoners. It is understood that, in the Central Province, security prisoners are in some cases allowed to mix with convicted prisoners.
2. Diet allowances. The principle laid down in our Memorandum of 21st January 1942, was that the diet of class II security prisoners should be a distinct improvement on that of 'C' class convicted prisoners. It is understood that class II security prisoners are in the Punjab, Bihar, Central Provinces and Sind treated in matters of diet as on a par with 'C' class convicts.
3. Personal allowances. Our Memorandum of 21st January 1942 opposed on principle the grant of personal allowances to security prisoners. It is understood that personal allowances have been granted to five Congress security prisoners in Assam.
4. Receipt of funds from external sources. Our Memorandum of 21st January 1942 laid it down as a principle that the legitimate needs of security prisoners in the way of extra amenities should be met by allowing them to receive limited funds from outside sources. It is understood that class II security prisoners in the United Provinces, both Congress and non-Congress, are not allowed to receive such funds; and that in the Punjab the purposes to which Congress security prisoners may put such funds are restricted.
5. Family allowances. Our Memorandum of 21st January 1942 set forth a formula for the liberalization of the grant of allowances to security prisoners' families. As far as can be judged, in what is admittedly a matter of degree, our views have only been fully accepted and put into practice in Madras, the United Provinces and the Punjab. It is important that a clear distinction should for this purpose be made between the treatment to be accorded to the families of Congress and non-Congress security prisoners.
6. Parole. We have no detailed information of the extent to which the principle laid down in our Memorandum of 21st January 1942 and reiterated in our letter No. 44/29/43 - Poll (I) of 6th May, 1943,¹ has been put into practice in provinces. We have, however, recently received a representation from a Province in which conditions for the grant of parole set forth in our letter of 6th May, 1943, are being strictly interpreted, urging the need for greater uniformity in the practice of the various Provinces in this respect and pointing out the embarrassment caused by the absence of such uniformity. Instances were quoted where other Provincial Governments had released security prisoners on parole, in one case for a period of over six months, and in another case for the performance of the Sraddh ceremonies. It is difficult to give more detailed guidance than already given in our letter of 6th May. But it is suggested that as a General rule, release on parole to attend religious or social ceremonies would not be in accord with the principle laid down in our Memorandum. (Central Provinces Government letter No. 1745-1395-III of 8th July, 1943, refers).

No. 3/68/43 – Poll (I)

New Delhi, the 24th July 1943.

Subject: Action in the event of revival of serious disorders.

Your Government is no doubt aware of the probability of demonstrations and the possibility of renewed disturbances on the anniversary of the Congress arrests on August 9th and is taking such precautionary and other measures as it considers necessary. A summary of the more important information at our disposal in this context is communicated to provincial Criminal Investigation Departments and Special Branches with the Weekly Intelligence Summary issued by the Director, Intelligence Bureau, and any important information that may become available to us during the last week before August 9th will be communicated to you immediately. Our general view, on the information at present available, is that, although certain plans of action are being mooted, the driving force behind them is not widespread or influential. These plans emanate mainly from the important leaders of the Congress Socialist party who are still at large; the public support for these leaders does not appear to be large or increasing; and the chances of any organized and widespread trouble do not, therefore, appear to be very great. On the other hand, the possibilities of local disorders, perhaps in a considerable number of places, cannot be altogether dismissed and we cannot risk any recrudescence of trouble on the scale of 1942 to which such local manifestations of disorder might eventually lead.

2. All Provincial Governments will, no doubt, use the forces at their disposal to deal with any disturbances that may arise and will not hesitate to enlist military aid if the disorders show any signs of spreading or of passing beyond the power of the Police to suppress. Further, the experience of the last rebellion demonstrated the need for the prompt arrest and trial of offenders, and also, in certain areas, the necessity for the exercise by local officers of certain extra-legal powers to secure the early restoration of order, thus necessitating subsequent indemnity legislation. On the other hand, developments in the Courts regarding the use of the powers of detention without trial have pointed to the desirability of prosecuting as many persons as possible for substantive offences instead of detaining them under Defence Rule 26. In our opinion the use of this rule should be restricted, as far as possible, to the detention of persons who commit no overt acts themselves but are known to be organizing or inciting others to do so. An additional point of importance is that the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance is no longer available for the speedy trial of offences and our examination of the general position has led us to the conclusion that any legal provision (such as that, for instance, included in the Defence of India Act) for the trial of a wide or unspecified range of offences by special procedure would be open to objections of the same kind as were held by judicial authority to apply to the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance.

3. We are still examining the question of drafting an Ordinance which would secure the objects in view without being exposed to these objections; but our provisional view in the light of all these considerations is that, if disturbances arise on a scale comparable to what occurred in Bihar and the Eastern Districts of the United Province in August 1942 and it appears improbable that the Police supported by such military aid as may be available will be able to control the situation within a reasonably short space of time, the wisest course would be to consider the proclamation of martial law in conjunction with the Military Commanders concerned. The circumstances in which a proclamation of martial law would be justifiable and the procedure to be followed in that event, have been fully explained in the late Defence Coordination Department's letter No. 767-OR/41, dated 20th February 1943; and it is recognized that the use of martial law cannot properly be regarded as a matter of convenience, or merely as a precautionary step to prevent trouble, or to avoid the legal difficulties which have attended the application of emergency powers in the past. Recourse to martial law must remain a last resort. On the other hand, it will probably be agreed that the situation in various areas last year had in fact become so out of hand as to justify the introduction of martial law, and it is felt, that the repetition of such a situation should be avoided by a readiness on the part of the civil authorities, acting, of course, in the closest possible consultation with the local Military authorities, to agree to the taking of that step at the earliest moment at which the circumstances justify it.

4. It will be realized that, if martial law is to be established, it will be necessary to maintain it for sometime after the disturbances themselves have been quelled, until the Military tribunals have cleared off the pending trials of offences which occurred under that regime, and also that the Military authorities will require some time to make the necessary arrangements for the noting up of Military Courts for the trial of those offences. We do not suggest that it will be necessary in advance to make any elaborate arrangements for these purposes but we trust that all provincial Governments will accept the principle of the policy suggested above and will keep in the closest possible touch with the Army Commands, with whom they should discuss the possibilities of martial law being required in particular areas and the arrangements that would be necessary in that event.

5. The foregoing paragraphs have particular reference to the possibility of disorders on or about the anniversary of the outbreak of Congress rebellion. It need scarcely be added that there are other circumstances which may supervene at any time, which may afford to the ill-disposed even greater opportunities for causing serious trouble. Offensive or defensive operations against the Japanese the spontaneous occurrence of food riots in certain areas or possibly, a fast by Mr Gandhi and its fatal termination, might well provide such opportunities. We trust, therefore, that the policy outlined above will receive the serious consideration of Provincial Governments, even apart from the risks of widespread disorder in the near future; and we should be glad to receive an expression of your views in the matter at the earliest possible date.

Notes in the Defence Department

The suggestion of the Calcutta Chief Justice,¹ in brief, is that on the principle of Audi Alteram Partem, and on the analogy of Regulation III of 1818 and U.K. Def. Regulation 18B, Defence of India Rule 26 should also contain some provision for informing the detenu of the grounds of his detention and to enable him to show cause against his detention.

2. In Regulation III, Sec. 5 seems to be the only relevant provision. It is intended to afford an opportunity to the detenu to make representations to Government from time to time. But the 3rd recital to the Regulation lays down in clear language that the grounds of detention 'should from time to time come under revision' and detenu 'should at all time be allowed freely to bring to the notice of Government all circumstances relating either to the supposed grounds of such determination, or to the manner in which it may be executed'.

3. In U.K. Defence Regulation 18B, Sub-regulations (3), (4) and (5) provide a comprehensive system where by a detenu can represent his grievances to an Advisory Committee. Under this Regulation the detenu can demand the charge for which he has been detained and it is enjoined on the Committee to inform the objector of the grounds on which the order has been made and to furnish him with such particulars as are in the opinion of the Chairman, sufficient to enable him to present his case. The Provisions did not form a part of Regulation 18B as originally enacted, but were inserted subsequently in deference to criticism voiced in Parliament. When the question of effecting a corresponding amendment to our own rule 26 came up, it was, however, considered unnecessary to do so 'unless it comes in for hostile — and valid — criticism'.

4. The Federal Court also commented at some length on the propriety of specifying the grounds of detention more pointedly, in their recent notable judgment in *Talpade's*² case. Though their final sentence on this subject, occurring in the dictated judgment is excluded from the finally issued version, the relevant observations were examined in the Home Department and the result is embodied in para 4 of their express letter No. 15/6/43 – Poll (I) dated 1-5-43³ to Provincial Governments.

5. It will appear from the above that the Calcutta Chief Justice's suggestion goes substantially beyond the position concerned or designed for times of stress such as a long drawn war, or in U.K. Defence Regulations. So far as the essential point of the matter is concerned, namely that the extraordinary powers of detention given by rule 26 should be exercised with the greatest circumspection and only in the most exceptional circumstances, it will be observed that we have already sent word to the provinces to review all detention orders and the delegations made for making those Orders. This should go a long way to meet the real principle behind the suggestion. But any action, which may result from this will only accrue by way of executive discretion, and would neither be subject to the watchful scrutiny of the judiciary nor will in any way allay public criticism. For the public at large and the judiciary, any concession in the matter, should manifest itself in the statutory provision of some machinery like the Advisory Committees in U.K. which may inspire the confidence of those aggrieved. We can take it that the suggestion that detention orders should always state the grounds for detention, is prima facie too big to merit statutory inclusion in the rule itself. The new form of order suggested in the H.D. express letter will considerably improve the definition of grounds in the Orders. The question is whether and how far it is possible to make the system in India in this connection approximate to the position obtaining in U.K.

Home Department may see for comments, first.

A.S. 24.7.43.

I think that all we can say at this stage is that provisions on the lines suggested would, if circumstances were other than they are, be desirable in principle, and to ask Home Department to show cause to the contrary, as I imagine they will certainly be able to do.

L.J.D. Wakely,
26.7.43.

Secretary (Home Dept.)

Defence Deptt. U.O. No. 7436-DC/43, dated 26.7.43.

Assuming that the *Hindustan Times*⁴ report is reasonably accurate, it would appear that the Chief Justice has suggested the inclusion in Defence Rule 26 of provisions corresponding to those of paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of the U.K. Regulation 18 (B). Briefly, these paragraphs relate to the setting up of advisory committees to whom any person aggrieved by the order of detention may make his objections; to the opportunity to be afforded to each detenu to make representations to the Secretary of State, irrespective of whether he proposes to make an objection before the advisory committee; and to the duty of the Chairman of the advisory committee to inform the objecting detenu of the grounds on which he is detained and to furnish him with sufficient particulars to present his case.

2. Before examining these three points, it is I think desirable to clarify our position visa-a-vis the Chief Justice in this matter. As far as I can gather from the Hindustan Times report, the Chief Justice has not held that the absence of these provisions in Defence Rule 26 constitutes any illegality; he appears merely to have expressed surprise at their absence in view of the fact that they are included in Regulation III (I cannot find any provision in Regulation III laying down either that the person detained shall be informed of the grounds of his detention or that his case shall be examined by an advisory board) and in U.K. Regulation 18 (b), and to have hoped that his observations might be considered by those responsible for the drafting of the Rule. I cannot see, therefore, that, apart from his eminence as a citizen, the Chief Justice has any status in this matter and I presume we are certainly under no compulsion to defer to his wishes. The position I take it, then, is that while we may, at Defence Department's request, make use of the present opportunity to re-examine the position, there is no reason why we should reconsider the attitude previously adopted on this point unless the relevant circumstances appear to us to have changed.

3. As regards the inclusion in Defence Rule 26 of a provision for advisory boards to whom security prisoners should submit objections, it will be seen from the late Defence Co-ordination Department's File No. 184/OR/39 that we resisted this proposal at the time of the drafting of Defence Rule 26. The same question was further commented on in para. 5 of Addl. Secy.'s note of 22.11.41 on the Home Department file No. 107/7/41 - Poll (I). Our position from the beginning has, I think, been that we should resist any such provision unless valid and widespread criticism made it advisable as a matter of policy to give way on this point. Whether such a stage has now been reached is a matter of high policy. Relevant considerations are the difficulty which we should doubtless experience in providing suitable personnel for such advisory boards, the fact that cases of all security prisoners are frequently re-examined by both the Central and provincial Govts, rendering such advisory boards to some extent superfluous; and the difficulties in the way of providing security prisoners with any detailed information as to the grounds of their arrest referred to in the final paragraph of this note.

4. The second point raised by the Chief Justice is the need for a provision parallel to that of U.K. Regulation 18 (B) (4), providing that each detenu shall have an opportunity to make representations to the Secretary of State. There are so far as I am aware no restrictions on the submission of application from security prisoners to Government, provided these are not couched in un-seemly language. I see no cause whatever for including in the rule any detailed provision in that respect.

The final point taken by the Chief Justice is that each security prisoner should, in conformity with para. 5 of Regulation 18 (B), be informed of the grounds on which he is detained. This is to some extent linked with the question of advisory boards, this material being supplied to detenus in England to enable them to present their case before the boards. In this connection please see Addl. Secy.'s note of 24.4.43⁵ on Home Department File No. 15/6/43 – Poll (I). I have no doubt that, on security grounds alone, we must rule out any proposal that detailed information as to the grounds for their arrest should be supplied to security prisoners. There would I imagine, however, be less objection to supplying them with general information somewhat on the lines of the information supplied to Central Government security prisoners when their cases were reviewed by the Dain Committee; a typical form used for this purpose is placed as appendix I to notes.⁶

Addl. Secy.

I agree generally, but should like to consider the matter further after the official copy of the judgment has been received. We cannot act on press reports. I would only observe at this stage that the 'Audi Alteram Partem' maxim may in certain circumstances have to give way to the even more important principle that 'the safety of the realm is the greatest law' (or whatever the correct words are).⁷ And, secondly, that the 'audi alteram partem' principle can certainly be given effect to without having advisory committees.

A.V. Askwith, Esq., C.I.E., I.C.S., Chief Commissioner, Delhi.

To
The Secretary to the Govt. of India,

Delhi, dated the 28th July 1943.

Sir,
I have the honour to reply to Sir Richard Tottenham's secret express letter No. 3/68/43 - Poll (I) dated the 14th July 1943¹ regarding the course of action to be followed in the event of any revival of Congress disorder next month.

2. If my opinion is desired on the general questions raised in the later part of Sir Richard Tottenham's letter, it is as follows:

I. The general experience of the last twenty years is that the expectation of bringing offenders in 'Political' cases to justice in the ordinary courts is small. Unless special courts are set up, and the jurisdiction of the High Court is ousted, it would hardly be possible for the executive authorities to get adequate punishments imposed in any subversive movement.

This is due partly to executive prejudice of many of the High Court Judges but even more the legalistic and impractical atmosphere which envelops the superior courts in India. That matters should have reached a stage when we cannot rely on the High Courts to perform their proper function in relation to a serious anti-Government movement is lamentable, but I think most competent observers would agree that the facts are as stated.

II. Situations occur fairly frequently in India which could not be controlled by the civil authorities employing their ordinary powers, but which can be effectively controlled by them without recourse to martial law, if they are invested with additional powers. In particular, if special courts are set up to try offenders with the jurisdiction of the High Courts excluded. It would be most unfortunate, from every point of view if the handling of such situations had to be taken out of the hands of the civil authorities and martial law proclaimed.

III. The recent Judgement of the Federal Court regarding the validity of the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance 1942 is so perverse that there seems every likelihood of its being upset in the Privy Council or at least of such observations being made in the Privy Council judgments as will present judges in India from taking so extraordinary a line in future.

In the meantime if a need arises, I would urge that the Government of India should not hesitate to advise the Governor General to promulgate another Ordinance of the same kind. I suggest that it should be so framed as to leave it to the discretion of the prosecuting authorities, subject to such instructions as the Provincial Government and or the District Magistrate may give, to choose whether they will bring any particular case before a special Court or before one of the ordinary courts. In the hearing of the cases before the various High Courts and the Federal Court, counsel (including counsel for the Crown) seem to have imagined that the simultaneous existence of two different systems of adjectival criminal law, and two distinct sets of Criminal courts, in the same local area would be anomalous — indeed unthinkable. But to officials who have served in an area where the Frontier Crimes Regulation is in force such an arrangement is commonplace. In a minor degree, an arrangement of the same kind exists permanently in all those parts of India to which section 30 of the Code of Criminal procedure applies; in a large number of serious cases it is in the discretion of the prosecuting authorities to lay the case before a magistrate with section 30 powers or to bring it before a magistrate with a view to its commitment to the sessions. There is nothing novel or outrageous in giving the prosecution a choice of form.

Provisions should be included in the new Ordinance expressly modifying sections 23 and 29 of the Code of Criminal procedure. The Federal Court appears to have been possessed by a curious idea that a special sanctity attaches to the Code of Criminal Procedure which does not attach to other Acts and Ordinances. An express amendment by the Ordinance of a section of the Code might help to clear misapprehensions on this subject.

3. It is, I think generally agreed that the promulgation of martial law in the capital of India (except perhaps in the face an enemy invasion, when the whole country might be put under martial law) can hardly be envisaged. This being so, the argument in clause II in the preceding paragraph has a special meaning in regard to Delhi.

4. After writing the above I should say that while full precautions will be taken, there is no reason to anticipate any serious trouble in Delhi on the 9th August. Probably the underground Congress workers will attempt to organise some kind of minor outrages-damages to letter boxes or something of that kind — but as the situation is developing at present it is difficult to conceive that they will have any success.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient servant.

Please refer to the correspondence ending with my note No. 4092/C of the 16th July 1943.¹

On reliable information that a meeting of the National Youth League was to be held in the house Edupuganti Ratnamamba at Penamakur, Kistna District on the night of 24-7-43, in order to draw out a programme for the Congress anniversary on 9-8-43, the Madras Special Branch Inspector raided her house during the early hours of 25.7.43. In that house Surapaneni Ramaseshagiri Rao, a member of the National Youth League, concerned in Crimes Nos 68/43 and 45/43 of the Governorpet Police Station under rule 39 (6) of the D.O.I. Rules and 224 I.P.C. respectively, who had been absconding for a long time, was arrested. A search of the house was thus made and, when among several other prejudicial documents, a copy of the Special programme for the 9th August 1943 issued by the Indian National Congress Central Directorate, sent to Govt., under my endorsement No. 3690/C of the 3rd July 1943 was found. There were 5 other members of the National Youth League in the house too at the time. This confirms the view of the Special Branch that the objects of the National Youth League are allied to those of the Congress and that after the subsidence of the Congress Rebellion and the elimination of the important Congress leaders this Youth League was started to revive the Congress programme, working underground.

Edupuganti Ratnamamba, President of the Panchayat Board, Penamakur, and a member of the Superseded District Board, Kistna, is the wife of Edupuganti Kodandarayamma, Government Sub-Registrar; Kovv Nellore District. As she is liable under rule 39 (6) of the D.O.I. Rules, she has been arrested.

I agree that D.I.B. should take this up with provinces in person.¹ But in the mean while we have evidently lost through inadequate machinery for interrogation, a great deal of material which might have helped us to deal with the Congress conspirators. Presumably however the provision and training of adequate staff would take so long that we cannot now hope to fill gaps by this method in our case against the Congress leaders.

63: Chief Secretary Government of Bihar to the Govt. of India (revival of disorders)

File No. 3/68/43 - Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

From
Y.A. Godbole, Esqr., C.I.E, I.C.S.,
Chief Secretary to Government,

To
The Additional Secretary to the Government of India,
Home Department, New Delhi.
RANCHI, 1st August 1943.

Sir,

I am directed to reply to your Express letter No. 3/68/43 - Poll (I) of the 24th July 1943¹ on the subject of action in the event of revival of serious disorders.

2. The Provincial Government agree that such plans for the revival of disorder as have come to notice have mainly emanated from the Congress Socialist Party, the public support for which does not appear to be much or increasing. The chances of organised trouble on a large scale are not very great. Any disorders that may occur will probably be sporadic and, though their number might be large, they are unlikely to be so widespread as in 1942. The Provincial Government also agree that action to be taken against those responsible for the disorder should as far as possible, take the form of prosecution for substantive offences, the use of Defence of India Rule 26 being restricted to the detention of persons who commit no over act themselves but are known to be organizing or inciting others to do so. The Provincial Government further agree that now that the use of the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance in the manner originally contemplated is denied to them the wisest course, in order to prevent disorder taking the serious form that it took in 1942, would be not to delay the proclamation of Martial law too long.

3. I am to enclose for your information copies of certain letters² issued by the Provincial Government and the Inspector General of Police to local officers containing their instructions on the measures to be taken to prevent revival of trouble and the action which would be appropriate in dealing with it if it breaks out. This Government have made such police dispositions as they consider necessary and the General Officer Commanding, 101 Lines of Communication Area have arranged at their instance to strengthen the number of troops available and to distribute them beforehand in those areas where the likelihood of trouble is the greatest. Instructions have issued to the armed forces (police and military) to move about and show themselves in the districts. Local officers have been asked to keep a watch on persons concerned in the disturbances of 1942 who have recently come out or are still coming out of jail and to look out for old absconders in particular the members of the Congress Socialist Party. Action is being taken under Defence of India Rule 26 against persons whose being at large might be a source of trouble. In this category have to be included a number of persons convicted or on trial in Special Criminal Courts whom District Judges and the High Court are freely releasing on bail. District Officers have been told to see that village patrols are properly organised and functioning as quickly as possible along the main lines of communication; and pending the Governor-General's approval of the Village Responsibility Act, which this Government have framed, a Notification has been issued empowering District Officers under Defence of India Rule 593 to appoint special constables for the guarding of these communications where villagers are not volunteering for patrol duty in sufficient numbers. The Provincial Railway Protection Police are in position on important railway lines. Arrangements have also been made to provide adequate motor transport in the districts for the quick movement of police and troops by land and by river. The Provincial Government also propose to take an early opportunity to discuss with the Army Command, as suggested in your letter, the possibility of Martial law being required in particular areas and the arrangements that would be necessary to put it into effect. These arrangements have already been settled in outline when action in the event of enemy invasion was considered last year and our local officers are acquainted with that scheme. Government, in consultation with the General Officer Commanding, 101 Lines of Communication Area, will examine what changes, if any, are necessary in those arrangements and further instructions will be issued to local officers if required.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

For Chief Secretary to Government

The Government of Bengal agree that there is no reason to anticipate any organised and widespread trouble in Bengal principally owing to their determined and sustained attack on all terrorist groups. . . .

2. The difficulty of taking preventive action in the present circumstances is accentuated by the fact that Defence Rule 26 is not available to the Government of Bengal and Regulation III of 1818 cannot be expediently used in many cases. The Provincial Government are consequently driven to rely, for the time being, upon the use by their police officers of Defence Rule 129 and an extension by them of the period of detention under that Rule until powers under, or analogous to those under, Defence Rule 26 are restored to them. They would, however, feel considerable reluctance to resort to this procedure in any considerable number of cases, and they consequently hope that, at a very early date, the Government of India will reach a decision upon the proposal which has been put before them by the Provincial Government for the enactment of legislation applicable to Bengal, such as is referred to in paragraph 3 of the letter dated the 24th July.

Subject: Proposed detention under Defence of India Rule 26 (1) (b) of Jasoda Kumar Das Sarma alias Das Gupta, son of Surendra Kumar.

Particulars are enclosed¹ in a closed cover of Jasoda Kumar Das Sarma @ Das Gupta, son of Surendra Kumar. This individual is in detention in Bengal under Defence Rule 129. The maximum period of his detention will expire on the 26th August, 1943. There is no information upon which he can be prosecuted in court, but this Government would have directed his continued detention under Defence Rule 26 (1) (b) if it had been possible to use the powers conferred by that Rule in Bengal. The undersigned is directed to enquire whether the Government of India would be prepared to issue orders for his detention under Defence Rule 26. If so, it is requested that an early intimation may be given to this Government and arrangements will then be made to transfer him to Delhi. It is suggested that the transfer be postponed so that he may reach Delhi on the 24th August, 1943. This suggestion is made in order that his transfer may be avoided should the Government of Bengal before that date find itself in a position to exercise powers under, or analogous with those under, Defence Rule 26.

Government of India

Express Letter

From

To
To All Provincial Governments and Chief Commissioners (except Panth Piploda).

No. 346/43 – Poll (I)

New Delhi, the 10th August 1943

Subject Interviews between security prisoners and their legal advisers and the production of security prisoners in Court.

We have recently had under examination the conditions under which security prisoners should be allowed interviews with their legal advisers and the connected question of how applications for the production of these prisoners before the High Court should be dealt with.

2. We consider that the general principles laid down in paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Defence Department letter No. 5-DC (6)/43 dated March 2nd 1943,¹ regarding interviews between security prisoners and their legal advisers hold good. It should be noted that the practice in England is that visits by counsel or solicitors in connection with a detained person's affairs will be allowed at all reasonable times'. It is in our view important, however, that the condition under which these interviews should be held should be clearly laid down. Enclosed therefore is a copy of a sub-paragraph that we propose to add to the Central Government Security Prisoners Order, 1942, specifying the condition on which security prisoners may be granted interviews with their legal advisers, and laying down the manner in which such interviews shall be conducted. We would suggest that you should urgently consider making a similar addition to your Provincial Security Prisoners Rules and we should be glad to receive the text of any such addition as you may propose to make.

3. There will be many cases in which, for security reasons, it would be desirable to avoid the production of a security prisoner on the order of the High Court. We have examined various suggested methods, including the proposals put forward by Provincial Governments in reply to the Defence Department letter of 2nd March referred to above, for preventing the production of security prisoners in Court, or for ensuring that Government should be given opportunity to argue against their production before final orders are passed by the High Court. The following are the principal suggestions examined:

(a) Publication of a fresh rule 26A in terms of the draft enclosed with Defence Department letter of 2nd March, prohibiting the production of security prisoners in Court except for the purpose of answering a charge of an offence.

The general sense of Provincial Governments' replies was not in favour of introducing the proposed new rule; doubts were expressed both as to its necessity and its effectiveness; and the further objection was raised that publication of the rule would draw attention to the existence of a loophole of which the public were not as a whole aware. Apart from this, further examination revealed that the rule would not succeed in securing the object in view, since it would still be open to a High Court to contend that the order of detention was not made in good faith, and that the prisoner concerned was not, therefore, detained in pursuance of an order made under Defence Rule 26 (1) (b), in which case the provisions of the proposed rule 26A would not apply.

(b) That sub-section (3) of section 491 of the Criminal Procedure Code, excluding from the application of sub-sections (1) and (2) of that section persons detained under certain special Regulations and Acts, should be enlarged to include persons detained under Defence Rule 26.

Here again, it was found on examination that, notwithstanding such inclusion, the High Court could, by raising the question of good faith, order the production of a security prisoner before it. Further, such a provision would overlap section 16 (1) of the Defence of India Act.

(c) That provision should be made, possibly by the addition of a suitable new sub-section to section 16 of the Defence of India Act, for the Crown to be heard in each case, before the High Court passed an order for the production of security prisoner.

A possible objection to this course was that it tended to place the High court in the role of cross-examining counsel for the security prisoner. It was further noted that in such cases as had so far occurred the High Court concerned had shown no disposition to deny the Crown opportunity to argue against the prisoner's production, before passing orders in the case.

4. After examining the alternatives outlined in the preceding paragraph, we have come to the conclusion that there is no way open to us of effectively questioning the authority of the High Court to order the production of a security prisoner before it. We are of the opinion, however, that every effort should be made to secure:

(a) That the Court gives an opportunity to Government to argue the case against the production of the security prisoner before final orders are passed by the High Court; and

(b) That, in the event of the prisoner being produced before the Court, the Court's consent is in all proper cases obtained to the holding of the proceedings in camera and to the exclusion of the prisoner from unauthorized contact with members of the public.

As stated in the preceding paragraph, we have not so far observed any disposition on the part of the Courts to deny to Government the opportunity sought at (a) above. Should such a disposition subsequently become evident, however, we should be willing to consider making the necessary provision in section 16 of the Defence of India Act, on the lines indicated in the preceding paragraph; and we should be glad if you would let us know immediately, should you at any time consider such a provision necessary.

Sub-paragraph (11) of Paragraph 11.

(11) In addition to the interviews permissible under the preceding provisions of this paragraph, a security prisoner may, with the permission of the authority under whose orders the security prisoner is detained, interview his legal adviser in connection with a pending or contemplated legal proceeding to which the security prisoner is or will be a party. Not more than one such interview shall ordinarily be allowed in connection with a contemplated legal proceeding before the proceeding is instituted. All such interviews shall take place on the premises in which the security prisoner is confined, and shall be subject to such conditions and restrictions as the Superintendent may consider necessary to ensure security and prevent the passing of unauthorized communications unconnected with the case relating to which the interview is granted.

71. In regarding R. Subbarayan — Prisoner [Leach C.J., King and Lakshmana Rao J.J. Full Bench (10 August 1943)]

AIR, Vol. 30, 1943, Madras, pp. 602-8

Criminal Misc. Petn. No. 310 of 1943, Decided 10th August 1943, for issue of a writ of certiorari.

T.R. Venkatarama Satriar for M.S. Venkatarama Aiyer-for Petitioner

Advocate-General for the Crown

Leach C.J. — This is an application for the issue of a writ of certiorari for the quashing of the proceedings in Ordinance Case No. 1 of 1943 on the file of the Special Judge, Chingleput. The application involves the decision of the question whether sub-section (1) of S.3 of the Special Criminal Courts (Repeal) Ordinance, 1943 (Ordinance 19 of 1943), embodies a valid provision of law. The petitioner and seven other persons were charged with having conspired to blow up the Uppanar Railway bridge near Shiyali and with having attempted to destroy the bridge. After their arrest, the accused persons were brought before the stationary Sub-Magistrate of Shiyali, who transferred the case to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Mayavaram. Under the provisions of the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 1942 (Ordinance 2 of 1942), the Sessions Judge of Negapatam was appointed by the Government of Madras the Special Judge to try the case. Subsequently, the Government of Madras transferred it to the file of the Special Judge for the Presidency Town of Madras. The Special Judge is the Sessions Judge of the Chingleput division. On 28th April 1943, by which date the trial had been almost concluded, the petitioner filed the present application. It came before the Court on 29th April, the day before the Court rose for the summer vacation. At the request of counsel for the petitioner the hearing was adjourned until 14th July. On 14th July the hearing was adjourned until 2nd August, again at the request of counsel for the petitioner. The further adjournment was asked for because counsel wished to obtain copies of judgments delivered by the Calcutta High Court on 12th July in a similar case.¹ The judgments of the Calcutta High Court have not yet been published, but by the courtesy of the learned Chief Justice of that Court copies have been supplied for use in this case. After the decision of the *Calcutta High Court*² the same question was raised in a case before the Patna High Court and the learned Chief Justice of that Court has likewise kindly supplied copies for use here.

On 4th June 1943 in A.I.R. 1943 F.C. 36, the Federal Court, by a majority, held that Ss.5, 10 and 16 of ordinance 2 of 1942 were invalid.³ This meant that the proceedings against the petitioner and his co-accused before the Special Judge were unlawful. When the case was before this Court on 29th April a stay of the trial was refused. Consequently the Special Judge continued the hearing and on 11th May he delivered his judgment. He sentenced the petitioner under one charge to undergo rigorous imprisonment for five years and to pay a fine of Rs 1000, with rigorous imprisonment for one year in default; and under another charge he sentenced him to undergo rigorous imprisonment for five years, the sentences to run concurrently. On 5th June, the day after the Federal Court had decided that Ss.5, 10 and 16 of Ordinance 2 of 1942 were invalid, the Governor-General promulgated Ordinance 19 of 1943. It repeals Ordinance 2 of 1942, but sub-section (1) of S.3 purports to validate subject to rights of appeal and powers of revision conferred by sub section (2), sentences already passed by Special Courts constituted under the earlier Ordinance. The petitioner denies that sub-section (1) has made the sentences valid. He maintains that the Governor-General had no power to enact this sub-section. Section 3 of Ordinance 2 of 1942 provided that Courts of Criminal jurisdiction might be constituted under the Ordinance of the following classes, namely, (1) Special Judges; (2) Special Magistrates; and (3) summary Courts. Section 4 said that the Provincial Government might appoint to be a special Judge for such area as it might think fit any person who had acted for a period of not less than two years as a Sessions Judge or an Assistant Sessions Judge under the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898. Section 5 stated that a Special Judge should try such offences or classes of offences or such cases or classes of cases as the Provincial Government or a servant of the Crown empowered by the Provincial government in that behalf, might by general or special order in writing, direct. Section 10 contained a similar provision with regard to cases to be tried before a Special Magistrate. Section 16 said that a Summary Court should have power to try such offences or classes of offences, or such cases or classes of cases as the District Magistrate, or in a Presidency Town the Chief Presidency Magistrate, or a servant of the Crown authorized in that behalf by the District Magistrate or Chief Presidency Magistrate might direct. Ordinance 61 of 1942, inserted into Ordinance 2 of 1942, S.25A (1) which provided that the Sessions Judge of the Sessions division within which was situated the area for which a Special Judge had been appointed might, at any stage of the proceedings, transfer a case before him to another Special Judge within the Sessions division. Sub-section (2) gave a similar power to the District Magistrate to transfer a case from one Special Magistrate's Court to the Court of another Special Magistrate. Ordinance 19 of 1943 consists of five sections. The first section gives its short title and states that it shall come into force at once. Section 2 repeals in its entirety Ordinance 2 of 1942. Section 3 reads as follows:

'Confirmation and continuance, subject to appeal, of sentences — (1) Any sentence passed by a Special Judge a Special Magistrate or a Summary Court in exercise of jurisdiction conferred or purporting to have been conferred by or under the said Ordinance shall have effect, and subject to the succeeding provisions of section, shall continue to have effect, as if the trial at this which it was passed had been held in accordance with the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 (5 of 1898) by a Sessions Judge, an Assistant Sessions Judge or a Magistrate of the first class respectively, exercising competent jurisdiction under the said code.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law, any such sentence as is referred to in sub-section (1) shall, whether or not the proceedings in which the sentence was passed were submitted for review under S.8, and whether or not the sentence was the subject of an appeal under S.13 or S.19 of the said Ordinance, be subject to such rights of appeal as would have accrued, and to such powers of revision as would have been exercisable under the said Code if the sentence had at a trial so held been passed on the date of the commencement of this Ordinance.

(3) Where any such sentence as aforesaid has been altered in course of review or on appeal under the said Ordinance the sentence as so altered shall for the purposes of this section be deemed to have been passed by the Court which passed the original sentence.

Section 4 deals with the disposal of pending cases. It says that when the trial of a case, pending before a Court constituted under Ordinance 2 of 1942 has not been concluded before the date of commencement of Ordinance 19 of 1943, the proceedings shall be void and the case shall be deemed to be transferred, in a Presidency town to the Chief Presidency Magistrate, or else where, to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, who may either inquire into or try the case himself, or transfer the case for inquiry or trial to any Magistrate subordinate to him, in accordance with the Code of Criminal Procedure. Section 5 provides for an indemnity. It says that no suit, prosecution or other legal proceedings shall lie against a servant of the Crown for or on account of or in respect of a sentence passed by him under the repealed Ordinance or in carrying out a sentence passed by a Court in exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by that Ordinance.

It will now be convenient to refer to the decision of the Federal court in A.I.R. 1943 F.C.36. Varadachariar J. who was officiating as the Chief Justice of the Federal Court and Zafrulla Khan J. were of the opinion that Ss.5, 10 and 16 of Ordinance 2 of 1942 were ultra vires the Governor-General as the legislative authority. Rowland J. disagreed with this opinion. It is not necessary for the purpose of deciding the present case to discuss the dissenting opinion. The majority opinion of course, prevails, and as we have already pointed out, the decision was immediately followed by the repeal of the Ordinance. The power of the Governor-General to legislate by Ordinance and to provide for Special Courts of the nature of those contemplated by the Ordinance was not disputed, but the learned Officiating

Chief Justice and Zafrulla Khan J. were of the opinion that it had not effected its purposes because the Ordinance had not repealed Ss.28 and 29, Criminal P.C. They also held that the Governor-General had no power to leave to executive officers an absolute and unrestricted discretion without legislative provision or direction laying down the policy or conditions with regard to classes of cases to be decided by the Special Courts. In this connection the learned Officiating Chief Justice said:

In the present case, it is impossible to deny that the ordinance making authority has wholly evaded the responsibility of laying down any rules or conditions or even enunciating the policy with reference to which cases are to be assigned to the ordinary Criminal Courts and to the Special Courts respectively and left the whole matter to the unguided and uncontrolled action of the executive authorities. This is not a criticism of the policy of the law - as counsel for the Crown would make it appear - but complaint that the law has laid down no policy or principle to guide and control the exercise of the undefined powers entrusted to the executive authorities by Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance.

Mr T.R. Venkatarama Sastriar, on behalf of the petitioner, has contended that it follows from this decision that the Governor-General had no power to enact sub-section (1) of S.3 of Ordinance 19 of 1943. In order to decide the validity of this sub-section, the Court must examine the legislative powers which have been conferred upon the Governor-General by the Government of India Act, 1935. Schedule 9 to the Government of India Act, 1935, contains the provisions of the Government of India Act which are to continue in force with amendments until the establishment of the Federation. Section 72 of this Schedule, as it originally stood, stated that the Governor-General might in cases of emergency, make and promulgate Ordinances for the peace and good Government of British India or any part thereof, and an Ordinance so made shall for the space of not more than six months from its promulgation, have the like force of law as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature. By 3 and 4 George VI, Ch. 58, the time limit of six months was deleted. Section 102, Government of India Act, 1935, gives power to the Federal Legislature to make laws for a Province, or any part thereof, with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the Provincial Legislative List if a state of grave emergency is proclaimed. By a notification, dated 3rd September 1939 and issued by the Governor-General under S.102 of the Act it was declared that a grave emergency existed, and the Governor-General has now the power by Ordinance to legislate on all matters referred to in the Federal, Provincial and Concurrent Legislative Lists, which are set out in Sch.7 to the Act. The relevant entries in these lists are as follows:

Federal Legislative List — Entry No. 42: Offences against laws with respect to any of the matters in this list.

Provincial Legislative List — Entry No. 1: Public order (but not including the use of His Majesty's naval, military or air forces in aid of the civil Power); the administration of justice; constitution and organisation of all courts, except the Federal Court, and fees taken therein; preventive detention for reasons connected with the maintenance of public order; persons subject to such detention.

Entry No 2: — Jurisdiction and powers of all Courts except the Federal court, with respect to any of the matters in this list; procedure in Rent and Revenue Courts.

Concurrent Legislative List — Entry No. 1: — Criminal law, including all matters included in the Indian Penal Code at the passing of this Act, but excluding offences against laws with respect to any of the matters specified in List 1 or List 2 and excluding the use of His Majesty's naval, Military and air forces in aid of the Civil power.

Entry No. 2: – Criminal Procedure, including all matters included in the code of Criminal Procedure at the date of the passing of this Act.

It will be observed that the Governor-General can now by Ordinance legislate on all matters relating to Criminal law and procedure. The Calcutta case to which reference has been made is Misc. Case No. 65 of 1943. The Bench consisted of Derbyshire C.J. and Khundkar and Sen J.J. Derbyshire C.J. and Khundkar J. did not hold S.3 of Ordinance 19 of 1943 to be beyond the legislative powers of the Governor-General but they gave it an interpretation which seems to us, with great respect, to be inconsistent with its wording. Derbyshire C.J. considered that the effect of S.3 was that sentences already passed should continue to have effect as if they had been validly passed until they could be dealt with in appeal or reviewed under the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure. He held that it was the duty of the proper Court which had appellate or revisional jurisdiction in the areas in which the sentences were passed to have those convictions brought up before it and quashed and, further, to direct that the persons concerned should be dealt with according to law in the ordinary Courts according to the ordinary process of law, with the exception that where the sentence passed by a Special Court had been substantially served the Court should direct that no further proceedings be taken. He pointed to S.268, Criminal P.C., which directs that all trials before a Court of Session shall be either by jury or with the aid of assessors and said that if the Crown's contention was right, there must be a National jury and a National body of assessors. Where the trial is by jury an appeal lies only on a matter of law and therefore, in his opinion, a person tried by a National jury only got an illusory right of appeal. Khundkar J. substantially agreed.

Sen J. did not think that it was necessary to decide what interpretation should be placed on S.3 because in his opinion the section was ultra vires. He considered that as the Federal court had held that Governor-General, as a Legislature had no power to confer jurisdiction on the Special courts in the manner in which he had tried to confer it, it was not open to him as a subordinate or non-sovereign Legislature to enact either directly or indirectly that jurisdiction was good. In this connection he referred to certain Canadian cases decided by the Privy Council where it was held that a Provincial Legislature could not do indirectly what it could not do directly. In the course of his argument the learned Advocate-General, who appeared on behalf of the Crown, said that Sen J. had not kept distinct the absence of power from the question whether power which existed had been properly exercised. We think that this criticism is justified.

The judgment of the Patna High Court was delivered on 20th July 1943 by Brough J. who said that he found S.3 perfectly clear and but for the argument which had been addressed to them and the decision of the Calcutta High Court he would have contented himself with saying that it meant what it says. The Federal Court had not decided that it was ultra vires to set up Special Courts and give them jurisdiction. It was the method of giving them jurisdiction which was ultra vires. He could see no reason, therefore, why the Legislature could not ratify invalid acts if it could avoid the error of method. The legislative authority had in this case applied its own mind to the cases covered by the new Ordinance and these cases were ascertainable. He held that the new Ordinance could not be declared to be invalid by reason of the decision of the Federal Court on the old one and that the ratification was effective. In the first place Mr T.R. Venkatarama Sastriar asked us to accept the opinion expressed by Sen J., and in the alternative to accept the interpretation which Derbyshire C.J. placed on S.3. We find ourselves unable to take either of these courses.

It is not correct to describe the Governor-General as being a subordinate or non-sovereign Legislature in this connection. He has all the powers which the Federal Legislature would have had if federation had been adopted and he has all the powers of a Provincial Legislature. It is true that Parliament has power to amend the Government of India Act, 1935, but while it stands as at present the Governor-General constitutes a sovereign Legislature with regard to the matters referred to in the three legislative lists, and as we have seen, full power has been given to the Governor-General to legislate without restriction in matters of criminal law and of the procedure to be adopted in trying Criminal cases. The Federal Court acknowledged that the Governor-General had the power to appoint Special Courts of the nature of those mentioned in Ordinance 2 of 1942 and the Ordinance was held to be invalid only because the precaution of repealing certain sections of the Criminal Procedure Code had not been taken and there were no rules governing the allocation of cases. The errors or omissions which rendered Ordinance 2 of 1942 invalid, cannot, in our opinion, restrict the Governor-General in promulgating a new Ordinance.

Section 3 (1) of the later Ordinance says that sentences which had been passed under the repealed Ordinance before its repeal shall continue to have effect as if the trials at which they were passed had been held in accordance with the Criminal Procedure Code. If the Governor-General's powers are unrestricted as we hold them to be, he must have power to make such a provision. Of course, the Governor-General has not power to do indirectly what he cannot do directly. This principle has been definitely established in the cases to which Sen J. referred, but the Governor-General in our opinion, is not attempting to do something indirectly which he had not power to do directly. He could, if he had thought fit, have amended Ordinance 2 of 1942 to remedy the defects which the Federal Court had pointed out, and we think that he has full power to say that trials which were not held under a particular law shall be deemed to have been held under that law.

Mr Venkatarama Sastriar has agreed that the question to be decided, put shortly, is whether the Governor-General has power to declare by Ordinance that sentences passed by Special Courts should be deemed to have been passed in trials properly held under the Criminal Procedure Code and the short answer which he has given to this question is that the Governor-General has not the power because the cases which gave rise to the sentence were placed before the Special Courts by officials to whom there had been no proper delegation of power in this behalf. We cannot accept this as a sound reason for declaring the later Ordinance to be invalid. As we have already indicated the fact that there was a defect in the earlier Ordinance cannot lessen the very wide powers which the Governor-General possesses when he decides to legislate further. The powers only arise when a grave emergency exists but the Governor-General alone can decide whether an emergency has arisen and a declaration by him to this effect cannot be questioned; see 12 Lah. 280.

The judgment of Lord Halsbury in 1907 A.C. 93 seems to us to have direct bearing on the question now under discussion. There the petitioner was indicated for the crimes of sedition and public violence before a Court martial after a declaration of martial law. He wished to appeal to the Privy Council against his conviction and the sentence which had been passed against him. His objections to the trial were he was not a Military man, he had not been taken in the field, he had never taken up arms against the Government, the state of the country was not such as to justify his being tried before a Court martial and the Civil Courts before whom he had a right to be tried had in no way been interrupted in their functions and were then sitting. The Natal Parliament passed an Indemnity Act, S.6 of which said:

All sentences passed by any Courts martial or by any Court or person administering martial law under the authority of the Governor or the commandant of militia in Natal, or by any military officer purporting to exercise authority in that behalf, since the date of the aforesaid proclamation of 9th February 1906, including fines and other punishments inflicted by military officers in the field, are hereby confirmed and made and declared to be lawful, and in so far as the same shall not have been already carried into effect, shall be deemed to be final sentences passed by duly and legally constituted Courts of this colony, and no appeal shall lie in respect of same, but they shall be and remain in force and shall be carried out in the same manner as the sentences of the Courts of law in this colony.

Leave to appeal was refused and in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council Lord Halsbury said:

It is by this time a very familiar observation that what is called 'martial law' is no law at all. The notion that 'martial law' exists by reason of the proclamation – an expression which the learned counsel has more than once used – is an entire delusion. The right to administer force against force in actual war does not depend upon the proclamation of martial law at all. It depends upon the question whether there is war or not. If there is war there is the right to repel force, but it is found convenient and decorous, from time to time, to authorize what are called 'Courts' to administer punishments, and to restrain by acts of repression the violence that is committed in time of war, instead of leaving such punishment and repression to the casual action of persons acting without sufficient consultation, or without sufficient order or regularity in the procedure in which things alleged to have been done are proved. But to attempt to make these proceedings of so-called 'Courts martial' administering summary justice under the supervision of a military commander, analogous to the regular proceedings of Courts of justice is quite illusory.

Later on, in his judgment, Lord Halsbury observed:

An Act of Parliament has been passed in Natal which in terms enacts the legality of the sentences in question, and provides that they shall be deemed to be sentences passed in the regular and ordinary course of Criminal jurisdiction. This board has no power to review these sentences, or to inquire into the propriety or impropriety of passing such an Act of Parliament. The only thing for persons who are subject to such an Act of Parliament to do is to obey. The question in this case arises under the Natal Act of Parliament in respect of offences committed in Natal, which Act has been assented to by the Governor and, having the force of law, is binding on their Lordships. The language of the Act appears to their Lordships to be subject to no question of doubt or ambiguity at all.

The Special Courts set up by Ordinance 2 of 1942 were no Courts at all, as they had not been validly constituted. They had no more legality than the Courts martial to which Lord Halsbury referred. If the Natal government had power to pass an Act validating sentences imposed by Courts which had no legal existence, then the Governor-General has the power, and the Privy Council held that the Natal Parliament had the power. There is a Madras Act which may be aptly referred to here. It is the East and West Tanjore Sessions Divisions (Validation) Act, 1931, which was passed in order to legalize trials and sentences which it was feared had been held and passed without jurisdiction. Section 3 of this Act reads as follows:

Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1) of S.7, Criminal P.C., 1898, the Sessions division of East Tanjore and the Sessions division of West Tanjore in the revenue district of Tanjore and the Courts of Session established for each one of the said Sessions divisions, shall be deemed to have been and to be validly constituted and no proceeding of the Courts of Session of the said Sessions shall be questioned merely on the ground that the limits of neither of the said Sessions divisions were or are conterminous with the limits of a district.

It has not been suggested that the Madras Legislature had no power to pass this Act. Is not the present position analogous? Derbyshire C.J. considered that there was much room for criticism of S.3 of Ordinance 19 of 1943, because the Governor-General had not adopted the language to be found in the Decrees and Orders Validating Act, 1936 (Act 5 of 1937), but the fact that the section does not speak specifically of validation is, in our judgment, no reason for not giving effect to the words used. We are also unable to share the opinion that the provision with regard to appeals is illusory. In this case the Court is not called upon to decide what are the full powers conferred by sub-section (2) on appellate and revisional Courts. The Court is merely concerned with whether the Governor-General had the power to declare that sentences passed by Special Courts shall be deemed to have been passed in trials held under the Criminal Procedure Code. But supposing that a case tried by a Special Court would have been tried with a jury, if the Criminal Procedure Code had applied, and that the appellate Court functioning under sub-section (2) of S.3 of Ordinance 29 of 1943 has no right to inquire into the finding of fact, beyond ascertaining whether there is evidence to support it, the appeal would not necessarily be illusory. It would still lie on a question of law. It may be that the intention of the ordinance making authority was to allow an appeal on the facts in such cases. We express no opinion on this question, but all doubt will be removed and much judicial time would be saved if an Ordinance would be promulgated clarifying the position in this respect. For the reasons given we hold that sub. S(1) of S.3 is not invalid and that the section means what it says. The result is that application for the issue of writ of certiorari is dismissed and the petitioner is left to an appeal under S.3 (2). A certificate will issue under S.205, Government of India Act, 1935. C.R.K./R.K.

Application Dismissed.

Subject: Proposed detention under Defence of India Rule 26 (1) (b) of Kishori Lal Datta¹ son of Sarat Kumar.

Particulars are enclosed in a sealed cover of Kishori Lal Datta son of Sarat Kumar. This individual is in detention in Bengal under Defence Rule 129. The maximum period of his detention will expire on the 15th August 1943. There is no information upon which he can be presented in Court, but this Government would have directed his continued detention under Defence Rule 26 (1) (b) if it had been possible to use the powers conferred by that Rule in Bengal. The undersigned is directed to request the Government of India to issue orders for his detention under Defence Rule 26 and to express regret for this very short notice given. In anticipation of such orders and of the consent of the Chief Commissioner, Delhi, he is being transferred to Delhi in order that he may be outside the jurisdiction of the High Court before his detention under rule 129 expires.

73: Official Notings (regarding interrogation) (extracts) (13.8.43 to 27.8.1943)

File No. 44/2/43 – Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

In the course of conversation on this subject¹ on August 7th, Additional Secretary said that although he did not consider that a second approach to Provincial Governments would produce any more satisfactory results, he would like to try again by writing demi-officially to Chief Secretaries in order to arouse their personal interest in the matter and so influence provincial Special Branches to take up interrogation work seriously and on more scientific lines than are at present followed in most provinces.

To give some idea of the methods of interrogation which have proved successful in the past, I attach a brief note² which might be used as an enclosure to Additional Secretary's letter. What is required, I think, is that Provinces who have no staff specially ear-marked for important interrogations should select two or three men of the right type and possessed of the necessary intelligence qualifications and employ them as necessary for carrying out special interrogations of selected individuals when occasion arises. It is not suggested that these men should be set apart solely for this work, as that would more often than not probably mean their sitting idle for considerable periods; there is every advantage in their being engaged in normal intelligence duties, provided that when occasion arises their services can be diverted for the purpose we have in mind. I might add also that although the attached note deals with interrogation from the point of the assistance it can give to prevention and detection of political crime, the general principles apply with equal force to scientific interrogation as an aid in ordinary crime work. The advantages of police over jail custody during interrogation has been referred to in H.D.'s earlier letter, but might perhaps be mentioned again.

N.B. U/O No. 12/79/42, dated, 14th August 1943.

I had intended to link the draft with the letter which it is proposed to issue to Provinces about conditions of detention under Defence Rule 129. The draft letter to Chief Commissioners on the latter subject is under submission but has not yet been approved and I do not wish to delay this file any longer. I therefore put up a separate draft¹ in which I have referred to the fact that we are about to address provinces on the connected subject of conditions of detention under the rule.

2. I should like to offer in the draft to help Provinces in training their interrogators, if there were any prospect of being able to fulfill this offer.

D.I.B. should see as proposed. I am not sure whether this need go to all Provinces. Indeed it might be better to send it only to those in the first instance where the need is greatest and which D.I.B. may be able to visit in the fairly near future. We should be glad of advice on this point.

Offers of assistance in training or possibly offers to take on a few selected individuals from provinces for interrogation by an existing trained staff (to show what might be done) could I think better be conveyed by word of mouth

I have consulted the Bureau. Deputy Directors who are most interested in this matter and I agree with their views that it would be better to go to all Provinces. I doubt if D.I.B. will be able to go on tour in the near future. At any rate if all are addressed those who agree may constitute a majority, a fact which might influence in the end.

The Punjab would be most suitable training place. If H.M. would like me to do so I will sound the Punjab C.I.D. as to whether they would be prepared to undertake anything in the required lines I do not think we could make any offer to other Provinces by word of mouth or otherwise without the Punjabi agreement.

74: Official Notings on the desirability of Advisory Committees (17.8.1943 to 18.8.1943) (extracts)

File No. 44/57/43 - Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

(Omitted: Opening para of Tottenham's observation on Sir Harold Derbyshire's remarks.)

I do not think we should flirt for a moment with the idea of advisory committees which I should say were quite unsuitable for the conditions in the country.

17.8.43.

I agree that the observations of the High Court¹ which are under discussion do not relate to any judicial issue coming before them and that as an expression of opinion they have no binding force. At the same time it must be recognised that comments of this character coming from a high judicial authority have considerable effect on the public mind and if reported to Parliament would no doubt evoke considerable comment there. They must, therefore, be considered with the respect they deserve.

2. I also agree that for the reasons given in the Law Member's note of the 7th October 1932 in F. 31/10/32 – Poll the High Court have misconstrued the meaning and effect of the preamble of Regulation III. The operative part of that Regulation, so far as it concerns the point at issue, is section 5 which reads.

The officer in whose custody any State prisoner may be placed is to forward, with such observations as may appear necessary, every representation which such State prisoner may from time to time be desirous of submitting to the Government.

While, however, the preamble has no independent operation, it is part of the statute and it must be supposed to throw light on the manner and spirit in which the operative clause is to be used. The relevant portion of the preamble runs as follows:

And whereas the ends of justice require that, when it may be determined that any person shall be placed under personal restraint, otherwise than in pursuance of some judicial proceeding, the grounds of such determination should from time to time come under revision, and the person affected thereby should at all times be allowed freely to bring to the notice of the Government all circumstances relating either to the supposed grounds of such determination, or to the manner in which it may be executed.

It must naturally, therefore, be supposed that it is the intention of Regulation III that the cases of persons placed under restraint under that Regulation should be revised from time to time in the light to representations made by them. The High Court have wrongly taken this preamble to mean that the actual grounds of detention would be furnished to the state prisoner. But although, as pointed out by the Law Member, this reading is wrong and although, as often pointed out in other notes, any obligation to furnish precise information to the prisoner would be embarrassing, the High Court have also been able to point to the provisions of Regulation 18B of Great Britain in which clause (5) specifically places the duty on the Chairman of the Advisory Committee to inform the objection of the grounds on which the order has been made against him and to furnish him with such particulars as are in the opinion of the chairman sufficient to enable him to present his case. It must be supposed that in England also some of the grounds of the order might be based on secret information comparable to what is used in India: but nevertheless it has not been considered impossible by Parliament to enjoin the communication to the person affected of such particulars as will enable him to represent his case. We are, therefore, not on strong ground in regarding the communication of sufficient particulars as an insuperable obstacle

3. While it must be conceded that there are times, such as the period following the rebellion of August 1942, when Provincial Govts and executive officers have their hands too full to follow a procedure which in England was intended only for very occasional cases, such periods of emergency are not likely to be of indefinite duration and when circumstances permit we may be regarded as under some obligation to follow a procedure more in accordance with the principle enjoined by Parliament. I have for some time felt that the provisions of rule 26 in so far as they relate to detention are defective in several respects, i.e.

- (1) The detention once ordered is of indefinite duration;
- (2) No provision is made for periodical review of cases and
- (3) No explicit provision is made giving the security prisoner a right to be heard on his own behalf or to be informed of the reasons for his detention.

In the latter respect Addl. Secy. has pointed out that there is nothing to prevent a security prisoner from making a representation at any time; but we may, I think, feel considerable doubt as to whether these representations are always forwarded to the Provincial Government itself or whether, if they are so forwarded, they receive very full attention in the absence of a definite requirement to that effect.

4. In regard to the 1st and 2nd points, I am inclined to think that rule 26 should have contained a clause to the following effect:-

No order of detention passed under this rule shall continue in force for more than 6 months, provided that the Provincial Government after further consideration of all the circumstances of the case including any representation that the detained person desires to make, may extend the period of detention for periods not exceeding 6 months at a time.

If such a clause were inserted it might possibly meet all the requirements of the case. But in order to conform more nearly to the principles observed in England and to the observations of the Calcutta High Court certain other clauses might possibly be added on the following lines

As soon as may be after an order of detention has been passed the Provincial Government shall inform the person detained of the grounds on which the order has been made against him and shall furnish him with such particulars as are in the opinion of the Government sufficient to enable him to present his case.

And a further provision

It shall be the duty of the Provincial Government to secure that any person detained under this rule shall be afforded the earliest practicable opportunity of making to the Provincial Government representations in writing with respect to his detention and shall be informed of his right to do so.

5 None of these suggested provisions contemplates the constitution of advisory committees, such as exist in England, and I agree with Additional Secretary that such committees would not be possible in the circumstances of this country; but at the same time they would put the obligations in a binding form and would satisfy the public both here and at home that the elementary rights of persons arrested without trial were observed. I am aware that there is a tendency among Provincial Governments, to regard as a sign of weakness any attempt to limit their absolute freedom to detain a person indefinitely under 26 or to allow a prisoner to have any say in the matter. As I had occasion to point out before, however, when the review of cases of security prisoners was under consideration, provisions which are inherently in accordance with the public conscience and with the practice observed in England do not weaken, but rather strengthen our position in holding persons in detention without trial. I would not contemplate any relaxation whatever in our policy of detaining persons whose activities, if they were at liberty, would in our judgment be likely to interfere with the prosecution of the war. In the case of persons who are detained on good grounds the periodical renewal of orders under the 1st suggested clause and the opportunity of making representations under the other two clauses would not in practice prevent us from holding in detention anyone whose detention was really necessary. The main danger would be that we or Provincial Governments would be flooded with long-winded representations amounting to little more than political manifestos, for which some kind of publicity would be sought; but if there were no advisory committees and the transaction rested entirely between the security prisoner and the Government responsible for his detention there would be no excuse for publicity and little time need be wasted over representations which were not very material to the case. On the other hand, the opportunities of representation or review so afforded might assist in revealing cases in which some mistake had been made and would at least place the Provincial Governments on firmer grounds in prolonging detention in individual cases.

6. These suggestions should be regarded as tentative at the present stage. Additional Secretary might discuss them in the first instance with Defence and Legislative Departments and if we conclude that any of them are necessary Provincial Governments would no doubt have to be consulted before they were introduced. We are, however, responsible for the form of the Defence of India Rules and if as a matter of policy some amplification of rule 26 is necessary to meet legitimate criticism we must ourselves take the responsibility for limiting the powers conferred on Provincial Governments in this matter.

76 Subject — Statement of cases involving the validity of ordinances (dt 20.8.1943-9.9.1943)

File No. 256/43 - Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

Present Position of the Case

II Ordinance II of 1942 (Special Criminal Courts Ordinance) was declared ultra vires by the Calcutta High Court on 22-4-43 in the case of Benoiari Lal Sarma and others. The Federal Court upheld this judgement on 1-6-43, and have granted to the Govt. of Bengal, leave to appeal to the Privy Council. Steps are being taken in the Federal Court to print and transmit the record to Privy Council.

Grounds on which decision is based

The ordinance was invalid in so far as Sections 5, 10 and 16 thereof permitted persons, other than duly authorized legislatures, constituted under the Constitution Act to repeal ad hoc certain sections of the Code of Criminal Procedure and of the Letters Patent of the High Courts.

III Ordinance XIX (5-6-43) issued to repeal Special Criminal Courts Ordinance and to validate sentences already passed thereunder, has been held invalid by the Calcutta High Court on 12-7-43 in the case of Sushil Kumar Vs. Emperor.¹ This Ordinance has been subsequently held intra vires by the Patna (on 20-7-43),² Madras (3-8-43)³ and Nagpur High Courts and the Govt. of Bengal have been advised to appeal to the Federal Court against the Calcutta judgement. Bombay Govt. who anticipate a similar challenge in the Bombay High Court, have been advised to request the High Court to defer order on this point pending decision in the appeal expected to be filed in the Federal Court by Bengal Govt. Four appeals from the decisions of the Patna High Court have been filed in the Federal Court.

Grounds on which decision is based

1. Section 3(1) of the Ordinance XIX does not validate trials or convictions under the repealed Ordinance but merely purports to give to sentences passed thereunder, continuing effect until they are reviewed and dealt with in appeal under the ordinary law.

2. It is ultra vires of any Indian legislative authority to validate sentences passed at trials held in pursuance of provisions which, on relevant finding, no Indian legislative authority had power to enact.

Present position of the case

1. Ordinance XIV of 1943 (28.4.43) purporting to validate Defence of India Rule 26 (which was declared Ultra vires by the Federal Court on 22.4.43 in Talpade's case)⁴ has been held invalid by the Calcutta High court in their judgment dated 3.6.43 in the case of Shib Nath Banerji and eight others.⁵ This judgement is to come up in appeal before the Federal Court on 17.8.43, along with appeals against judgements of the Alld., Madras and Lahore High Courts, who have held the Ordinance valid.

Grounds on which decision is based

1. Section 2 of the Ordinance is invalid as the Governor General has no power to repeal or amend an Act of the Central Indian Legislature.
2. If section 2 and all section 3 which is merely pendant from section 2, must necessarily fall.
3. The detention orders in the nine cases were not proper in that the Governor was not personally satisfied that detention was necessary.

Present position of the case.

1. The appeals were heard by the Federal Court and Judgement was pronounced on 31.8.43. The appeals from the Calcutta High Court (which were preferred by the Crown) were dismissed as also the appeals from the other three High Courts (which were preferred by the detenus). Leave to appeal to the Privy Council has been granted in the cases from the Calcutta High court on application from the Bengal Government.

Grounds on which decision is based.

1. Section 3 of the Ordinance is valid and validates detention orders already passed.
2. It is not necessary to consider the validity of section 2 of the Ordinance.
3. The detention orders in the cases from the Calcutta High Court are improper because the Governor was not personally satisfied that detention was necessary.

Notes by senior officials.

2. . . . From our point of view the progress of item II before the Privy Council is most important and I am still not quite clear who is in charge of the appeal from the Government point of view.

1. Judgement was pronounced by the Federal Court in the case of Ordinance No. XIV of 1943 on 31.8.43.⁶ Four appeals have been filed in the Federal Court regarding Ordinance No. XIX of 1943.

2. With regard to item II the Agent of the Bengal Government is charge of the matter. The record is being printed and no further steps can be taken in the appeal until the record is printed and transmitted to the Privy Council.

File No. 44/57/43 – Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

Home Department.

... Sir George Spence came this afternoon but we found that Mr Ogilvie has left Delhi. Mr Wakely was ill. So no conference took place.¹ Sir George Spence told me that he had no views to express on behalf of the Legislative Department except that he thought it would be inappropriate to impose any rigid time limit on the period of detention which was either necessary or unnecessary according to the facts of the case and not according to the time that had elapsed since the order was made. Defence Dept. may be asked to record their comments on the proposals as a whole and to fix another conference. I think the former would be preferable.

Defence Department.
H.D.L. No. 44/57/43
Poll (1) dated 23.8.43.

Notes in Defence Department.

We may agree that D.I.R. 26 should be amended providing (1) periodic review of cases of a security prisoner and (2) giving such prisoner a right to be heard on his own behalf or to be informed of the reasons for his detention, on the lines as indicated in para 4 of the Hon'ble Home Member's minute of the 18th August 1943.⁴ As to the proposed provision in that rule imposing a time limit in respect of the period of detention it appears that in the majority of cases of detention the time limit may have to be extended again and again. In the result, most of the detention orders will, in effect, be of indefinite duration. For instance if 'A' is detained for a period of 6 months and on expiry of that period his case is reviewed with the result that the period of his detention is extended for another 6 months and this process of review goes on and on each review it is considered by the detaining authority that his detention is necessary with a view to preventing him from acting in a manner prejudicial to the defence of British India etc. He continues to be detained indefinitely. The proposed provision of periodical reviews however, give the detaining authority an opportunity to revise the detention order in a particular case setting the detainee at liberty if his release is not considered to be prejudicial to the efficient prosecution of the War etc and this might achieve the object desired. The intention of imposing a time limit on detention appears to be that these detention orders should be reviewed after every 6 months; if so, the object could be achieved by issuing instructions to the Provincial Governments to that effect.

(2) In the event of the Calcutta High Court's decision invalidating Ordinance No. 14 of 1943 validating D.I.R. 26 being upheld by the Federal Court, it is proposed to issue an ordinance known as 'Bartley Ordinance' making the provisions of rule 26 as substantive law to be applied to Bengal and Assam. If therefore rule 26 is to be amended as proposed in para I above it might be necessary to make such provision in the 'Bartley Ordinance'.

The issues raised in this case are:

- (1) Whether rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules should be amended so as to admit of a review of the cases of detention and the grounds of their detention?
- (2) What form this amendment should take?

2. The answer to the first issue raised above appears to be definitely in the affirmative. As regards the second the form which the amendment of the rule should take — it appears to be the intention that.

- (1) Additional provisions should be incorporated in rule 26 to make it incumbent on the appropriate Government to inform the detainee of the grounds of his detention – only so much to be communicated as would enable him to show cause why he should not further be detained, and.

- (2) As soon as thereafter as possible or as soon as the representation of the detainee has been received by the Government it shall proceed to review the case, the grounds of detention and pass such orders as it may deem fit.

3. It is presumed that the suggestion of Sir George Spence that there should be no statutory time limit on the period of detention is acceptable and so no further comments are needed on it.

4. There are certain issues which will have to be considered now that we are contemplating enlargement of the scope of rule 26 and to a certain extent liberalizing its provisions. The amendments contemplated above will certainly evoke criticism in the press; comparisons will be drawn between the provisions of the U.K. regulation and the new amendment made to D.I.R. 26. So it would be necessary to be prepared with some sort of answer should there be such insistent public criticism on the above lines.

5. One other question that arises is how far should the authorities subordinate to the provincial Governments or to the Chief Commissioner be empowered to exercise powers of detention under D.I.R. 26? I believe Home Department have asked all provincial Governments to withdraw the delegations and except for Assam all the rest have complied with the request. The issues therefore, are.

- (a) If we should not abolish concurrent power possessed by the Provincial Governments and instead delegate power to the Provisional Governments with a rider that they shall not further delegate the same except under circumstances of grave emergency. From sub-section (4) of section 2 of the Defence of India Act it appears to be open to the Central Government to specify the circumstances and conditions under which a delegated power may be exercised; or alternatively,
- (b) Whether we should issue a direction to the Provincial Governments not to delegate powers under rule 26 to subordinate authorities except under conditions similar to those laid down in Defence Regulation 18BB.

The very amendment contemplated above would necessitate the curtailment of the powers of District Magistrates and to control the unfettered exercise of discretion by them to detain persons indefinitely under rule 26. This power was conferred on them by a simple delegation which does not in any way restrict the exercise of the power. I should venture to suggest, therefore, that the Home Department should consider this aspect of the case also and say whether they prefer the alternative (a) or (b) suggested above or whether they would like to proceed on the lines of the U.K. D.R. 18BB; otherwise delegation of powers under rule 26 (if made without any qualification) may mean power to state the grounds of detention, receive representations and decide the case as if the District Magistrate himself were the Provl. Government. (I am assuming of course that in centrally administered areas the Chief Commissioners will occupy a position similar to the Provincial Governments within their jurisdictions.)

(1) I agree, with some hesitation, that we shall not limit the duration of detention order to six months or any other defined period. The obvious advantage of limitation is that it would compel the order-making authority to review each case at intervals of not more than six months and unless compulsion were applied we may suspect that some cases, at least, would not be reviewed as often as they might be. Sir George Spence's view as reported in Sir Richard Tottenham's note of 23rd August might perhaps be opposed on the ground that, when the order is made, the authority making it, acts in the light of conditions prevailing at the time, and that these may change, so that an order of indefinite duration cannot be justified. But the answer to both these points seems to me to lie in accepting the principle that every order should be reviewed as a matter of course, without any motion by the person detained, as soon as the relevant conditions change. They are more likely to change after six months in an individual case than after any other period that could be selected; while prescribing a certain period would tend to mean in practice, that a review was carried out every six months and not in between times. I think that the proper way to secure review, apart from special reviews on the application of the person detained is by executive instructions and there might be advantage in issuing instructions that every case should be reviewed at intervals of not more than six months subject to the principle suggested above being always borne in mind.

(2) I agree that, apart from reviews undertaken on the initiative of Government, provision should be made to give the person detained on clearly defined right to make representation against his detention. I also agree that such representations should be considered by Government (not by any subordinate local officer) and not by a committee though, as Mr Kaiwar points out, this divergence from the English scheme may be criticised and have to be publicly justified. The form of any justificatory statement would need careful consideration.

(3) On the question of supplying grounds, I agree that the persons detained should be furnished with such particulars as are necessary to enable him to present his case, but presume that this could be qualified by a condition that particulars which might disclose secret information or sources of information should not be furnished though they might be necessary to the presentation of case. I am not however sure whether such particulars should be furnished to a person automatically as soon as he is detained. It appears from paragraphs (4) and (5) of Defence Regulation 18B that this is not the practice in England; there the person detained makes objection to a Committee and it is not apparently till he is brought before the committee (as I presume he is) that he is informed of the grounds on which an order has been made against him. It may be possible to verify what the procedure actually is. There may be advantage in not supplying grounds till after a representation has been made, first, the person detained may disclose grounds or information which were not previously known to Government, and in any case is likely to give valuable indications of the grounds of his feelings which might not appear if he were simply attacking a case stated by Government; secondly, presenting him with a charge-sheet would make representations almost automatic. It would, however, probably be difficult to provide, or to justify a provision, to the effect that the Provincial Government if on receiving an application it considered that the applicant did not know the true grounds for his detention, should supply him with a indication of such grounds in order to enable him to try again, after having wasted valuable time. I would therefore agree that the grounds should be disclosed forthwith: this would certainly be much better from the publicity point of view.

A point that may be raised is whether a detained person should be allowed legal advice in making his objections. I do not know what the practice is in England, but prima facie I would say that as a person is detained on grounds of fact or supposed fact, not of law, there is no reason for allowing access to legal advice.

(4) Paragraph 5 of Mr Kaiwar's note raises a question which I think should certainly be considered in this connection. I have assured above that representation will in any case, by whomsoever the detention order may have been made, be made to and considered by the Provincial Government which will then in many cases at least, be forced in effect to review orders made by authorities subordinate to it. I think that a provision to the effect the orders made by subordinate authorities (who should only make orders themselves in exceptional emergencies) should have effect only for a limited period unless confirmed by the Provincial Government would be reassuring both to the Courts and to public opinion. One might anticipate that a District Magistrate's order and representations against it would commonly come up for the consideration of the Provincial Government at the same time. I do not know how carefully District Magistrates have in practice distinguished between the cases of rule 26 and rule 129, the latter of which contains a time limit; but in my view the consideration which made confirmation desirable when a subordinate officer effects an arrest under rule 129 apply equally when any authority other than the Provincial Government itself makes an order under rule 26.

Such a limitation could not, I think, be achieved by an amendment of the rule, since such an amendment could not I presume treat the power of delegation given by section 2 (b) of the Defence of India Act. If so, a directive would perhaps be the only, though an unsatisfactory, way out. There is, however, something to be said, to my mind, for bringing out the 'Bartley Ordinance' expanded to cover the points discussed here, irrespective of decisions as to the validity of rule 26 which may be taken by the Federal Court. To do so could evince the determination of Government to make the position absolutely clear for the future and to provide to fairest conditions that circumstances allow. It would also, to some extent, counteract criticism on the ground that the liberty of the subject is at the mercy of the executive authority which has power to make rules, since the Governor-General making an ordinance is presumably a legislature, but, whatever the stands of the Governor-General, this course might perhaps be objected to on the ground that it would expose the Governor-General in his discretion to criticism now probably levelled against Government (this objection, however, applies to the 'Bartley Ordinance' in any case, though it has not been considered in that connection).

3. As regards the point made in para 2 of office note. I assume that any modifications decided upon here would be incorporated in the 'Bartley Ordinance' if that Ordinance were promulgated; Obviously, however, they will have to wait if the Ordinance has to be brought out in the next few days.

4. Home Department will possibly consider ascertaining D.I.B's views. These proposals might conceivably affect his interest in detained persons. War Department are also in some degree interested since some of their officers are exercising powers under rule 26.

L.J.D. Wakely.
25/8/43.

Home Department,
(Sir R. Tottenham)
8412.Do/43. 25/8/43.

Home Department

Mr Wakely's note covers this case very thoroughly. At this stage I would merely add my personal views regarding the points raised in sub-paras (1) to (4) of his paragraph 2.

- (1) The Home department is not of course to be taken as having in any way agreed to what I recorded in my note of August 23rd as Sir George Spence's view. I am not even sure whether I have expressed that view quite correctly and in any case he would probably prefer to put it in his own words. My own personal view is that it would probably be better to provide specifically for the review of all cases at intervals of not less than six months, than to put it in the way suggested at the beginning or para 4 of H.M.'s note of August 18th.
- (2) I agree with Mr Wakely, but I see no reason why we should put out any justificatory statement for not adopting the system of advisory committees.
- (3) I agree, on the whole, that persons detained should be informed at once of the grounds for their detention in sufficient detail to enable them to make representations if they so wish. I am inclined to think that this could best be done in the order of detention itself and not by any separate or subsequent communication

2. As regards legal advice, we understand that in the U.K. detenus are allowed free access to their legal advisers and we have recently informed Provincial Governments that such interviews must be allowed, in addition to any interviews permissible under the ordinary rules, for the purpose of bona fide consultation regarding any legal case. I do not think myself that this would cover interviews for the purpose of making representations to Government against orders of detention - at any rate I would proceed on the assumption that it does not.

(4) I agree with Mr Wakely that all representations against detention orders passed by subordinate authorities should be addressed to Government, Central or Provincial as the case may be and further that we should secure in some way that subordinate authorities would only be authorized to make Rule 26 in exceptional emergencies. I do not, however, think that subordinate authorities should only be allowed to make orders for a limited period. The general provision for reviews at six monthly intervals and for the submission of representations to Government should provide all the checks necessary on the improper use of the rule by subordinate authorities in emergencies.

2. I would be inclined to agree that the advantage lies in issuing the Bartley Ordinance, including whatever alterations may be settled as a result of this discussion, irrespective of the decision of the Federal Court in the present appeals. If that decision goes against us there will be a need for the immediate promulgation of that Ordinance and I think we should have to incorporate whatever amendments we may regard as necessary without consulting Provincial Governments. The matter, however, would be of sufficient importance to suggest that it should be brought before Council, when, of course, the War Member would have an opportunity of expressing his views. If the Federal Court decision is in our favour, the need for immediate action will not be so great and we might consult Provinces and any other authorities who may be interested.

25.8.43.

Additional Secretary.

H.M.

Para 1 of Additional Secretary's note. Point (1). I still think that the mode of expression used in para 4 of my previous note would be more convincing and businesslike. But I am very ready to consider any views which Sir George Spence may like to express on the point. It will be remembered that in previous Emergency Powers Ordinances detention without trial was limited to two months. The opportunity of extension of orders will, however, provide for longer detention than six months where the Provincial Government, after full consideration of the case, consider it necessary to use their discretion in this way. It will then practically amount to passing a fresh order which is rather different from merely reviewing a previous order. I agree, however, that if the provision for review was sufficiently stringent it would serve much the same object and I must leave it to Additional Secretary to decide in consultation with Sir George Spence which is the better way of proceeding.

Point (2). No remarks.

Point (3). I agree that persons detained should be informed at once of the grounds of detention. I do not, however, think that this should be done in the detention order which is of a more formal character. Moreover the information of grounds of detention must be accompanied by an intimation that the detained person has the right of making representations. I think, therefore, that a separate communication to this effect should be supplied to the prisoner as soon as possible after his detention. This procedure would have the additional advantage of allowing the grounds un stated in the communication to be more fully considered than might be possible in the circumstances of the moment of detention.

The question of legal advice should not arise here. Legal advice is to be allowed where legal proceedings are in view. But representations which we now contemplate are not for the purpose of any judicial proceedings.

Point (4). All representations should certainly be addressed to Government and I think it most desirable that the power of subordinate authorities to make orders under Rule 26 should be very strictly limited in whatever way seems best. I think that every order passed by a subordinate authority should be confirmed within a stated period by the Provincial government which will thus make itself directly responsible for the propriety of the order. This is a matter which could not properly be left until six months later.

Para 2 of Additional Secretary's note. I am in some doubt whether a separate Ordinance will be necessary if the Federal Court decision goes in our favour. It is generally advisable to modify Rules rather than to issue fresh Ordinances. But I have no strong views on the point. I agree that in any case the matter should be brought before Council with His Excellency's permission. The actual drafts of the proposed amendments of Rule 26 or of the Bartley Ordinance will, of course, have to be ready before that is done.

R.M. Maxwell,
26.8.43
Home Member.

Additional Secretary.

It now seem to be largely a matter of drafting and deciding how much could be put into a revised Rule and how much would require an amendment of the Act. I think this Bartley ordinance is ready and perhaps the best plan would be to incorporate these proposals in the draft of that ordinance in the first instance. We should be prepared for the greater emergency i.e. a possible adverse decision by the Federal Court. The file should go to Sir George

Spence first thing tomorrow morning and if he thinks it desirable and will ring me up before 11 a.m. I will come over at once to discuss and perhaps bring Mr Wakely.

History sheet scrutinised and returned.¹ Detention justified. I do not consider however that there is sufficient ground for continuing detention. I accept the information that he has taken part in active sabotage including the Beadon Street Post Office dacoity and bomb throwing at a liquor shop in Ballygunje and at tram cars in that locality. His actual membership of, and importance in, the R.S.P., however, seems to me to be insufficiently established and there is nothing from which I can deduce that he is an influential and important person who is likely to be able to cause effective and serious disturbance without direction by experienced and influential people. He will be released on 15.9.43 unless D.I.G., I.B., furnishes additional grounds on which his continued detention can be justified.

L.J.D. Wakely, 25.8.43.

Notes in the Defence Department

As regards legal advice, we understand that in the U.K. detenus are allowed free access to their legal advisers and we have recently informed Provincial Governments that such interviews must be allowed, in addition to any interviews permissible under the ordinary rules, for the purpose of bona fide consultation regarding any legal case. I do not think myself that this would cover interviews for the purpose obtaining legal advice in making representations to Government against orders of detention — at any rate I would proceed on the assumption that it does not.

The question of legal advice should not arise here. Legal advice is to be allowed where legal proceedings are in view. But representations which we now contemplate are not for the purpose of any judicial proceedings.

R.M. [Maxwell],
26.8.43.

4. One question of importance which occurs to me and on which, I think, we should obtain the best advice before actually drafting is whether a right to make representations conferred either by Ordinance or by amendment of rule on persons detained would be liable to create a demand for the production of such representations in courts for the purpose of habeas corpus applications. A similar provision in Regulation III of 1818 has not, so far as I am aware, led to any such demand. But cases under this Regulation would be comparatively few. Similarly I have not heard that the corresponding provision in Regulation 18B of the U.K. Defence Regulations has led to any interference from the High Courts in England. But where a concerted attempt is evident to bring the cases of Security prisoners in India before the High Courts and where certain High courts have shown a disposition to lend themselves to these tactics we have to be safeguarded against the possibility that, e.g. representation made by Gandhi or members of the working Committee might be demanded by the Courts for the purpose deciding whether the person in question was properly detained or not. If there is any such danger we must seek means of placing these representations firmly beyond the reach of any Courts in any circumstances.

Zafrulla Khan J. (Varadachariar J. concurring.) (Case Nos 13 to 21 of 1943).

These appeals have been preferred by the Bengal Government against orders passed by the Calcutta High Court directing the release of nine persons who were being detained under R.26, Defence of India Rules. The detention orders had been passed on various dates in the years 1940 and 1942. By a judgment given on 22nd April of this year, this court held R.26, Defence of India rules to be ultra vires in that it went beyond the rule-making power conferred on the central Government by the Defence of India Act. Immediately after this judgment was pronounced, the applications, out of which these appeals have arisen, were filed under S.491, Criminal P.C., praying for the release of the detenues concerned on the ground that their detention was illegal. On 28th April, the Governor-General promulgated an Ordinance, 14 of 1943, whereby the rule-making power of the Central Government under the Defence of India Act was made wider so as to cover the terms of R.26 as it had all along stood. The section was so worded as to make this change operative as from the date of the Defence of India Act itself. By another section of the Ordinance it was provided:

“For the removal of doubts it is hereby enacted that no order heretofore made against any person under R.26, Defence of India Rules, shall be deemed to be invalid or shall be called in question on the ground merely that the said rule purported to confer powers in excess of the powers that might at the time the said rule was made be lawfully conferred by a rule made or deemed to have been made under S.2, Defence of India act, 1939.”

When the Habeas Corpus applications came on for hearing, reliance was placed upon the Ordinance as an answer to the applications, with the result that the validity of the Ordinance itself was challenged. Other questions were also raised in support of the applications. The various contentions have been summarized by Mitter J., as follows:

(I) That the whole S.2, Defence of India Act, both in its original and amended forms, is ultra vires the Indian Legislature. (II) That the portion of cl. (x) of S.2 (2) of the said Act which has been added by the amendment made by the Ordinance is ultra vires the Indian Legislature and accordingly of the Governor-General's powers under S.72 of Sch.9. the corresponding portions of R.26, Defence of India Rules, are bad and consequently the orders of detention in the cases we have before us are bad. (III) That the Governor-General has no power to repeal or amend directly any Act of the Federal Legislature by an Ordinance made and promulgated under S.72 of Sch. 9, Government of India Act, 1935. (IV) That it is only the Central Indian Legislature that has the power to repeal or amend an Act of the Central Indian Legislature passed under the provisions of S.102, Government of India Act. (V) That the Governor-General has no power to legislate by such an Ordinance on any subject enumerated in List II of Sch.7, Government of India Act. (VI) That in any event the Governor-General has no power to give retrospective operation to such an Ordinance. (VII) That in any event the Ordinance (14 of 1943) cannot affect proceedings which were pending at the date of its promulgation. (VIII) That S 3 of the Ordinance (14 of 1943) has no independent existence apart from S.2 of the said Ordinance and must stand or fall with that section. (IX) That R.26, Defence of India Rules, had no existence in the eye of law on 29th September 1939, when the Defence of India Act was passed and so does not exist even now either in its original or amended forms. (X) That even if R.26 be not ultra vires the detention of the nine persons whose cases are before us was improper.

On questions I, II, IV, V, VI and VII, the three learned Judges who constituted the Bench unanimously rejected the contentions urged on behalf of the detenues. In respect of questions III, VIII and X, two of the learned Judges (Mitter and Sen J.J.) upheld the contentions urged on behalf of the detenues, while Khundkar J. took a different view. On question IX, Mitter and Khundkar J.J. agreed, but Sen J. disagreed. In the result Mitter and Sen J.J. directed the release of the detenus. Hence these appeals. As a matter of convenience, we heard along with these appeals three other groups of appeals against orders passed by the High Courts of Madras, Allahabad and Lahore on similar applications under S.491. In those cases, the High courts dismissed the applications and the appeals were preferred by or on behalf of the detenus. It will be convenient to deal with the Bengal appeals in the first instance. During the pendency of the appeals one of the detenus, Sasanka Sekhar Sanyal, the respondent in case No. 21 has been released and it is therefore not necessary to deal with that case.

The Advocate-General of Bengal and the Advocates-General of the various Provinces addressed full arguments to us questioning the correctness of the reasoning and the conclusions of Mitter and Sen J.J. on questions III, VIII and X. On behalf of the detenus, these findings were supported, and their counsel also took exception to the reasoning and conclusion of Mitter and Khundkar J.J., in respect of question IX and to the unanimous conclusion of the three learned Judges on questions I and II. In discussing question VI, the learned Judges of the High Court do not seem to have attached any importance to the difference between the provision in S.2 of the Ordinance which makes the substituted provision take effect as from the date of the Defence of India Act itself and the provision in S.3 which prevents any question being raised as to the validity of orders theretofore passed under Rule 26. This distinction was stressed in the course of the argument here.

The third question has been framed in general terms, without reference to the particular enactment (the Defence of India act) with which the Ordinance was dealing and without reference to the terms of the Ordinance itself. It draws no distinction between an attempt made by an Ordinance to amend or repeal a permanent enactment of the Legislature and an attempt to amend or repeal an act of limited duration, like the Defence of India Act. Again, it draws no distinction between cases where the Ordinance merely enacts a law to come into operation from the date of the Ordinance and where it attempts to declare that even before the date of its enactment the law must be deemed to have been different from what the pre-existing statute had enacted. The same remark may be made as to the possibility of an Ordinance declaring that even after the expiry of the period of the Ordinance the law shall remain what it had been declared to be by the Ordinance, and not what it would be according to pre-existing legislation. The question seems to assume that all these cases will stand on the same footing and admit of one general and comprehensive answer whether in the affirmative or in the negative. It also assumes that all conceivable forms of amendment will be governed by one and the same rule and that the power to repeal will stand on the same footing as the power to amend. The discussion has shown that the question might not admit of a general or comprehensive answer and that different aspects might be governed by different considerations.

On behalf of the Crown, it was broadly maintained both here and before the High Court that whatever a Legislature in India can do by way of amending, modifying or repealing one of its own enactments can as well be done by an Ordinance in relation to any enactment of that Legislature. Sections 108 and 110, Constitution Act, were relied on as negating the existence of a general principle that one Legislature cannot, in the absence of power expressly conferred, amend, modify or repeal enactments passed by another Legislature. Counsel for the Punjab detenus argued by way of answer to this contention, that in 1861 (when S.72 of the present Sch.9, Constitution Act, was first enacted), and indeed up to 1919, Parliament had proceeded on the assumption that unless expressly authorized so to do, a Legislature in India would not have power to amend, repeal or modify even its own enactments. He also maintained that the concluding words of S.72 providing that an act of the Legislature might 'control or supersede' an Ordinance indicated that the two legislating authorities were not co-ordinate but that the Legislature was the paramount authority.

On behalf of the detenus, it appears to have been contended before the High Court that the Legislature and the Ordinance-making authority being two distinct legal entities, though operating in the same field (as to subject-matter and as regard local extent), each can legislate only by itself and cannot directly amend or repeal any measure passed by the other, unless clearly empowered to do so. This contention was repeated before us. It was not disputed except by counsel for the Punjab detenus that an Ordinance may in effect modify the operation of statute by enacting something repugnant to the provisions of the latter. When certain instances were put to counsel, the difficulty of maintaining this extreme position became evident. Take for instance the Ordinance that was considered by the Court in 37 C.W.N. 104, it added two offences to the list of offences specified in S.4, Press (Emergency Powers) Act, 1931, and it was in terms stated in the Ordinance itself that such should be the law only during the time that the Ordinance was in force. There was no other interference with the existing legislative enactment. Such an addition can, in one sense, be described as an 'amendment' of the Act. If the Ordinance-making authority can create new offences and make them triable and punishable in a manner provided for in a pre-existing enactment, there can be no purpose in insisting that the Ordinance must be self-contained and must reproduce all the provisions of the pre-existing Act. It was rightly maintained by counsel for the Crown that the validity or invalidity of an Ordinance should not be made depend upon mere drafting devices or on the draftsman's ingenuity. Take again a case like, 12 Lah. 26: the Ordinance there in question denied to the accused the benefit of certain provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code, such as those relating to trial by jury or with the aid of assessors, appeal to the High Court, etc. It could not be said that it was beyond the power of the Ordinance-making authority to exclude certain of the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code in certain specified classes of cases; indeed, S.1 (2) of the Code recognizes this possibility. Here again, it will be difficult to maintain that this result can be achieved only by a self-contained Ordinance and not by one which purports to modify or exclude certain provisions of the pre-existing law.

Alternatively, the rule was formulated in a different form before us by counsel for some of the detenus, viz., that the Ordinance-making authority could declare its own intention as to what the law should be during the period that the Ordinance was to be in force, but it could not adopt a course which would attribute to the Legislature an intention different from what it had declared in its own enactment. One or two illustrations may help to elucidate this test or principle. Section 108, Constitution Act, assumes that a Legislature in India may repeal or amend an Act of Parliament extending to British India. When this power is exercised by an Indian Legislature, it cannot be made to appear that Parliament has passed an enactment different from what in fact it had; what the Indian Legislature can do is to declare that within the local area of its legislative authority, the law shall be as enacted by itself and not as enacted by Parliament. The same will be the case when the Indian Legislature purports to repeal an Act passed by Parliament [cf. also Ss.92 (2) and 95 (3), Constitution Act]. In such cases, neither the terms nor the operation of the Parliamentary enactment would be affected in areas over which the Indian Legislature had no control. The position thus stated is clear enough, because the 'local extent' of the legislative power is clearly different in the two cases. Will not the governing principle be the same, where the capacity of the two legislative authorities even though co-extensive as regards local extent and subject-matter, differs in respect of the time limit during which their respective enactments can operate?

The Legislature can at any time enact a measure and such measure can remain in force without any limit of time; but the exercise of the Ordinance-making power is limited in two ways, (i) by the limitation as to the circumstances in which it can be exercised and (ii) by the limitation as to the time during which any measure so enacted can remain in operation. The existence of an emergency is a condition precedent to the exercise of the power. The fact that the Court cannot go behind a declaration of emergency made by the Ordinance-making authority cannot affect this question. The power was intended to be availed of and could be availed of only in an emergency, whereas ordinary legislation is not governed by any such limitation. Similarly, an Ordinance is necessarily of limited duration, whether under S.72 or under the terms of the India and Burma (Emergency Provisions) Act of 1940. If an Ordinance purported to declare that during a period anterior to the emergency or even after the termination of the period of the Ordinance, a provision of statute law was or would be different from what the Legislature had enacted, would it be any better than an attempt by the Indian Legislature to affect the operation of an Act of Parliament outside the local limits of the jurisdiction of that Legislature?

An attempt to repeal a pre-existing statute may furnish another useful illustration. That an Ordinance can for the period of its duration suspend the operation of the whole or any portion of a pre-existing statute, appears to us to admit of no doubt. In such a case, the pre-existing law would come into operation again on the expiry of the period of the Ordinance. But suppose the Ordinance purported to repeal a pre-existing statute or part thereof. One of the counsel for the Crown thought that the pre-existing law would in that case also be revived on the expiry of the term of the Ordinance; but another contended that this would be a matter of construction and that if there was nothing in the language of the Ordinance to suggest that the repeal was intended to be temporary, the pre-existing law might not be revived merely by reason of the expiry of the period of the Ordinance. In support of this contention, he drew our attention to the discussion in Crazies' Statute Law (Edn. 4, pp. 357 et seq.). This will no doubt be the position when Parliament, which is competent to pass either a temporary law or a permanent law, chooses to pass a temporary measure, and by such measure repeals a pre-existing law. Can the position be the same when an authority which can pass only a temporary law purports to repeal a pre-existing permanent statute? The impugned Ordinance enacts for cl. (x) of sub-section (2) of S.2, Defence of India Act, 1939, the following clause shall be substituted, and shall be deemed always to have been substituted. . . .

Leaving out of consideration for the moment the fact that the Defence of India Act itself is in terms a temporary measure, suppose an Ordinance attempted to make a similar provision in respect of a section in a statute of permanent operation. What would be the position on the expiry of the period of the Ordinance? If the pre-existing statutory provision could be deemed always to have been what the Ordinance substituted for it, it might be a difficult question to decide whether the provision in the originally statutory form would be revived at all.

It will be noticed that unlike an amendment merely in the nature of an addition to a pre-existing statute, S.2 of Ordinance XIV attributes to the Legislature a provision very different from what it in fact had enacted. In justification of the adoption of this course by the Ordinance-making authority, it was claimed on behalf of the Crown that any legislative authority with 'plenary powers' could enact a law with retrospective operation. It seems to us misleading to assume that the Ordinance-making authority enjoys plenary powers of Legislation and then seek to deduce therefrom the inference that it must have the power to enact a provision with retrospective operation. As regards 'subject-matter' its powers may be co-extensive with those of the ordinary Legislature but, as already pointed out, there are at least two limitations upon its powers. It is necessary to refer to a certain ambiguity in the use of the expression 'retrospective operation'. It was observed by Buckley L.J. in (1911) 2 Ch. 1 at pp. 11 and 12:

Retrospective operation is one matter. Interference with existing rights is another. If an Act provides that as at a past date the law shall be taken to have been what it was not, that I understand to be retrospective. . . . The question here is as to the ambit and scope of the Act and not as to the date as from which the new law is to be taken to have been the law.

An enactment which declares that even in the past the law must be taken to have been different from what in fact it was has sometimes been spoken of as 'retroactive'. Assuming that the ordinary Legislature can pass a 'retroactive law' in the sense above explained (see (1870) 6 Q.B. 1 (1915) 20 Com. L.R. 425 and (1942) 66 Com. L.R. 1) it would not necessarily follow that the Ordinance-making authority must also have the power to pass a retroactive law. It has no doubt been held that in an emergency, it would be for the Governor-General to decide what law was required to meet the emergency; but the enactment of a retroactive law may in one view be said to raise a question of 'jurisdiction' or 'power' and not merely a question of aptness or expediency. The power to enact provisions interfering with pre-existing rights and the remedies therefore – though these are also sometimes spoken of as 'retrospective' – stands on a different footing, because such provision will declare the law only for the period during which the Ordinance is in force and not for an anterior or a subsequent period, though their effect may be to deprive parties of rights accrued at an anterior date and of remedies in respect of such rights. In (1932) A.C. 260 at p. 267 Lord Darling observed:

It may be true that 'not Jove himself upon the past hath power' but Legislators have certainly the right to prevent, alter or reverse the consequences of their own decrees.

There was no complication in that case of one legislative authority attempting to modify or nullify the operation of a law enacted by another authority, but the observation brings out the difference between changing the law for the past and modifying or taking away its consequences. These authorities may justify a finding in favour of the Crown as regards the validity and operation of S.3 of the Ordinance, but they do not compel a like answer as regards the power of the Ordinance-making authority to enact a retroactive law.

There was lengthy discussion before us as to the bearing and effect of the decision in (1896) A.C. 348 particularly of the observations on pp. 366 and 367. It was contended for the detenus that two propositions had been laid down here, (i) a broad statement (on p. 366) to the effect that 'the repeal of a Provincial Act by the Parliament of Canada can only be effected by repugnancy between its provisions and the enactments of the Dominion' as the Dominion Parliament 'has no authority conferred upon it by the Act to repeal directly any provincial statute', and (ii) a narrower statement (on p. 367) to the effect that the Parliament of Canada would have no power to pass a prohibitory law for the Province of Ontario and could therefore have no authority to repeal in express terms an Act which is limited in its operation to that Province'. On behalf of the Crown, it was maintained that the second or narrower proposition was all that was laid down by their Lordships in the case and the observations on p. 366 implied nothing more when read with the context. The controversy would seem to turn on the significance of the words 'whether it does or does not come within the limits of jurisdiction prescribed by S.92' occurring on p. 366.

As the general question framed by the Calcutta High Court cannot be satisfactorily answered without further discussion of the above and other similar aspects of the problem, we refrain from expressing any final opinion upon it, as no such decision is necessary for the disposal of these cases. The view that we take as to S.3 of the Ordinance makes it unnecessary for us to pronounce any decision in respect of S.2.

Proceeding next to question VIII, it seems to us that in spite of the language of the preamble, S.3 of the Ordinance cannot be said directly to amend or repeal any provision of the Defence of India Act, nor, as we read it, is it so dependent upon S.2, or so connected with it as to be incapable of being given effect to by itself, i.e., irrespective of whether S.2 is valid or not. The 'doubts' referred to in the opening words of S.3 may well include doubts as to the validity of S.2. Section 3 merely deals with the remedies of parties and the power of the Court to give redress in respect of a breach of the pre-existing law and might well have been enacted either by the Legislature or by the Ordinance-making authority without any provision corresponding to S.2 of the Ordinance. The operativeness of such a provision is of course subject to the limitation referred to by Willes J. in (1870) 6 Q.B. 1 at p. 17, that the authority which enacts it must be one which 'could have authorized by antecedent legislation the acts done', otherwise, by the device of precluding an investigation by the Court, a legislative authority would be able to do indirectly what it could not do directly, see (1940) A.C. 513 at pp. 533 and 534. We express no opinion on the question what the effect of this provision would be if, after the expiry of the Ordinance, any question should be raised as to the validity of orders of detention passed prior to the enactment of the Ordinance.

It was contended that even if S.3 should be held to be valid and independently operative, it would not avail the Crown much, because that section proceeded on the assumption that at the time the orders of detention were passed, Rule 26, Defence of India Rules, was at least defacto in existence, whereas according to counsel for the detenus, this was not the case. This was question IX before the High Court. Section 3 of the Ordinance has to be read in the light of S.21, Defence of India Act. Counsel maintained that an ultra vires rule was as good as non-existent, and that R. 26 (which had been originally framed under the Defence of India Ordinance) could not therefore be held to have been continued by S.21, Defence of India Act. This ignores the fact that S.21 only requires the rule to have been 'made' – not validly made under the earlier Ordinance. The object of S.21 was only to avoid a break in the operation of the rules and to obviate the necessity of promulgating them afresh under the new enactment. It had no reference to the validity or validation of the rules. The case is not analogous to that contemplated by S.16 which gives 'finality' to certain orders. Such a provision was held by this Court in Keshav Talpade's case to be applicable only to orders which could not be nullities as having been passed under an ultra vires rule.

As regards questions I and II, the argument before us was limited to the ground that 'public safety or interest' was not one of the heads specified in entry No. 1 of list I or entry No. 1 of List II of Sch.7, Constitution Act, as subjects in respect of which Indian Legislation might provide for 'preventive detention'. The judgment of this Court in Talpade's case clearly proceeded on the footing that such legislation was covered by the two entries. We think that the expressions 'reasons of state connected with defence' and 'reasons connected with the maintenance of public order' are wide enough to include public safety or interest.

Counsel for the Punjab detenus challenged the validity of the whole Ordinance on another ground. He recognized that the question of emergency was one for the Governor-General and not for the Court to decide. But he said that when the nature of the emergency had been stated by the Governor-General or even by counsel for the Crown, it would be open to the Court to consider whether it would not be an abuse of or a fraud on the power to treat the facts disclosed as a pretext for the exercise of the emergency power. If it would be an abuse of or fraud on the power, he contended that the case must be treated as one of absence of power. This argument was urged on the basis of an answer given by the Advocate-General of India (in the course of the argument before us) and of a statement said to have been made by counsel for the Crown before the High Court at Lahore, to the effect that it was the decision of this Court in Talpade's case that necessitated the promulgation of the Ordinance. Counsel contended that it would be preposterous to treat a decision of this Court as an 'emergency' justifying the exercise by the Governor-General of his extra-ordinary power of promulgating Ordinances. It does not seem to us necessary to deal with the larger issues involved in this contention. Such an argument would be available only if it could be suggested that the power had been exercised for a corrupt purpose or for purposes foreign to the power. (See Farwell on powers, ch. X.) Can that be said to be the case here? The decision of this Court might have led to promulgation of the Ordinance. But the 'Emergency' was the apprehended danger to peace and public safety, likely to arise from the release of thousands of detenus in obedience to the decision of this Court. It is not within the province of the Court to examine the justification for the apprehension or assess the extent of the possible danger.

We now turn to question X. We may point out in passing that the assumption to be made is not that R.26 is ultra vires but only that its validity has been put beyond question by S.3 of the Ordinance. On this footing the validity of the orders of detention in these cases was questioned on the ground that they had not been made in accordance with the provisions of the rule. The relevant portion of Rule 26 runs as follows:

The Central Government or the Provincial Government, if it is satisfied with respect to any particular person that with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order, His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian States, the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas or the efficient prosecution of the war it is necessary so to do, may make an order: (a) . . . (b) directing that he be detained.

It was urged on behalf of the Crown that the Orders being on their face regular and in conformity with the language of the rule, it was not open to the Court to investigate their validity any further. It was also urged that the orders had in fact been made in conformity with the provisions of the rule. Section 59 (2), Constitution Act, was sought to be called in aid in support of the proposition that the validity of the orders must be presumed by the Court and could not be questioned. All that that sub-section secures is that the validity of an order or instrument made or executed in the name of the Governor and authenticated in such manner as may be specified in rules made by the Governor, shall not be called in question on the ground that it is not an order or instrument made or executed by the Governor; that is to say, in the case of an order or instrument purporting to be made or executed by the Governor and duly authenticated, it must be presumed that it was made or executed by the Governor. No question as to who made these orders was raised by the respondents. What was questioned was the correctness of the recital in the orders that the Governor had been satisfied that with a view to preventing these persons from acting in a certain manner, certain action was necessary. It was conceded that the Court could not be invited to investigate the sufficiency of the material or the reasonableness of the grounds upon which the Governor had been satisfied. The gist of the contention was that these cases were never before the Governor, that the Governor had never applied his mind to them, and that therefore it could not be said that the Governor had been satisfied.

To meet this contention, reliance was placed by the Crown on the presumption that official acts have been regularly performed. The words 'may presume' in S.114, Evidence Act, leave it to the court to make or not to make the presumption, according to the circumstances of the case; and the presumption when made is rebuttable. Reference was made in this connection to 1942 A.C. 206 and (1942) A.C. 284. The question in those cases was whether the Home Secretary had reasonable cause to believe that certain persons were of hostile associations and that by reason thereof it was necessary to exercise control over them. It was held that the matter was one for the executive discretion of the Secretary of State, and that the Court was not entitled to investigate the grounds on which the Secretary of State came to believe the persons concerned to be of hostile associations, or to believe that by reason of such associations it was necessary to exercise control over them. There is no suggestion anywhere in the speeches of their Lordships in those two cases that if the statement that the Secretary of State believed those persons to be of hostile associations had itself been challenged, it would not have been open to the Court to look into that question. If the ground of challenge against the orders there sought to be impugned had been that the cases had never been placed before the Secretary of State at all, so that he never had any opportunity of exercising his mind with respect to them, we have not the slightest doubt that this would have been held to be a proper ground of challenge in a Court of law. At page 224 (1942 A.C.) Viscount Maugham observed:

In my opinion, the well known presumption omnia esse rite acta applies to this order, and accordingly, assuming the order to be proved or admitted, it must be taken prima facie, that is until the contrary is proved, to have been properly made and that the requisite as to the belief of the Secretary of State was complied with.

In 1942 A.C. 284 at p. 295 he quoted with approval the following passage from the judgment of Goddard L.J. in the Court of Appeal:

I am of opinion that where on the return an order or warrant which is valid on its face is produced it is for the prisoner to prove the facts necessary to controvert it, and in the present case this has not been done. I do not say that in no case is it necessary for the Secretary of State to file an affidavit. It must depend on the ground on which the return is controverted, but where all that the prisoner says in effect is 'I do not know why I am interned. I deny that I have done anything wrong', that does not require an answer because it in no way shows that the Secretary of State had not reasonable cause to believe, or did not believe, otherwise.

In 1942 A.C. 206, Lord Wright observed at page 262:

Mackinnon L.J. who agreed with his brethren said that power of the Home Secretary to issue a valid order depended on the fulfilment of a condition, the existence of a state of mind in the Home Secretary, that is that he had reasonable grounds for believing certain facts to exist, and by implication that he honestly entertained that belief. Goddard L.J. I think, also treated the material issue as being what is the Home Secretary's state of mind.

In 1942 A.C. 284, Lord Romer observed (page 309):

In the present case, it is plain that Sir John Anderson was of opinion that there was reasonable cause for his belief, and that he did honestly believe that the appellant was a person of hostile associations and that by reason thereof it was necessary to exercise control over him. It necessarily follows that far as the appellant relies on the absence of proof that there was in fact reasonable cause for such belief the appeal must fail.

The whole question in those two cases was whether under the regulation in question, it was incumbent upon the Secretary of State to prove that the cause which led him to believe that the person against whom action was taken in each case was of hostile associations and that by reason thereof it was necessary to exercise control over him, would, in the opinion of the Court, amount to reasonable cause. Their Lordships held that the question whether there was or was not reasonable cause was one for the Secretary of State and not for the Court. It was not disputed that before action could be taken under the regulation, the Secretary of State must believe that the person concerned was of hostile associations and that by reason thereof, it was necessary to exercise control over him. We may observe that the head note in 1942 A.C. 284 reads as though the production of an order regular in form would have been conclusive but their Lordships' speeches in the two cases leave no room for doubt that the presumption attaching to an order regular on the face of it is only a rebuttable presumption.

This brings us to the question, which is the authority that must be satisfied before an order under R.26 can be made? On the language of the rule, so far as the cases before us are concerned, it must be the 'Provincial Government'. This, according to the Crown, means the Governor or officers subordinate to him (S.49 (1), Constitution Act), or the authority or officers to whom this function may have been allotted by rules of business framed in accordance with S.59 (3) of the Act. The argument was that inasmuch as action to be taken under R.26 was in the nature of the exercise of executive discretion, it fell within the executive authority of the Province within the meaning of S.49. On its being pointed out that this would lead to the result that any officer subordinate to the Governor, even one of the lowest grade, could, as a matter of course, exercise the very drastic powers conferred by the Defence of India Rules, which could not reasonably be presumed to have been intended by the Legislature, it was urged that the matter would be regulated by rules of business framed under S.59 (3). We are unable to accede to this contention. The executive action or authority dealt with in Ss.49 and 59 must relate to matters with respect to which the Legislature of the Province has power to make laws (S.49 (2)). Section 124 (2) makes provision for Federal legislation conferring powers and imposing duties upon a Province or officers and authorities thereof relating to matters with respect to which a Provincial Legislature has no power to make laws. We are of the opinion that whenever powers of this kind or indeed other special statutory powers are conferred, they, must to the extent to which specific provision has been made in the statute conferring the powers be exercised by the authority and in the manner specified in the statute and in strict conformity with the provisions thereof.

In this view of the matter, it is unnecessary to make any reference to rules of business on which reliance was placed on behalf of the Crown. We may, however, observe in passing that the only rule on which reliance was placed in this connection (R.16) makes no reference to the exercise of the power of detention under the Defence of India Rules. It merely authorizes the making of Standing Orders by Ministers with reference to their normal duties. No Standing Order framed in pursuance of the rule was placed before us. Nor have we been able to discover any other rule in the rules of business supplied to us on behalf of the Bengal Government which covers this matter. Rule 26, Defence of India Rules, confers the power of detention on the 'Provincial Government'. Rule 3 (1) provides that the General Clauses Act, 1897, shall apply to the interpretation of the rules. For the definition of 'Provincial Government' for the purpose of the rules, recourse must, therefore, be had to the General Clauses Act. Sub-section, (43a) of S.3 of that Act defines 'Provincial Government' in a Governor's Province as:

The Governor acting or not acting in his discretion, and exercising or not exercising his individual judgment according to the provision in that behalf made by and under the Government of India Act; in other words, it means the Governor acting in his discretion (in which case his Ministers are not entitled even to tender their advice to him), or the Governor exercising his individual judgment (in which case he must give his Ministers the opportunity of tendering advice but is under no obligation to accept that advice), or the Governor acting on the advice his Ministers. In each case, it must be the Governor who acts, whether without the advice of his Ministers or after such advice has been tendered, and in the latter case, whether in accordance with such advice or differing from such advice. It was pointed out to us that the definitions in the General Clauses Act are applicable only in the absence of anything repugnant in the subject or context, and our attention was drawn to a number of Defence of India Rules with regard to which it was contended that the expression 'Provincial Government' could not possibly mean the Governor, whether acting on advice or contrary to advice or without advice. Assuming that the context of some of the rules indicates that the expression 'Provincial Government' must in those rules be given a meaning or significance different from the definition of that expression as set out in sub-section (43a) of S.3, General Clauses Act, that consideration cannot be permitted to govern the interpretation of that expression in Rule 26, which deals with matters of the gravest import and confers power that involve the exercise of the highest responsibility. There is nothing in the language of the rule itself which would constrain us to hold that 'Provincial Government' in that rule means anything other than what it would mean under the definition in the General clauses Act.

It was then urged that the volume and multifariousness of the duties imposed upon the Provincial Government by the Defence of India Rules must necessitate the delegation in many cases by the Provincial Government of its powers to officers subordinate to it and that it must be presumed that this delegation could be effected under its rules of business. Sub-section (5) of S.2, Defence of India Act, furnishes a complete answer to this line of argument. That sub-section expressly authorizes the Provincial Government to delegate the exercise of powers conferred and the discharge of duties imposed by the Defence of India Rules upon the Provincial Government; and we are of the opinion that any such delegation must be made in accordance with the provisions of that sub-section. We were asked to confine the operation of this sub-section to cases of delegation to district officers and to hold that cases of delegation within the Provincial Secretariat were governed by the provisions of S.49 (1) read with S.59 (3), Constitution Act. We are unable so to restrict the operation of S.2 (5), Defence of India Act, both for the reason that there is no warrant in the language of that section for importing any such restriction into its operation, and for the reason that the language of S.49 (1), Constitution Act, makes no distinction between secretariat officers and district officers.

The question whether any delegation that the Provincial Government might desire to make of its powers and duties, under the Defence of India Rules must be made in conformity with the provisions of S.2 (5), Defence of India Act, or may be deemed to be covered by rules of business and Standing Orders framed under S.59 (3), Constitution Act, is not a mere matter of form. The Defence of India Rules confer extremely wide and drastic powers, and it may reasonably be expected that where a delegation of any of these powers is made under S.2 (5) of the Act, care would be taken to ensure that the officers and authorities to whom the delegation is made are selected with due regard to the nature and scope of the powers delegated. This would not be the case under rules of business and Standing orders which were presumably framed without any reference to powers the exercise of which might be necessitated by an emergency like the one with which the country is at present faced. Again, it may be a question whether a power conferred for instance on a Minister by delegation under S.2 (5), Defence of India Act, could be validly sub-delegated by him by standing orders.

We may observe in dealing with this part of the case that Khundkar J. says in his judgment that R.26 is a rule under para (10) of sub-section (2) of S.2 (of the Defence of India Act) and the Federal Court has so held, and that it is not a rule under sub-section (1) of S.2. He then goes on to observe that S.2 (5) Defence of India Act, cannot be availed of in the case of R.26 because it contemplates delegation of powers and duties conferred and imposed by rules framed under sub-section (1) of S.2 and not under sub-section (2) of S.2. These observations of the learned Judge are with due respect based upon a misreading of the judgment of this Court in Keshav Talpade's case.¹ It would not be correct to say that S.2, Defence of India Act, confers two kinds of rule-making powers, one under sub-section (1) and the other under sub-section (2). The rule making power is conferred under sub-section (1) and all that sub-section (2) does is to set out the conditions under which rules in respect of the particular subject-matters enumerated in its paragraphs may be made in the exercise of power conferred under sub-section (1). Any other view would lead to the anomaly that on the subjects enumerated in the paragraphs of sub-section (2) there might be two sets of rules one conferring unconditional and unlimited powers by virtue of being framed under sub-section (1) and the other being subject to restrictions and limitations in conformity with conditions and restrictions prescribed by sub-section (2), a state of affairs, the contemplation of which, could not possibly be attributed to the Legislature. The result is that in our opinion, in the absence of a delegation made under S.2 (5), Defence of India Act, the authority to be satisfied under R.26 must be the Governor. The Advocate-General of Bengal stated that so far as those cases were concerned Government did not rely on any delegation under S.2 (5) of the Act.

It was next contended on behalf of the Crown that the subject of preventive detention was one falling within the field of ministerial responsibility and that cases of preventive detention must be held to have been determined by the Governor on the advice of the appropriate Minister. Assuming for a moment that was so, even then the action must be the action of the Governor. In such case, the Governor would be satisfied with regard to the matters specified in R.26 on the advice of his Minister. It would not be for the Court on a challenge raised to that effect to inquire into the reasonableness or otherwise of the Minister's advice, nor, into the question what advice the Minister tendered or indeed whether he tendered any advice at all. The question as to which of the Governor's various capacities or spheres of activity was attracted in these cases is really not relevant to the purpose in hand. The rule requires that before making an order of detention the Governor should be satisfied on certain matters. Whether he is satisfied on advice tendered to him, or on a personal consideration of the material submitted to him, is so far as the Courts are concerned, immaterial.

We have, however, great difficulty in accepting the proposition urged before us that the subject of preventive detention in cases like the present must be held as a matter of law to fall within the field of ministerial responsibility. That in respect of certain matters the Governor must act in his discretion and that in respect of certain other matters he must exercise his individual judgment is specifically provided by the Constitution Act. There is no matter with regard to which the Constitution Act lays down that it must necessarily be determined by the Governor according to the advice of his Ministers. The field of ministerial responsibility is not defined in any positive manner in the Act, but is adumbrated in a residuary sort of manner, that is to say, it comprises matters with respect to which the Governor is not required to act in his discretion and does not choose to exercise his individual judgment. The question whether any matter falls within one or other of the special responsibilities of the Governor is left to be determined by the Governor himself. Once he declares that in his opinion a certain matter falls within the scope of any one or more of his special responsibilities, no Court of law has any say with respect to it. Section 50 (8), Constitution Act, lays down that if any question arises whether any matter is or is not a matter as respects which the Governor is by or under the Act required to act in his discretion or to exercise his individual judgment, the decision of the Governor in his discretion shall be final, and the validity of anything done by the Governor shall not be called in question on the ground that he ought or ought not to have acted in his discretion, or ought or ought not to have exercised his individual judgment. Nor can argument be founded upon any obligation or duty that may be laid upon the Governor by his instrument of instructions, inasmuch as the validity of anything done by the Governor cannot be called in question on the ground that it was done otherwise than in accordance with any instrument of instructions issued to him [S.53 (92)].

The field of ministerial responsibility therefore would, with respect to any particular matter, be as wide or as narrow as the Governor might choose to make it, and of no matter can it be predicated as a proposition of law that its determination much depend upon the advice of a Minister as it necessarily falls within the field of ministerial responsibility, inasmuch as the Governor might at any time, with respect to any matter, decide that having regard to the circumstances of the case it falls within the scope of one or more of his special responsibilities. The question, if it properly arises at all in any particular case, must be determined as a question of fact and practice. In the cases before us, it appears to have been assumed on all hands before the High Court that the subject was one of the special responsibilities of the Governor to be determined by him in the exercise of the individual judgment. This was not challenged in the grounds of appeal filed in this Court, though counsel for the Bengal Government decided to urge before us that the matter fell within the field of ministerial responsibility. The material on record does not bear out his contention. There are indications in the affidavit of Mr Porter (Additional Home Secretary to the Bengal Government) that the action taken in some of these cases was not in accordance with the advice of the Minister. This shows that this subject has been treated in the Province of Bengal as falling within the special responsibility of the Governor. In the answers given by the Home Minister with reference to these cases on the floor of the Bengal Legislative Assembly on behalf of the Government, it is specifically stated that these matters were treated as the special responsibility of the Governor. It must also be remembered that though cases of only nine persons have come up before us, the powers conferred by R.26 have in the Province of Bengal been exercised in respect of thousands of His Majesty's subjects and it would be difficult to hold that the matter did not fall within the special responsibility of the Governor as set out in para (a) of sub-section (1) of section 52, Constitution Act.

Towards the close of the argument, it was contended on behalf of the Bengal Government that what actually happened in respect of cases of detention in the Province of Bengal was that if the Home Minister agreed that the order of arrest under R.129, Defence of India Rules, should be converted into an order of detention under R.26, the matter was treated as falling within the field of ministerial responsibility; but if the Minister disagreed, the matter became one for the special responsibility of the Governor. In other words, it was suggested that the question whether a particular matter did or did not fall within the scope of the special responsibilities of the Governor was settled not with reference to the nature of the particular matter but upon the nature and effect of the advice that the Minister concerned had tendered in respect of it. If the Governor found himself in agreement with such advice, he was content to treat the matter as one of ministerial responsibility; if he disagreed with it, he made it a matter of his special responsibility. In support of this suggestion our attention was invited to the following statement of the Home Minister in the Bengal Assembly:

Ordinarily when a man is arrested under R.129, the case must come up to me at some stage. Now if I agree that the order under R.129 should be converted into one under S. (sic) 26, no difficulty arises. But in some cases I am of opinion the detention is not justified and in those cases it becomes Governor's responsibility.

We are unable to read this statement as meaning that the question became the Governor's responsibility only when the Minister was of the opinion that the detention was not justified. The Home Minister had already stated earlier:

As regards members of the Legislature, we have laid it down that they should as a matter of course be brought to the notice of the Government before they are detained under R.26. In some cases the order of arrest under S. (sic) 129 has been converted into detention under R.26 under my orders. In some cases I have not approved but as is well-known the matter is one which is the Governor's special responsibility.

In the light of this statement, the later statement made by the Minister, which is relied upon by counsel and has been set out above, could only mean that the subject of detention was treated by the Governor as a matter of his special responsibility. When the Governor found that the Minister's advice was in favour of detention, he accepted that advice but when he found that the Minister's advice was against detention, he overruled the Minister as he was entitled to do in the exercise of his individual judgment. These statements taken together cannot mean that the question became the Governor's responsibility only when and because he disagreed with the advice tendered by the Minister. In any case we would be reluctant to attribute such an attitude to the Governor.

It now becomes necessary to examine the material on record for the purpose of determining whether the requirements of R.26 have been complied with in respect of the orders of detention that have been relied upon by the Crown as an answer to the applications for the issue of writs of Habeas Corpus in these cases. We have already made reference to the contention that the presumption set out in illustration (c) to S.114, Evidence Act, viz., that official acts have been regularly performed attaches to these orders. Before any such presumption can arise, it must be shown that the orders are on the face of them regular and conform to the provisions of the rule under which they purport to have been made. We have set out earlier the relevant portion of the orders of detention which is the same in each case. This reads as if all that the authority making the order was satisfied about was that the person concerned in each case should be detained and was not certain as to the reason for detaining him, i.e., whether that person was to be prevented from acting prejudicially to the defence of British India, or acting prejudicially to the public safety, or acting prejudicially to the maintenance of the public order, or acting prejudicially to the efficient prosecution of the war. We were told that the order is a cyclostyled form in which the name and particulars of the person to be detained are filled in as need arises. It is possible that the ministerial officer responsible for the drawing up of the order merely copied into this part the relevant portion of the language of the rule itself, and failed to notice that though the word 'or' before the words 'efficient prosecution of the war' was perfectly in order in the rule, it was out of place in the orders of detention. It was suggested that some sort of reasonable meaning could still be read into this part of the orders of detention, but we see no reason to adopt a meaning different from that which would prima facie attach to the language used.

Assuming, however, that the orders are regular in form and are open to no objection on the face of them, there is so much material on the record showing that the requirements of R 26 were grossly violated in the making of the orders that it would not be safe to make any presumption regarding their validity. This material is contained in the affidavits filed on behalf of the respondents and the counter-affidavit sworn to by Mr Porter, Additional Home Secretary to the Bengal Government. Objection was taken on behalf of the Crown to the admissibility in evidence of the answers given by the Home Minister, Bengal, in the Bengal Legislative Assembly to questions put to him regarding detention under Rule 26. These answers are contained in Annexure A to the affidavit sworn to by Mr Nalinakshya Sanyal. Before the High Court, formal proof of the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly was waived by the Crown. We are unable to sustain the objection raised regarding the admissibility of these answers. It is not disputed that the answers were given by the Home Minister in the Legislative Assembly in his capacity and in the discharge of his duties as such Minister. He was the person to whom the duty of answering questions on the subject had been allocated by the Governor under the rules of business. The answers relate to matters which were put in issue before the High Court. In our opinion they were admissible under sections 17, 18 and 20, Evidence Act.

These answers read with Mr Porter's affidavit disclose a state of affairs in respect of the exercise by the Bengal Government of its powers under R.26, which can only be described as lamentable. The largest number of cases of detention in the Province of Bengal appear to have arisen in connection with the disturbances of August and September of last year. In these cases, the procedure adopted appears to have been that the police sent up lists of persons detained under R.129 together with a recommendation that these persons should be detained under R.26. Thereupon, orders for detention under R 26 were issued forthwith as a matter of routine, and, on receipt of further and detailed material from the police, each case was submitted to the Minister concerned who was then expected to scrutinize such material to see whether there was any reason why the detention should not be continued. If he discovered such reason he presumably made a recommendation for release which was sent up to the Governor, as the matter was one of his special responsibility. In case nothing further was heard from the Minister after submission of the cases to him, nothing was done, and the detention continued. We may draw attention in this connection to the following statements made by the Home Minister in the Bengal Legislative Assembly in answer to questions on the subject:

'We have adopted the device of issuing orders under Defence Rule 26 pending scrutiny of the information submitted to us, because this ensures to those who are under detention the rather more favourable concessions allowed to security prisoners, the absence of which was in some cases made a matter for protest or complaint by or on behalf of those concerned.'

All that I can say is this, that cases are put up and as a matter of routine the order under S. (sic) 129 is converted into one under Rule 26, unless there are special reasons why a recommendation should be made for their release.

The arrest is forthwith reported to Government for orders in accordance with the requirements of the law and to meet objections made by or on behalf of prisoners and to give them the benefit of the concessions enjoyed by security prisoners pending the consideration of the case, orders under Defence of India R.26 (1) (b) ordinarily issue at once. Later, the recommendation of the police officer, together with the materials furnished in support of the recommendation are carefully considered by Government and the orders of detention issued are reviewed and cancelled or confirmed according to the nature of the information against the individual concerned.'

In answer to the question whether he was aware that, as a result of the arrangement under which the police were empowered to arrest anybody and detain him automatically beyond the statutory limits, abuses were taking place, the Minister stated:

'It is possible rather it is probable that these things happen. I do not go so far as to say that these things do not happen, in some cases they may happen.'

He stated further:

'Sir, I refer to the General order under which the cases of the members of the Legislature must invariably be put up before me as privileged persons. As regards other cases, I ask for lists of arrests and if I find that there are certain gentlemen about whom I personally hold this view that it is unlikely that they might be guilty, the General order given is that as quickly as possible the order under R.129 should be converted into an order under R.26 and then all the cases should be brought up before me.'

There was apparently no limit of time within which a 'review' of these cases was to be completed by the Minister. In the case of Nanigopal Mazumdar, for instance, the automatic order of detention under R.26 following upon arrest under R.129 and a recommendation by the police for detention was issued on 8th March 1943. By 24th May 1943 (the date on which Mr Porter's affidavit was sworn) the detailed material upon which the recommendation of the police had been made, had not yet been received and the case had not therefore been put up for 'review'. Even with regard to the 1940 cases (Nos 15 and 20) it does not appear from Mr Porter's affidavit that they were at any stage considered by the Governor. In Birendra Ganguli's case (No. 19), the arrest under R.129 took place on 16th August and the order under R.26 was made on 14th September by Mr Porter, in anticipation of the orders of the Home Minister, though the maximum period of detention permitted under R.129 was not due to run out till 15th October and the Minister was actually able to dispose of the case on 18th September. There was thus no urgency of any kind and no reason has been disclosed by Mr Porter why he thought it necessary to pass the order of detention himself. In the case of Niharendu Dutt Majumdar (No. 18) the only inference that can be drawn from Mr Porter's affidavit is that the case was never put up even before the Home Minister, in spite of the latter's express instruction that all cases of members of the Legislative Assembly must be put up before him. As Mr Porter occasionally took it upon himself to direct the issue of orders of detention, and there was not even a suggestion before the High Court or before us that any of the cases with which we are now concerned was put up before the Governor, it is plain that this case was finally disposed of by Mr Porter himself.

It was suggested on behalf of the Crown that before the issue of orders of detention under Rule 26, at least Mr Porter satisfied himself that it was necessary to issue the orders (see para 12 of his affidavit). In at least three cases, Mr Porter has stated that he considered the materials before him, and in accordance with the General order of Government directed the issue of an order of detention. In two of these cases, the matter was later submitted for consideration to the Minister on receipt of fuller material from the police. It is obvious that Mr Porter could not possibly have considered the fuller material, as he calls it, before directing the issue of an order under Rule 26. In the third case, as already pointed out by us, even the fuller material was still awaited on the date of Mr Porter's affidavit. Any consideration of the available material by Mr Porter before the issue of a detention order did not amount to compliance, either in the letter or in the spirit, with the provisions of Rule 26. According to his own affidavit, Mr Porter was acting on the basis that the final order in each case had to be passed by the Governor or the Minister. Between a person dealing with a matter on the footing that the responsibility for the final decision has been laid upon his shoulders and one dealing with it on the assumption that he is dealing with it only provisionally till the matter can be considered on fuller material by some higher authority, there must be a wide difference both in fact and in law. We cannot condemn the procedure adopted in these cases too strongly. It would be difficult to conceive of a more callous disregard of the provisions of the law and of the liberty of the subject. The following observations occur in this Court's judgment in Keshav Talpade's case:⁴

'We confess that an order in the terms of that under which the appellant in the present case has been detained fills us with uneasiness. It recites that the Government of Bombay 'is satisfied that, with a view to preventing the said Keshav Talpade from acting in a manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order and the efficient prosecution of the war, it is necessary to make an order of detention against him. This reads like a mere mechanical recital of the language of R 26. We do not know the evidence which persuaded the Government of Bombay that it was necessary to prevent the appellant from acting in a manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order and the efficient prosecution of the war; but we may be forgiven for wondering whether a person who is described as an authorized petition-writer on the Insolvency side of the Bombay High Court was really as dangerous a character as the recital of all these four grounds in the order of detention suggests. The order does nothing to remove the apprehension we have already expressed that in many cases the persons in whom this great power is vested may have had no opportunity of applying their minds to the facts of every case which comes before them.'

We regret to have to observe that the apprehensions there expressed have on the material that has been brought on the record of the cases now before us turned out to be justified.

In view of what we have just observed, it was not necessary for us to examine each individual case to see whether the order of detention was open to objection. We have however as a matter of fact considered each case and have come to the conclusion that every one of these orders is bad in law as in no case does it appear that the matter was considered by the Governor at any stage, much less that at the time the order was made he was satisfied with regard to any of the matters set out in the order of detention. It was observed by Mitter J. that the position taken up by the learned Advocate-General before the High Court was that the orders of detention must be taken to be orders made by the Provincial Government itself, though none of the case (except one) had been brought up before or considered by the Governor himself. Sen J. also records:

'The learned Advocate-General stated that except perhaps in the case of Sasanka Sekhar Sanyal there was no question of the Governor being personally satisfied within the meaning of Rule 26.'

We pointedly drew the attention of the Advocate-General to these observations and he again reaffirmed, (i) that it was not his case that the Governor himself had considered the case of any of the eight persons with whom we are now concerned, and (ii) that he did not rely on any delegation by the Governor under S.2 (5), Defence of India Act. It is therefore unnecessary for us at this stage to consider the nature and incidence of the burden of proof or the kind of presumption to be made in the circumstances of the case, or even to consider whether the evidence taken as a whole does not rebut the usual presumption as to the regularity of official acts. We are accordingly of the opinion that all the eight appeals should be dismissed.

[Omitted: References to eight cases appealing against orders of Allahabad, Lahore and Madras High Courts, similar to the Bengal cases — Ed.]

Spens C.J. — I have had the opportunity of reading and considering the judgment just delivered by my brother Zafrulla Khan on behalf of himself and my brother Varadachariar. With their judgment as to the validity of cl. (3) of Ordinance 14, I am in complete agreement. I further agree that in view of our decision on cl. (3), there is no necessity for the disposal of the cases before us to come to a decision on the validity of cl (2) of the Ordinance. On that part of the case I have nothing further to add. On the special points which have been raised by evidence in the Bengal cases, I take a somewhat different view to that by my brothers in regard to all the cases and in four I differ in my conclusion from that at which my brothers have arrived. I must therefore explain my reasons. Rule 26, Defence of India Rules, is in the following terms so far as material:

The Provincial Government, if it is satisfied with respect to any particular person that with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order, His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian States the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas, or the efficient prosecution of the war it is necessary so to do, may make an order, directing that he be detained, . . .

The rule requires, in my judgment, that, before any order can validly be made in any case, the particular case shall be considered by someone duly authorized on behalf of the Provincial Government to pass an order for detention and that person shall be satisfied that it is necessary that the person concerned should be detained for one or other or more of the reasons specified in the rule. In each case, the order for detention is duly authenticated on behalf of the Provincial Government in accordance with the provisions of S.59 (2), Constitution Act. Each order contains a recital to the following effect:

And whereas the Governor is satisfied that with a view to preventing the said person from acting in any manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, it is necessary to make the following orders to continue his detention;

It has been suggested that (1) the form of the recital indicates by use of the word 'or' that no final consideration has been given to each case and that all that the investigating authority has done has been to form a rough conclusion that the case may come within one or other of the reasons quoted and that (2) the use of a cyclostyled form of order indicates a like lack of careful consideration, and that therefore the order is not good ex facie. I do not accept these arguments. In my judgment, the form of recital is one which a layman might reasonably use when he was satisfied that the case must come within one or other of the specified categories without being prepared to pledge himself with legal exactitude to any particular one or more of the categories. Nor do I think that the cyclostyling of the forms, having regard to the circumstances in which many of these orders may have been made, is sufficient to raise serious doubts as to the validity of the orders. I do not think therefore that the form of the order discloses anything irregular on these grounds on its face. The detenus further claim (a) that there is admissible evidence to establish that not only is that recital incorrect in each case but that in fact there was not, as required by the rule, any proper consideration by, or any proper satisfaction on the part of, any properly authorized person before the orders for detention were made; and (b) that accordingly such orders were and must remain invalid.

The first question which arises is whether having regard to the recital contained in these orders, which on the face of them appear to be validly made, it is permissible for the truth and accuracy of the recital to be inquired into by this Court. It was suggested that S.59 (2), Constitution Act, made it impossible for any such inquiry to take place. In my judgment, however, section 59 (2) prohibits a duly authenticated order being called in question on one ground and one ground only, namely, that it is not an order or instrument made or executed by the Governor. It is quite a different thing to question the accuracy of a recital contained in a duly authenticated order, particularly where that recital purports to state as a fact the carrying out of what I regard as a condition necessary to the valid making of that order. In the normal case the existence of such a recital in a duly authenticated order will, in the absence of any evidence as to its inaccuracy, be accepted by a Court as establishing that the necessary condition was fulfilled. The presence of the recital in the order will place a difficult burden on the detenu to produce admissible evidence sufficient to establish even a prima facie case that the recital is not accurate. If, however, in any case, a detenu can produce admissible evidence to that effect, in my judgment, the mere existence of the recital in the order cannot prevent the Court considering such evidence, and if it thinks fit, coming to a conclusion that the recital is inaccurate. If authority is required for the views stated above, it can, in my judgment, be found in the speeches of their Lordships in 1942 A.C. 206 and 1942 A.C. 284.

In this case the detenus have, in fact, produced evidence which for the reasons explained in the preceding judgment of my brothers is admissible and which establishes from the report of answers and statements made by the Chief Minister in the Bengal Legislative Assembly in February and March 1943, that on 1st October 1942, orders were given to those by whom cases of persons detained under Rule 129 were being considered that if the police recommended detention under Rule 26 of any such persons, detention orders under Rule 26 should be made as a matter of routine without any further proper inquiry by, or satisfaction on the part of, any person at that stage that the cases really came within the provisions of Rule 26. In answer to the evidence put in by the detenus the Government of Bengal put in an affidavit deposed to by the Additional Secretary, Home Department. This affidavit confirms the giving of the order by the Home Minister as to the routine dealing with these cases above referred to, though it also suggests that despite the routine order some inquiry beyond that required by the routine order was made by the Additional Secretary. Further, the evidence indicates that the order may have been given in the interests of the detenus as it is suggested that persons detained under Rule 26 may have some privileges in jail, as compared with persons detained under Rule 129. This cannot, of course, justify the course of procedure adopted. It was wholly wrong to direct that orders should go as a matter of course on police recommendation and that the real consideration should follow the making of the order. It is impossible, in my judgment, for the Court to be satisfied that, after such a general order was given, there was, before the orders for detention were made, any full or proper inquiry by any one or any proper satisfaction on the part of any one, that each case was one where it was necessary to make an order for detention under Rule 26 without that person's mind having been influenced by the improper routine order. The facts disclosed in these cases appear to me to bring them within the exceptional class of cases referred to by Lord Wright in 1942 A.C. 206 at p. 261. In my judgment, therefore, none of the orders made in these cases, where persons had been arrested and were being held under Rule 129 after 1st October 1942, can be upheld as valid.

There are, however, three cases where the orders for detention were made before 1st October 1942. These consist of (1) case No. 15, (2) Case No. 19, and (3) Case No. 20. In Case No. 15 the order for detention was made as long ago as 24th October 1940, in case No. 19 the order for detention was made on 14th September 1942, and in Case No. 20 the order for detention was made also as long ago as 28th October 1940. The position as regards these cases is as follows. An application was made in each case under S.491, Criminal P.C., solely on the ground that by reason of the judgment of this Court in the Talpade case,⁵ the detention was unlawful. Each application was verified in the instance, solely by a formal affidavit. At a later date the detenu in Case No. 15 was given leave to put in and did put in an affidavit himself. This affidavit suggests nothing more than that his arrest and detention had not been made in good faith, an allegation quite insufficient by itself, unless supported by facts, to raise a prima facie case against the validity of the order for his detention. No such facts were alleged by him. In case No. 21, however, an affidavit by Dr Nalinakshya Sanyal was permitted to be put in and in the Court below it was taken to be assumed that a similar affidavit was put in each of the other cases then before the Court. The detenus in cases Nos 15, 19 and 20 are entitled to the benefit of this evidence. It is, therefore, to the evidence of Dr Sanyal, its annexure containing the report of the answers and statement of the Chief Minister in the Bengal Legislative Assembly, and the answering affidavit, of Mr Porter to which we must look for any evidence on behalf of these three detenus raising a prima facie case that these orders made prior to 1st October 1942 were invalid. In these three cases the position in law is, in my judgment, as follows. The application under S.491 is made by or on behalf of a detenu. The Crown justifies the detention by putting in the original order of detention with the recital of the satisfaction of the Governor and Ordinance, 14 of 1943. If the Ordinance or clause (3) thereof is held valid, the onus is then entirely shifted on to the detenu to establish at least a prima facie case that the order of detention in his particular case was invalid on grounds other than those derived from the decision in the Talpade case.⁶ It is not sufficient merely to allege that the detention is not in good faith or bona fide or anything of that sort. Facts have got to be alleged by the detenu sufficient to persuade the Court that, although the order ex facie indicates that everything that should have been done has been properly done, it is entitled or it is proper for the Court to call upon the Crown further to justify what is expressed to have been done in the order (vide Lord Maugham in 1942 A.C. 206 at p. 224 and Lord Wright's observations in 1942 A.C. 284 at p. 299). The detenu must accept the position that the presumption omnia esse rite acta applies to the order and that once the order is proved or admitted the Court should prima facie, until the contrary is proved, assume it to have been properly made. The burden of proof is clearly on the detenu, and it is for this Court to determine in these three cases whether that burden has been discharged.

I have read carefully through the extracts from the proceedings of the Bengal Legislative Assembly referred to by Dr Sanyal. I am unable to find anything in those extracts which goes to prove that these three particular orders, all made before, and too long before, 1st October 1942, were improperly made, save only a general statement by the Home Minister that cases may have occurred where persons arrested under R.129 have been detained although no order has been passed. Even if such a statement were sufficient prima facie to discharge the requisite burden of proof, which I doubt, any suggestion that anything of that sort occurred in any of these three cases is dispelled at once by the answering affidavit of the Additional Secretary. Further, there is nothing in the evidence of Mr Porter relating to these three cases which indicates that anything was done which could not, in my judgment, properly have been authorized to be done by the Provincial Government. The materials in each case were examined by Mr Porter and the Home Minister consulted. In Case No. 15 and Case No. 20 the order was not made until the instructions of the Home Minister had been received. In Case No. 19 after Mr Porter's examination of the case he put the matter before the Home Minister, but as the period for which detention under R. 129 was about to expire or had just expired before he actually received the Home Minister's instructions he himself made the order before the period of detention under R.129 actually expired. The deduction which the Court should, I think, draw from this evidence is that whilst the normal procedure was for the Additional Secretary to examine the cases make his recommendations to the Home Minister and act on the latter's instructions Mr Porter would be justified in an emergency in making the order himself and reporting the matter to the Home Minister. Such a procedure might, in my judgment, both in fact and in law have been validly authorized by the Provincial Government. In the absence of proof that the procedure disclosed in these cases in Mr Porter's affidavit either was not in fact or could not in law be properly authorized by the Provincial Government, in my judgment the presumption that everything was properly done should be held by this Court to prevail. There is no evidence that in fact what was done was authorized. I have considered whether in law there is anything to prevent the duty of dealing with these cases being assigned to Mr Porter, an Additional Secretary, to investigate and report to the Home Minister and act normally on his instructions but in an emergency to act himself. In my judgment, there is nothing in law which would prevent this procedure being authorized by the Provincial Government. If therefore the Court ought to act upon the presumption, there is no legal difficulty in the way.

It is true that neither Mr Porter's affidavit nor the statements and answers of the Home Minister set out what in fact was the prescribed procedure for dealing with these cases, or indicate the rules of business or other authority under which such procedure could be properly prescribed. The result was that the Advocate-General for Bengal took such facts as appeared from the evidence and attempted to establish affirmatively from these facts and certain section of the Constitution Act and rules of business of the Provincial Government that the procedure adopted was in fact duly authorized. If the burden of establishing this affirmative case had been on the Advocate-General, I should have felt difficulty in finding that he had discharged it in the absence of clear evidence of what was the procedure prescribed and of the authority by whom and the manner in which it was prescribed. The Advocate-General did however satisfy me by his argument that what appears from the evidence to have been done might legally have been prescribed by the Provincial Government and in my judgment, that is sufficient to rebut any suggestion which arises, if indeed any suggestion does arise, from the evidence on which these detenus are entitled to rely as suggesting the inaccuracy of the recitals in the orders for detention. At one time I was inclined to agree with my brothers that having regard to the provisions in S.2 (5), Defence of India Act, there ought to have been an express delegation to some officer under that section to deal with these cases. I am satisfied, however, that is not necessary and that clause only requires a delegation where matters cannot be dealt with by the Provincial Government in the manner in which it normally deals with its executive business.

I have come to the conclusion that the Constitution Act on its true construction does authorize the Provincial Government to deal with the executive business arising out of the administration of the Defence of India Act and its rules, not excepting Rule 26, in accordance with rules of business made under S.59 (3) and the powers conferred by S.49, and that those powers are not controlled and superseded (to use an expression very familiar in this case) but are supplemented by the express power of delegation, contained, in S.2 (5), Defence of India Act, to any officer or authority not being an officer or authority subordinate to the Central Government. This power of delegation so conferred goes further as regards the selection of the person or authority to execute the powers or duties on behalf of the Provincial Government than any powers expressly or impliedly available under the powers of the Constitution Act to a Provincial Government for carrying out its executive duties. This power of delegation appears to me to be a most useful supplementary power to deal with difficult or distant administrative problems which would strain the ordinary machinery of Provincial Government. Moreover if this express power was intended to supersede or modify the powers contained in the Constitution Act for the carrying on of the executive business of the Province, I should have expected the provisions of the Defence of India Act to have made that position clear beyond doubt and to have found sub cl. (5) of S.2 introduced by some words such as 'notwithstanding anything in the Government of India Act, 1935' to indicate that if any of the new duties and powers were to be assigned to officers of the Provincial Government, such assignation was not in any case to be effected under the normal powers of the Government of India Act but must be effected by some delegation under sub-clause (5) of S.2. It follows that I accept the argument of the Advocate-General that such matters as those to be dealt with under Rule 26 could be dealt with in accordance with rules of business made or to be made under S.59 (3), Constitution Act.

I am accordingly of the opinion that in these three cases the appeals should succeed. There remains Case No. 18. This is the case of a detenu who had not previously been arrested under R.129 when the order for his detention was made. His case also did not come within the purview of the objectionable routine order. Here again the evidence upon which the detenu is entitled to rely (which includes Dr Sanyal's affidavit and the annexure thereto) does not appear to me to raise a prima facie case against the accuracy of the similar recital in the order for his detention. On the contrary, in this case the deduction which I draw from the whole evidence is that the procedure adopted is consistent with the literal accuracy of the recital, namely, that the Governor satisfied himself personally before the order was made. What I have said of the last three cases equally applies to this case. In my judgment therefore the appeal in this case should also be allowed.

There are two points on which I desire to say something further: (1) It was suggested by the Advocate General of Bengal that the satisfaction required by rule 26 was not a condition precedent to the exercise of the power. I do not take this view. I have already indicated that in my opinion it is a condition to be fulfilled before an order can be validly made. This condition requires in my judgment the exercise of executive discretion and demands a quasi-judicial consideration of the materials before him by the person authorized to deal with the matter. I use the phrase 'quasi-judicial' as no doubt the person to be satisfied can allow his mind to be influenced by materials and evidence at which no one acting in a strictly judicial capacity could look. But in my judgment the person to be satisfied has to direct his mind expressly to those materials in the light of the terms of R. 26 before coming to a decision in each case. (2) Having regard to the view which I have taken of these cases from Bengal, it is not necessary, in my judgment, to determine who or what is meant by the 'Provincial Governmental' in R.26. Whatever meaning is given to that phrase, whether applying the definition from the General Clauses Act or not, in my view the procedure adopted in these cases could have been legally authorized under the Constitution Act by rules of business made under S.59 (3) of that Act, and, as I have previously said, in my view that is sufficient to dispose of these cases. In my judgment, these four appeals should be allowed, but in view of the judgment of my brothers the appeals will be dismissed in the same manner as the other Bengal appeals. As regards the appeals other than the appeals from Bengal, I, of course, agree with the judgment of my brothers that those appeals also shall be dismissed.

Appeals dismissed.

84: Kantilal Mangaldas and others (Applicants) v. Emperor [Beaumont C.J., Lokur and Rajadhyaksha J.J. Full Bench (21 April 1943)]

AIR, Vol. 31, 1944, Bombay pp. 121-4

Criminal Application No. 274 of 1943, Decided on 1st September 1943, from decision of Special Judge, Ahmedabad, Dated 21st April 1943.

Beaumont C.J. – These are rules issued on behalf of various persons who were convicted by the Special Courts established under the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 2 of 1942, and the question, which arises in all of them, is whether the validating ordinance 19 of 1943 is valid. In all the cases the trials were remitted by the District Magistrate to the Special Judge of the District, and he convicted the various accused, and sentenced them to different sentences.

On 4th June 1943, the Federal Court held that Ordinance 2 of 1943 was ultra vires and invalid as to Ss.5, 10 and 16 and the effect of that decision was that all the convictions by the Special judges appointed under that ordinance were invalid, and necessarily all the sentences passed were also invalid. On 5th June that is the day after the Federal Courts decision, Ordinance 19 of 1943 which is the impugned Ordinance, was promulgated by the Governor-General under S.72 in Sch. 9, Government of India Act. The Ordinance by S.2 repeals the Special Courts Ordinance 2 of 1942. Section 4 directs that proceedings in all cases pending under the Ordinance, the trial of which had not concluded, are to be void, and the cases are to be transferred to the normal Courts, and S.5 grants indemnity to persons who had acted under the repealed Ordinance. No difficulty arises under those sections. The difficulty arises under S.3, which is in these terms.

- (1) Confirmation and continuance, subject to appeal, of sentences (1) Any sentence passed by a Special Judge, a Special Magistrate or a Summary Court in exercise of jurisdiction conferred or purporting to have been conferred by or under the said Ordinance shall have effect, and subject to the succeeding provisions of this section, shall continue to have effect, as if the trial at which it was passed had been held in accordance with the Code of Criminal procedure, 1898 (5 of 1898), by a Session

- Judge, an Assistant Sessions Judge or a Magistrate of the first class respectively, exercising competent jurisdiction under the said Code.
- (2) Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law, any such sentence as is referred to in sub S.(1) shall whether or not the proceedings in which the sentence was passed were submitted for review under S.8, and whether or not the sentence was the subject of an appeal under S.13 or S.19, of the said Ordinance, be subject to such rights of appeal as would have accrued, and to such powers of revision as would have been exercisable under said Code as if the sentence had at a trial so held been passed on the date of the commencement of the Ordinance.
 - (3) Where any such sentence as aforesaid has been altered in the course of review or on appeal under the said Ordinance, the sentence as so altered shall for the purposes of this section be deemed to have been passed by the Court which passed the original sentence.

What it really comes to is that sentences passed by the Special Courts are to have the same effect as if the trial, at which such sentences were passed, had been held under the ordinary criminal law and the accused are to have the same right of appeal against the sentence passed at such a notional trial as there would have been if the notional trial had been the real trial. On these applications under S.491, Criminal P.C., we are not really concerned with sub-section (2), which gives the right of appeal, we are only concerned with the validity of sentences. But in the case before the Calcutta High Court, to which I will refer presently, it was suggested that serious difficulties were likely to arise under sub-section (2), and that the right of appeal thereby conferred is largely illusory, and it was held that the anticipated difficulties arising under sub-section 2 may properly influence the construction to be placed on sub-section (1). With regard to that argument I will only say that I do not agree that the right of appeal conferred by sub-section (2) is illusory.

[Omitted: Some technical arguments against the position of the Calcutta High Court -- Ed.]

The question, which arises for decision is whether an Ordinance validating sentences of Courts, which are not legally constituted, and, therefore, not legally capable of passing the sentences, is within the competence of the Governor-General. It was pointed out that S.3 does not purport to validate the convictions; it only validates the sentences. But in dealing with habeas corpus applications under S.491, Criminal P.C., it is the sentence with which the Court is concerned, and not the conviction. It was suggested further that S.3 is invalid, because it seeks to set aside, and treat as of no effect, the decision of the Federal Court by which the Government of India is bound. There would be considerably more force in that argument if the section had provided that the convictions passed by these illegal Courts were valid, and it was probably to forestall such an argument that the convictions were not validated, though the sentences were. It seems to me impossible to argue that this Ordinance sets at naught the decision of the Federal Court. It repeals the Special Court Ordinance 2 of 1942, so that Ordinance has gone even if an appeal to the Privy Council from the decision of the Federal Court succeeds. It accepts the Federal Court's decision that the convictions by the Special Courts are invalid. All that the Governor-General does by Ordinance 19 is to say that it is necessary in the interests of the peace and good Government of British India that persons, who have been found by officials of the State, normally competent to exercise judicial functions though not competent in the particular cases involved, to have been guilty of acts prejudicial to public safety, should continue to suffer the sentences which those officials thought appropriate, unless the sentences are altered in appeal or revision by the ordinary Courts. If the Governor-General thinks that such action is necessary in the interests of the peace and good Government of British India, his action does not in any way conflict with the decision of the Federal Court as to the invalidity of trials by the Special Courts.

The only point, therefore, which we have to consider is whether the validating of sentences illegally passed is competent to the Governor-General. It has been pointed out by the learned Advocate General that legislation validating sentences not passed according to law is not unusual. Reference was made to S.5, Indemnity Act, 1929, and to the decision of the Privy Council in 1907 A.C. 93 in which the Privy Council was dealing with a Natal Statute validating sentences passed by Courts martial, and also to the observations of Sir Maurice Gwyer in 1940 F.C.R. 110, particularly at pp. 134 and 136.

In India the question turns first of all, on the construction of S.72 in Sch. 9 Government of India Act, and under that section an Ordinance passed by the Governor-General and in the like force of law as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature. The restriction in the section providing that the Ordinance is only to remain in force for six months has been removed during the pendency of the present war, so that the question narrows itself into this; whether a validating enactment of this character is within the competence of the Indian Legislature. That depends on whether such enactment falls within any of the three lists in Sch. 7, Government of India Act. The Central Government can at the present time legislate in matters included in any of the three lists. I feel no doubt that a validating enactment of this character falls within items 1 and of the Concurrent List 3 as coming within the general headings 'Criminal Law' and 'Criminal procedure' I think it would also come within item 1 of the provincial List 2 as covered by 'the administration of justice'. Therefore I feel no doubt that this validating Ordinance is one which it was competent to the Governor-General to pass.

The question has been considered in three other High Courts Calcutta, Madras and Patna. In the Calcutta High Court in 47 C.W.N. 757 the majority of the Court came to the conclusion that S.3 of the impugned Ordinance only validated sentences up to the time at which an appeal or revision application against the sentence could be heard, and that it would be the duty of any Court exercising the appellate or revisional jurisdiction to set all the sentences aside, and direct that the accused person be thereupon tried under the Ordinary law of the land. I must confess that I share the difficulty felt by the Patna and Madras High Courts in seeing how the conclusion of the Calcutta High Court can be reconciled with the language of S.3 of the Ordinance. There is nothing whatever in S.3 to suggest that the period for which the sentences were validated was to expire as soon as an appeal or a revision application was heard, and if that was the effect of the Ordinance, it would render difficult the position of a persons convicted by a Special Court who did not desire to appeal from the sentence, and preferred to serve out the sentence, rather than run the risk of a new trial and, possibly, an enhanced sentence. There is, moreover, nothing whatever in S.3 to suggest that in all appeals and revision applications under the section the Court is bound to allow the appeal, and set the convictions aside, and direct the accused to be tried under the normal law of the land. If the Ordinance had so directed, difficulties would have arisen in case an appeal to the Privy Council against the Federal Courts decision were successful, in which case any further of the accused would presumably be a nullity. Moreover, as the Patna High Court has pointed out, if the intention of the Governor-General is that all the persons convicted by the Special Courts should be set at liberty, and retried by the normal Courts, it was quite unnecessary to pass

S.3 because if that section has been omitted, all persons convicted by the Special Courts would have been released, and there would have been no legal objection to those persons being prosecuted again under the Criminal Procedure Code. I am not, therefore, prepared to accept the view of this Ordinance which was taken by the Calcutta High Court.

The Madras and Patna High Courts both considered that Ordinance 19 was valid, and as I agree with their decision and the reasons given by them, and as those Courts have discussed in considerable detail the various matters which have been argued before us, I do not think necessary to cover again the ground covered by those decisions. I agree particularly with the reasoning in the judgment (if I may say so, the admirable judgment) of Brough J. in the Patna Court. In my judgment, Ordinance 19 of 1943 is valid, and all these rules therefore must be discharged.

Lokur J. — I agree and have very little to add. It is now well settled by the ruling of the Privy Council in 58 I.A. 169 that under S.7 in Sch.9, Government of India Act, 1935, which authorizes the Governor-General. In cases of emergency, to promulgate Ordinances for the peace and good Government of India, the Governor-General alone is the sole judge of whether the Ordinance conduces to the peace and good Government of British India as contemplated by the secun. It is also settled by A.I.R. 1943 F.C. 36 at p. 54 that the Central Legislature has power at present to make laws with respect to any matter in any of the three lists in the Legislative Lists given in Sch.7, Government of India Act, and, as held in A.I.R. 1943 F.C. 1 the Governor-General can also, under S.72, make and promulgate Ordinance in respect of any such matter. In Ordinance 19 of 1943, the Governor-General has announced that an emergency has arisen to make that Ordinance and his discretion in the matter cannot be questioned by us. That emergency was evidently the ruling of the Federal Court in A.I.R. 1943 F.C. 36 that the setting up of the Special Courts under Ordinance 2 of 1942 was ultra vires, and, therefore, the conviction Accepting that decision, the Governor-General abolished those Courts but has given effect to the sentences passed by them by S.3 (1) of Ordinance 19 of 1943. In doing so, he has not in any way flouted the decision of the Federal Court. What he has stated in effect is: I now know that the Special Courts had no jurisdiction to try the accused persons sent to them and, therefore, the proceedings held by them are not judicial proceedings and the conviction of those persons is illegal. But they, as the servants of the Crown, have made an inquiry into the accusations made against those persons in the manner intended by me and have come to the conclusion that they have committed the illegal acts imputed to them. Hence, though their conviction cannot stand, I think it necessary for the peace and good Government of India that they should undergo the sentences proposed by them'. The Governor-General has, therefore, ordered that the sentences should be given effect to. He might have asked the provincial Government or any officer to find out whether certain persons had committed certain illegal acts and might have issued an order as to how they should be dealt with even without a formal trial, if such a course was deemed by him to be necessary in the interests of peace and good Government of India. For validating the sentence it is not necessary that the conviction proceeding it also should be validated. This is clear from the rulings in 1907 A.C. 93 and 55 Bom. 263. Out of respect for the decision of the Federal Court, the Governor-General has not validated the convictions by the Special Courts, but has only ordered the sentences to be given effect to on the strength of the conclusions arrived at by specially appointed officers in what have now proved to be non-judicial inquiries, and it was open to the Governor-General to act upon the result of those inquiries to make up his mind as to what was necessary for the peace and good Government of British India.

The power to legislate in this behalf falls within Nos 1 and 2 in List 3 and also No. 1 in List 2 in Lists in Sch.7, Government of India Act, 1935, as pointed out by Lord the Chief Justice. This direction giving effect to the sentences is contained in the first part of sub-section (1) of S.3 of the impugned Ordinance. The second part from the words 'as if' is intended only for the purpose of sub-section (2) to show where the appeal in each will lie. The use of the expression 'as if' shows that the proceedings before the Special Courts themselves are not validated or declared to be judicial proceedings. In this case we are not concerned with the appeals, if any are filed under sub-section (2) of S.3. But that sub-section only shows that although the Governor-General is satisfied on the inquiries already made that certain persons deserved to be made to undergo various sentences, he is anxious to give them an opportunity to show that they have really not committed the acts imputed to them. That is only a concession given by sub-section (2) of S.3 and for that purpose the second part of sub-section (1) had to be added. But these do not affect the first part, which is the only operative part of sub-section (1). It was quite ultra vires of the Governor-General to promulgate such an Ordinance and I agree that the rule should be discharged.

Rajadhyaksha J. — I agree with the judgment delivered by his Lordship the Chief Justice, and have nothing to add.

Rule discharged.

Federal Court judgement as reported in press is obscure but appears to leave validity of Section 2 of Ordinance 14 unsettled. If this is so we are advised that Calcutta High Court judgement declaring this Ordinance invalid so far as section 2 is concerned will bind us until over-ruled and that we consequently cannot confidently order detention under Rule 26. Furthermore it appears to follow from the majority of judgement that every order hitherto passed in which the Governor had not explicitly applied his mind to the case is invalid and that the Federal Court's decision upholding validity of Section 3 of Ordinance will not suffice to save our orders hitherto passed in only a very few of which has the case in fact been referred to the Governor. We therefore are faced with the probability that all existing orders under Rule 26 will be challenged and may be declared invalid by the High Court and that neither in the case of present DETENUS if thereupon released nor in fresh cases have we yet power to pass orders of detention except by commitment under Regulation 3 use of which is agreed to be undesirable. We require therefore immediately both orders hitherto passed and we urge the promulgation of the Bartley Ordinance with modification to achieve this end. Porter's d.o. letter No. 1207-PS dated July 23rd refers.

Note: The 'Bartley Ordinance' mentioned above refers to a tentative proposal to reproduce D.I. Rule 26 as substantive law — Ed.

I have had some further discussion with Sir George Spence about this case,¹ but hesitate to submit it for H.E.'s orders without some further consultation with H.M., who is still indisposed. I have, however, made certain amendments to the draft summary² and, in particular, have substituted a revised para for paragraph 6, which was written before the decision of the Federal Court regarding the validity of Ordinance No. XIV of 1943 was known.³ Since the decision of the Federal Court does not invalidate that Ordinance, a reference to the matter is no longer required. Meanwhile, if the case does eventually go to Council, we are under an obligation to consult any other Departments of the Government of India which may be concerned. The only other Department of the Government of India that is concerned to any great extent is the War Department. The file should therefore, go at once to Mr Trivedi for any comments that he may have to make. It is requested that the file should be treated as immediate and be returned to this Department as soon as possible.

Notes in the War Department — (Most Secret)

Rule 26, and the Emergency powers Act, Regulation 18B, on which it appears to be based, were presumably designed to deal with the Fifth Columnist who is an individual within a country liable to aid and abet the enemy by espionage, sabotage, propaganda, stirring up internal disorder etc.

2. Speaking from memory it was on 14th May 1940, during the course of his 'We will never surrender' speech that Mr Churchill said, in effect – 'There is a class for which I have not the slightest sympathy. Parliament has given us the power to put down Fifth Column activities with a strong hand and we will use these powers until we are satisfied, and more than satisfied, that this malignancy has been stamped out from our midst'. This, I suggest, referred to Regulation 18B.

3. From the War Department point of view, it is not the Fifth Columnist in our midst with whom we are primarily concerned. It is the individual entering India from enemy occupied territory who, with good reason, we suspect may either be tainted, or even be an active enemy agent.

4. It will be appreciated that in the great majority of cases concerning persons who enter India from enemy occupied territory, the evidence lies in that territory and direct access to that evidence is therefore denied to us. Long and detailed interrogation is therefore usually necessary, involving reference to central records bearing on the Japanese 'I' offensive, and not infrequently investigations in provinces. These interrogations are initially undertaken by the Security Corps and amplified where necessary by C.S.D.I.C. In order to make these interrogations suspects must be held, and it is arguable that the system of holding suspects in F.I.C's under detention order under Rule 26 was always clumsy, as this Rule designed for the continued detention of persons against whom there were grounds for believing they would commit some action prejudicial to the internal War effort.

5. It follows as regards F.I.Cs and C.S.D.I.C. that what is required is clear cut powers to hold during interrogation for which Rule 26 was not intended.

6. When as a result of interrogation it is decided that a suspect is an enemy agent, fundamentally disloyal or (from the information he possesses) a menace to the Security of plans and Operations, then, at that stage we require powers of detention, for as long as may be necessary from the military point of view, to detain him.

7. For this purpose, Rule 26, as it at present exists can and has been used, although not specifically designed for this purpose. The proposed severe limitations, however, will make it impossible for military purposes, in view alone of the paramount necessity for secrecy and speed in disposal.

8. To sum up. We contend.

- (a) Rule 26 was not designed to deal with the problem offered by the external agent, and the legal objections raised to the operation of that Rule do therefore NOT apply to the external agent, but to the internal 'Fifth Columnist'.
- (b) To deal with the external agent the War Department requires.
 - (i) Specific power to arrest and hold pending and during interrogation.
 - (ii) Power to order detention in the case of persons who, as a result of interrogation, are shown to be directly dangerous to the successful military prosecution of the War. It must be made clear that any order under b (i) or b (ii) above should not be called in question in any court.

D.M.I.

I agree with the above noting and would only point out that we may well have up to 10,000 personnel (we already have some 250) from enemy occupied territory whom it will be necessary to detain under some powers. Already we have over 250 either actually detained permanently or pending disposal. If every person detained is to be informed in full of the reasons, allowed to submit appeals, and then each case, is to be reviewed every six months, we will need a very large extra staff and so will D.I.B. and Home Department. I do not think this aspect has been realized during the noting on this case, nor the extremely grave nature of the problem afforded by Jifs and I.I.L.⁴ To loosen our powers of dealing expeditiously with this type at the present juncture cannot be contemplated from the military security angle.

War Dept. — Mr Trivedi

I have discussed with Sir Richard Tottenham and explained to him that we must have more time to consider this matter which is vital to us.

C.M. Trivedi

H.D. Home Dept. — Sir Richard Tottenham

The above notes and my discussion with General Cawthorn and Mr Trivedi make it clear, I think, that we cannot afford to rush through these amendments to Defence Rule 26, without paying special attention to the military problems. The War Department have now under consideration a proposal for the issue of an Ordinance applying to the Province of Assam and certain parts of Bengal which will give the military authorities certain special powers in those areas. I have suggested to Mr Trivedi that he might consider the possibility of working into that Ordinance some clause which would give the military authorities the powers that they want with regard to enemy agents or suspected enemy agents coming in from outside the country in such a way as to render the use of Rule 26 unnecessary.

2. I may add here that the Bengal Government have expressed certain doubts as to the validity of their power to issue orders under Rule 26 because the Federal Court did not finally decide whether section 2 of Ordinance No. XIV of 1943 was valid. This matter has been dealt with separately in consultation with legislative Department, whose present view is that in spite of the Bengal view, it will not be necessary to issue the Bartley Ordinance forthwith. If the Bengal Government contest this view of the Government of India, it may still become necessary to issue the Bartley ordinance; but even so it must be doubtful whether the amendments proposed on this file could be incorporated in time.

3. In view of the uncertainty of the position and the fact that H.M. is still unable to deal with files, I do not think I should be satisfied in submitting these papers for H.E.'s orders at present, but I have amended the Summary and will submit it to H.M. as soon as possible.

87. Nagpur High Court judgement (Provincial Government vs Madan Gopals' case)

File No. 3/16/43 – Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

Copy of Order dated the 1st September 1943, in Civil Revision No. 292 of 1942 decided by the Honourable Mr Vivian Bose – Provincial Government V. Madangopal

Madangopal, the seventh non-applicant in this revision, is a security prisoner detained under Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules. Being a non-applicant to this revision notice was issued to him in the usual way through the Superintendent of the Nagpur jail. He made the following endorsement on the summons:

'Received the summons. I want to appear before the Court.'

2. The Superintendent returned the summons with the following remarks:

'Served and returned. Mr Madangopal is confined in the jail as Class I security prisoner. In case he is permitted to appear in the Court on the date of hearing, the proper order of attendance of the prisoner in Court may kindly be drawn up.'

3 The case was then put up to me for orders and I passed the following order:

'The seventh non-applicant is not represented by counsel. He has a right to be heard and so will be produced in court on the date of the hearing which will be intimated to the proper authorities. If however he is subsequently represented by counsel the permission will be withdrawn. Also if he appears in person counsel will not be allowed to represent him'.

4. I confess the order is not as clear as it ought to be but I did say that Madangopal had a right to be heard and that he should be produced in court unless subsequently represented by counsel. I am afraid I dealt with it more or less as a routine matter and did not realise at the time that there was any difference between a security and any other prisoner. I ought to have issued notice to the Advocate-General and ought to have heard him before making the order. As it was passed behind his back it does not bind the Provincial Government. Though the provincial Government is not a party to this revision it is the authority. Primarily concerned with the right to detain and so should have been heard.

5. As soon as my order was brought to the notice of Government it very properly asked for an audience through the Advocate-General This was granted, and now I have to deal with the Provincial Government's challenge to this Court's authority and jurisdiction to make an order for production in a case of this kind.

6. As the matter is of importance I asked Mr Walter Dutt very kindly to act as amicus curiae. He consented, and I am greatly indebted to him for his assistance, as also to the learned Advocate-General.

7. Having considered the matter carefully I am of opinion that the High Court has power to direct the attendance of security prisoners for purposes such as the present, but that as a matter of discretion it will not make such an order if the detenu can be adequately represented by counsel or otherwise, or if his interests are not likely to suffer by reason of his non-attendance, and never unless it is essential in the interests of justice that he should be produced.

8. I confess the question is one of difficulty and involves deeper considerations than would appear at first appearance in a variety of cases in order to appreciate what I conceive to be the true rule.

9. Take a case in which, the detenu is the sole defendant or respondent. What happens if he does not appear? The Court could I conceive, exercise its inherent powers of adjournment and adjourn the case until such time as he was released. But think of the injustice this would cause to the innocent plaintiff or appellant against whom the Government has no grievance. His rights to the property in suit, or to whatever other matter is being litigated, would be indefinitely postponed. Courts would be slow to punish or penalize a wholly innocent man in this way for no fault of his.

10. But what is to happen if the Court decides to proceed? It would have to proceed ex parte and that would immediately give the detenu a right to have the ex parte decree set aside. According to at least one High Court this right can be exercised in special circumstances even after limitation (See Mulla's Civil procedure Code, 11th Edition page 1175 and 640). I say nothing as to whether that is right but it leaves the law uncertain and so keeps the unfortunate plaintiff or appellant in indefinite suspense. Also, apart from the law of limitation and apart from inherent powers, it would be difficult to hold that inability to appear in circumstances like these would not constitute 'sufficient cause' at any rate when the application is made within time.

11. Well, having restored the case to file, what then? Cases are conceivable in which it would be impossible for a party to present his case properly unless he is personally present, particularly when it is essential that he should enter the box in person. However much a friend or a relative or a pleader can be instructed to make the application for restoration to file, it may be quite impossible to proceed further with any hope of success unless the man primarily concerned is personally present. Also, there are times when witnesses cannot be adequately examined or cross-examined without the presence in Court of the client. Mere instructions are not enough in such cases as anyone with experience at the bar will readily understand. If however, no one appears again after the case has been restored to file, another ex parte decree would have to follow. And after that there would be another application for restoration. And so the cycle would continue. Why should an innocent plaintiff or appellant be thus harassed and penalized?

12. Take next a case where the detenu is the sole plaintiff or appellant. Again, the case would either have to be indefinitely adjourned or the court would be bound to dismiss it in default and one would be involved again in the endless circle of dismissal and restoration to file.

13. If, on the other hand, courts decline either to adjourn indefinitely or to restore to file it will mean that the detenu will in certain cases lose his property or his rights altogether. Is that intended?

14. There is no doubt about the law apart from these special acts. A person is entitled to appear and present his case in person. Order 3, rule 1 of the Civil procedure Code, provides for that in India. It is the same as the English rule which is given in 8 Halsbury (Hailsham edition, page 283, and as to restoration after dismissal in default, at page 285). It is a right conferred by law. How far has this right been taken away or modified by the Defence of India Act and the Rules?

15. Rule 26 (b), which is the rule applicable here (I will assume it is ultra vires for present purposes), only authorizes Government to 'detain' a person. It does not authorize it to punish or penalize him in any other way, nor does it authorize acts which might deprive him of his property or other civil rights not bound up with his personal freedom. Still less does the Rule contemplate consequences of the kind I have outlined above in respect of wholly innocent third parties. Quite the contrary. Section 15 of the Defence of India Act states that 'Any authority or person acting in pursuance of this Act shall interfere with the ordinary avocation of life and the enjoyment of property as little as may be consonant with the purpose of ensuring the public safety and interest and the defence of British India'

16. Now Rule 26 invests the Central and Provincial Government and such other person to whom the power is delegated to 'detain' the person and to impose restrictions in respect of his communications with other persons if it is satisfied in respect of each particular person etc. No order has been shown me regarding the satisfaction of any of these authorities regarding the particular person before me. (See as to this my judgment in Prabhakar V. Crown: L.I.R. 1943 Nag. 154 at 166 and 167). All I have been referred to here are the general rules framed under Notification No. 348-70 III dated 5.5.1942. But those rules are framed under Rules 26 (5-A) and are rules to which the 'satisfaction' clause does not apply.

17. It is true section 16 states that no order made in exercise of any power conferred by or under the Act shall be called in question in any civil court, but the notification in question is not my 'order made' within the meaning of the section although it calls itself an 'Order'. It merely frames a set of rules. And in any case sub-rules 5 and 5A do not authorize the making of an order but only the determination of conditions under which detenus may be kept in confinement.

18. An 'Order' within the meaning of section 15, is a direction or command addressed to some particular person or persons or generally. A set of rules or conditions setting out the conditions of detention are no more orders in this sense than, shall we say, the Prisoners Act or the Prisons Act. The distinction is clear in Rule 26 itself, and merely to label a set of conditions as an 'Order' will no more make it one than labelling a package of sugar or salt will turn the sugar into salt. The part of Rule 26 which authorizes the passing of orders is sub-rule (1). The two matters are, in my opinion, separate and distinct. This is seen from a perusal of section 2 of the Act and Rule 26.

19. Section 2(2) provides that — ' . . . the rules may provide for, or may empower any authority to make orders providing for . . .

(x) the apprehension and detention in custody of any person reasonably suspected etc.'

Rule 26(I) states—

‘The Central Government or the Provincial Government, if it is satisfied with respect to any particular person . . . may make an order.

(b) directing that he be detained’. This justifies the order of detention, but it has to be passed separately in respect of each particular person.

20. Then comes sub-rule 5:

‘So long as there is in force in respect of any person such an order as aforesaid directing that he be detained he shall be liable to be detained in such place and under such conditions . . . as . . . the Provincial Government . . . may from time to time determine.

(5A) Where the power to determine etc. . . .’ The change in language is significant and was I think, intended because it is obvious Government would not want to pass orders afresh in each particular case regarding the conditions of detention though it has to do so regarding the detention itself. The conditions would be specified generally and made applicable to all.

The rules drawn up under sub-rule 5 and 5A are therefore not the ‘orders’ contemplated by sections 2 and 16 and authorized by Rule 26. The court consequently has power to scrutinize the conditions ‘determined’ under sub-rule 5 and 5A and to see that they do not contravene any law and in particular the law laid down by section 15.

21. But that apart, a detenu, who is prevented from appearing in circumstances which are likely to lose him his property, can apply under section 491 of the Criminal Procedure Code and complain of improper detention.

22. The High Court has power to order that a person detained be dealt with according to law’, and to release him altogether if he is ‘improperly detained’. It has even power to enquire into the good faith of any particular detention: see I: L.R. 1943, Nag. 154.

23. The law says — not only the general law, but also the special law enacted by the Defence of India Act and subject to which all these Rules are made — that a detenu’s enjoyment of his property is to be interfered with as little as may be convenient with the purpose of ensuring public safety etc.

24. It is difficult to see how public safety and the like are likely to be endangered if a man is permitted to attend court under escort and conduct his case. The hearing could be in camera if Government so desires. The court room could be guarded and precautions could be taken to ensure that the detenu held communication with no one but the Judge. The man would be in full ‘detention’ the whole time. Government’s right to detain him would not be affected.

25. Or again, in suitable cases, Government could provide the detenu with counsel as it does in the case of pauper accused.

26. If with all these alternatives before it Government were still to refuse — I do not for a moment suggest that it would be so unreasonable if this court were to hold that it was necessary for the ends of justice to have the man here — but if it were to do so, then I conceive that it might be proper in a given case to conclude that such conduct indicates bad faith and that the real object of the detention was not the safety of the realm and the safeguarding of the public interest but spite against the particular detenu and an attempt to punish him indirectly by doing that which cannot be done directly, namely action which would either make him lose his property by non-attendance in court, or, at the very least, would drive him to repeated applications for restoration to file. Bad faith would attract the provisions of section 491, and as I see it, the High Court would be entitled to hold that detention 'according to law' means such detention as is consistent with section 15, that is to say, a detention which enables the detenu to safeguard his rights to property in a reasonable manner, rights which are not confiscated or take away or destroyed by the detention but which might in certain cases be seriously imperilled by Government's refusal to permit personal attendance in court. As I see it the Court would have power to see that this was put right and to order that the detention be 'according to law'. If Government were still to be obdurate not only would the court be entitled to release the detenu altogether on the ground of bad faith but also to bring into play its coercive processes in contempt.

27. I repeat that I must not be understood to suggest that Government would go against this Court's orders after it has been given an audience, but as this Court's powers have been challenged it is necessary for me to explain exactly what they are, from where the authority to act is derived, and how the powers can be brought into play.

28. But though the Court has these powers it will not ordinarily exercise them unless satisfied that there is likely to be a failure of justice otherwise. This rule is laid down for England in habeas corpus cases in In re. Greene (57. T.L.R. 533) and is indicated for India in In re. Jewa Nathso (I.L.R. 44 Cal. 159 at 476). Incidentally both cases show that the power to compel production so that the detenu conduct his case in person is there. In fact the detenu was allowed to do so in each of these cases though the Judges acknowledged later that the orders they made ought not to have been passed as a matter of discretion in those particular cases. But the orders were nevertheless obeyed.

29. That brings me back to the present cases. Is it necessary for the ends of justice to make an order of production here? Now that the full facts have been brought to my notice I think not.

30. In the first place, Madangopal is only a pro forma non-applicant. He is the seventh defendant in the case. The case is for partition of joint family properties. It is brought by the wife and minor son of the first defendant. The other defendants, including the seventh, are alienees from the first. The plaintiffs said they were paupers and asked to sue as such. Their prayer was granted. Madangopal was represented in these proceedings by a pleader. The same pleader appeared for four other defendants as well. Two of these other defendants are Madangopal's brothers. One is older than Madangopal. The three brothers are jointly interested in the alienations with which they are concerned. Therefore it is evident that Madangopal's interests are the same as those of his brothers and that they are being adequately protected by them.

31. The revision is against the order allowing the plaintiffs to sue as paupers. On the face of it that does no grave or substantial injury to the other side. But that apart, these three brothers have not challenged the order, only four other defendants have troubled to do so. These defendants (the applicants here) claim no relief against Madangopal. He is only a pro forma non-applicant. Therefore, quite apart from all else, there is no need to hear him. That also aside. Madangopal is a pleader. His elder brother is a shopkeeper and they have a counsel, who appeared for them in the lower court, resident in Nagpur. I am satisfied (1) that it is not necessary to hear Madangopal and that this interests cannot be effected if he does not come and (2) that his application to be heard in person was not made in good faith.

32. I therefore review my former ex-parte order — ex parte so far as the Provincial Government is concerned — and reject the application.

A. Examples of Sabotage etc.

Thus in May, in an attempt -- fortunately unsuccessful -- was made to blow up a railway bridge near Calicut and in Madras with charges of gelignite; the track and a girder were damaged. More serious were a successful attack made by a large armed gang in June of special train on the M. & S.M. Railway in Bombay, carrying pay for railway employees, in which the dacoits succeeded in getting away with about Rs 20,000, and the derailment of a goods train on the same railway the next day, when the engine and 13 wagons capsized. A more recent incident from Bihar was the attack on July 12th by a mob of some 30 persons on the railway station at Bidhupur in the Muzzafarpur District; telegraph wires were cut, the telegraph instruments damaged and papers set on fire. Shouting revolutionary slogans, the mob then passed on to the local post office where they burnt and damaged papers and removed some cash. Two nights later, another post office in the same District looted and burnt by an armed gang of about 25 men.

I am glad to say that there has been a marked decline in the number of bomb outrages. This may be largely attributed to successful police station, particularly in Bombay which was of course most affected by this form of outrage, against the headquarters where the bombs were prepared and the outrages planned. An outstanding incident was the capture by the police in Bombay in the latter half of April of virtually the entire 'Bombay provincial Destruction Centre' which was believed to have been engaged in plotting bomb outrages and other forms of terrorist activities since the beginning of the movement last August.

Attacks on Government servants and on persons who offered assistance to Government during the rebellion have continued. The centre of this form of outrage was formerly Bombay, but the position there, particularly in the Karnatak, has been very considerably improved by a concerted drive against the leaders of the rebellious gangs which were formerly roving this part of the country. Large forces of police and Intelligence officers, assisted by a whole Brigade of the Military, were concentrated in this area and their operations have resulted in the rounding up of a large number of saboteurs. The position in this respect is now worst in Bihar where the Congress underground organisation is perhaps at its most active. Typical incidents are the cutting off of the nose of a chaukidar of a village in the Bhagalpur District of Bihar by a gang of Congress volunteers carrying the Congress flag; an assault on a chaukidar in the Purnea district by a gang of 6 men who bound him and threatened to murder him; and the murder of a Police informer near Thana Bihpur; and the murder of a chaukidari 'panch' also in the Bhagalpur District. On June 19/20th, a large gang raided the house of a postal peon of Banka who had given information to the Police which lead to the arrest of an absconder. During the month of August, a number of reprisals were reported from the Bhagalpur District of Bihar against rural Police and informers, these incidents including the murder of the father of a witness who gave evidence in the disturbances last year, the disappearance of a police informer who has probably been kidnapped, the murder of another informer and of a village chaukidar, and the Kidnapping of a liquor-shop vendor who is a complainant in one of the dacoity cases arising out of last year's rebellion. The seriousness of these incidents lies of course in the effect they have in deterring other persons from giving evidence to the police, and a difficult situation has not been eased by the release on bail by the Patna High Court of a large number of dangerous rebels who were convicted under the special Criminal Courts Ordinance and whose cases are now pending appeal in the ordinary courts following on the repeal of that ordinance.¹

Important

Federal Court pronounced judgment on Tuesday. In common Judgment Varadachariar and Zafrulla held:

(1) That section 3 of Ordinance XIV did not directly amend or repeal any provision of the Defence of India Act and was not so dependent on or connected with section 2 as to be incapable of being given effect to by itself irrespectively of whether section 2 was valid or not.

(2) That section 3 was validly operative at its face value, with the result that orders made in conformity with rule 26 before the commencement of Ordinance XIV could not be challenged.

(3) That it was therefore unnecessary to decide the questions raised with reference to section 2 including the question whether an Ordinance can repeal or amend an Act of the Indian Legislature.

(4) That an order cannot be held to have been made in conformity with rule 26 if it is shown that the Government making the order was not satisfied in the terms of the rule, and that sub-section (2) of section 59 of the Constitution Act precludes the questioning of an order expressed to be an order made or executed in the name of the Governor on the ground that the order was not so made or executed, but that where Indian Legislation required satisfaction as a condition precedent to the making of an order, the questioning of an order so expressed on the ground that the Governor was not satisfied is not precluded.

(5) That in the case of the appeals from the judgments of the Allahabad, Lahore and Madras high Courts dismissing habeas corpus applications by the detenus concerned there was nothing to suggest that the Provincial Government was not so satisfied, and that those appeals should therefore be dismissed.

(6) That the making of orders under rule 26 attracts the individual judgment of the Governor; that in the light of sub-clause (a) of clause (43a) of section 3 of the General Clauses Act the reference to the Provincial Government in rule 26 falls to be construed as a reference to the Governor exercising his individual judgment; that in the absence of a delegation under sub-section (5) of section 2 of the Defence of India Act, a Secretariat officer can derive no authority from section 49 or from the rules of business under sub-section (3) of section 59 of the Constitution Act to make orders under rule 26; that the evidence shows that the Governor was not consulted and cannot therefore have been satisfied in the case of any of the orders forming the subject matter of the appeals from the Bengal Government from the decisions of the Calcutta High Court directing in question to be released; that all those orders were bad on this ground; and that all the appeals by the Bengal Government should therefore be rejected.

2. In a separate judgment, the Chief Justice concurred in the majority findings (1) to (5) but dissented from finding (6), holding that the Constitution Act on its true construction does authorize the Provincial Government to deal with the executive business arising out of the administration of the Defence of India Act and Rules, not excepting rule 26, in accordance with the rules of Business made under section 59 (3) and powers conferred by section 49. It was, however, proved by evidence and admitted by the Bengal Government that on the 1st October 1942 a procedural order had been issued to the effect that where the police had made an arrest under rule 129 and recommended the making of an order under rule 26. Such order should be made forthwith as a matter of routine, and that the question whether the continued detention of the person in respect of whom such order had been made was justifiable in the terms of rule 26 should be reserved for early subsequent examination. The Chief Justice distinguishes the cases under appeal according to the orders under rule 26 were made before or after the date of this procedural order and concludes that there are no grounds for impugning the validity of the orders made before that date, but that the orders made after that date must be held to be bad for want of antecedent satisfaction in terms of rule 26 on the part of the authority making the order in the name of the Provincial Government. He would accordingly have accepted the appeals of the Bengal Government in the case of the four persons in respect of whom the orders under rule 26 were made before the 1st October 1942.

3. Orders having been passed in the sense of majority findings (5) and (6), the Court granted the Bengal Government leave to appeal to the Privy Council from the orders dismissing their appeals from the Calcutta High Court.

Your telegram 152-W dated 1st September.¹ In majority judgment of Federal Court lengthy discussion of questions relevant to the validity of section 2 concludes as follows. 'The view that we take as to section 3 of the Ordinance makes it unnecessary for us to pronounce decision in respect of section 2.' It follows that it was equally unnecessary for Calcutta High Court to determine validity of section 2, that observations of Calcutta High Court on the subject have now the status merely of obiter dicta, and on that question arising again in Calcutta High Court it will fall to be decided as res integra but with due regard to the observations of the Federal Court which though inconclusive point strongly to the conclusion that in so far as its prospective operation is concerned section 2 is valid. In the circumstances we consider that resort should be to power conferred by rule 26 as and when required. We realise that orders made under rule 26 after commencement of Ordinance XIV will almost certainly be challenged on ground that section 2 is invalid, but we consider that such challenge ought not to succeed and that there is a reasonable probability that it will not succeed, and we are not prepared to recommend Governor General to promulgate Bartley Ordinance unless and until future resort to rule 26 is successfully challenged.

2. Following lead given in Federal Court judgment we consider that power to make orders under rule 26 should be delegated under sub-section (5) of section 2 to such secretariat officers as may be considered suitable for the purpose.

3. Past orders vitiated on Federal Court ruling by the fact that Governor was not satisfied should be replaced as soon as may be consistently with proper de novo consideration in the light of satisfaction requirement of rule 26 by new orders made by a Secretariat officer in pursuance of the delegation suggested in paragraph 2.

4. We would add that even if we had been otherwise prepared to recommend promulgation of Bartley Ordinance we would have regarded it as out of the question to validate orders made after the passing of the manifestly indefensible procedural order of the 1st October 1942.

I think that we should proceed with these proposals for the reasons given in my note of the 18th August¹ out of which they arose, and I accept the Summary as a correct presentation of the stage now reached in the discussions. I agree with Additional Secretary that the military requirements explained in the War Department noting² above should be provided for in some different manner not involving the use of Defence Rule 26 which was clearly not designed for such purposes. I fully recognize the imperative necessity of those requirements, but they cannot be allowed to tie our hands in dealing with Rule 26 in such a manner as considerations of public policy demand. The section of Security Prisoners in which the public (and the Courts) are interested is the class commonly known as 'political' and little question would, I think, arise if powers of a different character were taken to hold suspects arriving from enemy occupied territories.

2. We can, therefore, for the moment consider the matter only from the civil point of view. One difficulty which has been met with in framing concrete proposals has been the doubt whether the outcome would be an Ordinance replacing Rule 26 or merely a series of amendments of that Rule. The judgment of the Federal Court has not wholly removed this doubt, at least so far as Bengal is concerned, and it is still possible that either of these two methods may have to be adopted. In some ways a new Ordinance would be the easier course because (1) it could provide more specifically for its application to persons already under detention and (2) specific restrictions could be included on the power of Provincial Governments to delegate powers of detention to subordinate officers. No mere amendment of Rule 26 would cover this point since it would be repugnant to the Act. Other things being equal, however, I thought that it would be better, if possible, to rely on an amendment of the Rule since this in itself is based on an Act of the Legislature and we do not in any case wish to multiply Ordinances unless they are strictly necessary. I presume, however, that it would be possible to provide in the amended rule that persons previously detained should be entitled to the benefit of the new provisions as though they were persons newly detained.

3. Of the alternative methods of providing for periodical review of cases mentioned at B in para 3 of the Summary I am inclined to prefer the first (my original suggestion) if a new Ordinance is to be issued. But I would accept the second alternative if it is considered more convenient, as may well be the case if the amendment is to be by rule. To my mind, however, the mere option of renewing an order after such consideration as may be necessary, as provided in the first alternative, would be less onerous than a statutory obligation to review cases, since the latter procedure would be more suggestive of lengthy and formal proceedings.

4. One question of importance which occurs to me and on which, I think, we should obtain the best advice before actually drafting is whether a right to make representations conferred either by Ordinance or by amendment of rule on persons detained would be liable to create a demand for the production of such representations. A similar provision in Regulation III of 1818 has not, so far as I am aware, led to any such demand. But cases under this Regulation would be comparatively few. Similarly I have not heard that the corresponding provision in Regulation 18B of the U.K. Defence Regulations has led to any interference from the High Courts in England. But where a concerted attempt is evident to bring the cases of Security Prisoners in India before the High Courts and where certain High Courts have shown a disposition to lend themselves to these tactics we have to be safeguarded against the possibility that, e.g., representations made by Gandhi or members of the working Committee might be demanded by the Courts for the purpose of deciding whether the person in question was properly detained or not. If there is any such danger we must seek means of placing these representations firmly beyond the reach of any Courts in any circumstances.

5. This case raises important questions of policy arising out of certain dicta of the Calcutta High Court and the Federal Court regarding the proper means by which the liberty of the subject should be safeguarded and I think that before reaching final decisions it would be valuable to have the advice of my Hon'ble Colleague the Law Member both as regards the legal or quasi-legal questions involved and as regards the general propriety of the measures proposed from the point of view of the criticisms that have been uttered. I would, therefore, propose to send these papers to the Hon'ble the Law Member for his opinion on these subjects before finally submitting the case to His Excellency.

Notes in Legislative Department.

H.M. may kindly read the Summary and the Hon'ble the Home Member's minute.

2 With regard to paragraph 2 of the minute, attention is invited to the telegram No. 152- W from the Bengal Government dated the 1st September regarding the implications of the Federal Court judgment and the Defence Department reply thereto which I understand was sent in consultation with Secretary (Sir George Spence). While I agree that the observations of the Federal Court point strongly to the conclusion that in so far its prospective operations are concerned, section 2 of Ordinance XIV of 1943 is valid, they point equally strongly to the conclusion that its validity as 'retroactive' law is unlikely to be upheld by the Federal Court. Vide pages 9 and 10 of the typed copy of the judgment. If rule 26 and of orders made thereunder after 27.4.43.

92: Official Notings reg. treatment of security prisoners (dt 8.9.43–10.9.43) (extracts)

File No. 44/37/43 – Home Poll (I)

[NAI]

One major point has already arisen out of our correspondence with Provincial Governments regarding the treatment of security prisoners. This is set forth in Mr Olver's note of August 27th¹ as a result of the Bihar Government's letter of August 13th.² I should like to discuss sometime with H.M.

2. Two smaller points have also emerged:

- (1) The grant of personal allowances; and
- (2) The grant of family allowances.

As regards (1), I think we should tell all Provincial Governments that we have no objection to the practice which has already been approved in certain Provinces of providing small monthly allowances for the purchase of miscellaneous articles so long as no cash is allowed to find its way into the hands of the security prisoners themselves.

As regards (2), the Assam Government seems to be in some doubt as to our intentions and I confess that I have never been quite happy about the stricter formula that we have recommended for application in this respect to Congress security prisoners. It would, I think, be better to have a single formula for all and certainly this would be much easier to defend in the Legislature.

3. Pending discussion on these points I have not authorized the issue of the draft letter below to Assam,⁴ but I think we must take a rather stronger line with them over parole releases. I do not think that these should be allowed for the performance of religious ceremonies.

(R. Tottenham)
Secretary, 8.9.43.

I have spoken to H.M. who agrees that we may now inform provinces that we do not regard the separate classification of congress S.Ps as a principle on which uniformity is necessary. The position should be as in para 4 (1) of our letter of July 21st with the modification that, even where separate accommodation for these prisoners is available, we should raise no objection if any particular province wished to classify the prisoners into two classes and give them the treatment appropriate in physical matters to those two classes. The reservation regarding uniformity in the matter of correspondence – see sub-para (7) of para 4 of our letter – would still hold good.

2. H.M. also agreed that we could inform all Provinces if so desired that there would be no objection to some small allowance for sundries, if Provinces wished to adopt that course, provided that no cash found its way into the hands of security prisoners.

3. Finally H.M. agreed that we could also inform provinces that we are no longer convinced that separate and stricter treatment for Congress security prisoners is absolutely necessary in the matter of family allowances. Any Province that desires to maintain a stricter standard will, of course, be at liberty to do so. On the other hand, if any Province finds that the stricter standard difficult to maintain, it may adopt the slightly more generous procedure laid down for other security prisoners.

4. On the matter of parole for attendance at religious ceremonies, H.M. thinks that we should take a definitely stronger line with the Assam Government, pointing out that ex hypothesi, these people have been detained to prevent their acting in a prejudicial manner and that if they are allowed freedom to attend religious ceremonies, the justification for their detention must largely disappear. We should add that so far as we are aware convicted prisoners are not allowed these concessions and therefore we cannot understand how religious susceptibilities could be seriously disturbed if the same rule were applied to security prisoners. I gather that no other Province has raised this difficulty and, if so, this also might be pointed out to the Assam Government.

93: Official Notings on legal advice and the right of the detenus to make representation — (dt 10.9.43-22.10.43) (extracts)

File No. 44/32/44 - Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

As regards para 4 of the Hon'ble the Home Member's minute¹ it seems unlikely that a Court will have occasion to call upon the Government to produce a representation made by a detenu under the new provision. Section 16 (1) of the Defence of India Act provides that no order made in exercise of any of the powers conferred by or under the Act shall be called in question. The disposal of a representation made under the new rule being entirely within the discretion of Government to whom the representation is made, the actual contents of the representation should be irrelevant to the proceedings in Courts on a habeas corpus application. But it is impossible to assert that in no circumstances would the Court be entitled to ask for production of these documents, and I suggest that an express provision be included in the new rule to the effect that no public officer shall be compelled to produce in evidence any representation in writing made under the rule or disclose the contents of any such representation, if he considers that the public interest would suffer by the disclosure: cf.s.124 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872.

K. Sundaram, 10.9.43.

I suggest that Government may go further and concede an Advisory Committee not necessarily on the U.K. model. The Advisory Committee might consist of a high executive officer of Government sitting with a high judicial officer By a little careful drafting it will be possible to protect the grounds, the proceedings of the Committee being produced in Court in connection with a habeas corpus application or otherwise.

A. Roy, 24.9.43.

As regards clause 11, I would like to have matter further considered. As the clause stands, Courts cannot call for the production by a public officer of the representation, but there is nothing to prevent the detainee from using a copy of the representation in Court or sending it to the prisoners giving it publicity. Either clause 11 should be omitted as being ineffective or made effective by adding a further provision making it penal to publish the representation or the grounds of detention and also making such representation or grounds inadmissible in evidence in a Court of Law.

A. Roy, 19.10.43.

2. Para 3 of the Law Member's note dealing with clause 11 raises two different questions –

- (1) Prevention of use of representation in Court; and
- (2) Breach of confidence by legal advisers of detained person in giving outside publicity to such representations.

As regards the first requirement it is evident Mr Bartley's draft does not fully cover the requirement stated at the end of para 4 of my note of 5th Sept. (earlier note in the same document) and we should ask for such amendment as will make it fully effective. The second point might conceivably have been met by an addition to the Central Government Security Prisoners' Order, but on the whole I think it better that separate provision should be made to prevent unauthorized publication of representations made by detainees or of the grounds of detention.

R.M. Maxwell, 20.10.43.

3. Clause 11. I do not quite understand the effect of the proviso to sub-clause (2). Does this mean that a legal adviser will be at liberty to disclose or publish without the authorization of the Government concerned the contents of the communications, etc., referred to? If not, what is the effect of this proviso?

R.M. Maxwell, 21.10.43.

Notes in Legislative Deptt.

Under clause 11 a legal adviser will be hit if he discloses or publishes the prohibited matter; but without the proviso it would be impossible for a detained person to consult a legal adviser.

94: In reg. K.C. Subbanna's appeal. Mockett and Shahabuddin J.J. (9 September 1943)

AIR, Vol. 31, 1944, Madras, pp. 388-9

dated 8.9.1943.

Mockett J. — This is an appeal against the conviction and sentence of rigorous imprisonment for five years by the learned sessions Judge of Anantapur. The learned Sessions Judge, at the time of the trial, was sitting in his capacity as Special Judge trying an offence under the Defence of India Rules. The accused was charged with an offence under R. 35 (A) (2), Defence of India Rules which reads: 'If any person dishonestly receives or retains, or voluntarily assists in concealing or disposing of or making away with, any sabotaged property, knowing, or having reason to believe, the same to be sabotaged property, he shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.' 'Sabotaged property' is defined in R.35 (A) (1) as meaning 'property the possession of which has been transferred by, or in consequence of, any such act as is referred to in sub rule (1) of rule 35'. And sub-rule (1) of R.35 deals with acts of sabotages. The facts are very simple. On 15th August 1942 there is no doubt that a goods train No. 405 was derailed as a result of some person having removed the rails, and there can be no doubt this was an act of sabotage, especially having regard to the conditions then prevailing. Before the learned Special Judge 15 persons were charged with various offences, the gist of which was that they were responsible for the wrecking of the train. They were all acquitted. Against the present appellant there was a charge which reads as follows.

'That you accused 16 between the 15th and the 24th days of August 1942 at Kottala near Guntakal dishonestly received or retained sabotaged property, i.e., the property lost in the goods train de-railed on the night of 15th August 1942, knowing or having reason to believe the same to be sabotaged property and thereby committed an offence punishable under R.35 (A) (2), Defence of India Rules and within my cognizance.' It will be observed that it was not conveyed to the appellant what property he is said to have had in his possession. The conduct of this case was throughout characteristic of the method in which the charge was framed. It appears however that it was at some stage conveyed to the appellant that he was in guilty possession of M.Ss. 5, 10, 4, 3a, 7, 3 and 6. He was acquitted with regard to M.Os. 5, 10, 4, 3a, and 1. But he was found guilty by the learned judge with regard to M.Os. 3 and 6. M.O. 3 consisted of empty gunny bags and M.O. 6. was a bale of 250 empty gunny bags.

Possession being admitted, the prosecution had to prove in the first place that these were sabotage goods. In other words the gunny bags had to be identified. With regard to M.O. 3, the four empty bags, two witnesses P.Ws. 7 and 8 were called. In the course of the evidence of P.W. 7, it was made clear that his firm of Ralli Brothers supplied to sellers fresh gunnies and that these were not fresh gunnies. There was evidence by the same witness that such gunnies were sold to the public and therefore might have been available to the appellant. He stated as follows: 'I cannot say if M.O. 3 was issued to him (a Ready dealer) M.O. 3 bears no marks of any station from and to which the contents are booked. Nor do they bear the owner's name P.W. 8's evidence was to the effect that he could not identify M.O. 3 as among the lost bags because they had become black. The result of the evidence of these witnesses was that they were not in a position to say that the four empty gunny bags marked M.O. 3 were in the sabotaged train at all. Nevertheless the learned Special Judge, in para 16 of his judgement. Stated as follows. P.W. 7 the Sub-Agent of Ralli Brothers at Guntakkal gives evidence that M.O. 3 four empty gunny bags which bear the letter RFANTU as the bags of the company'. In fact it has never been proved that M.O. 3 were sabotaged goods.

The position with regard to M.O. 6 is as follows. The witness called to identify them P.W. 14, frankly admitted in the witness box that he was unable to do so and so informed the police. The police, instead of summoning from Calcutta persons who might have been in a position to identify these gunny bags the subject of M.O. 6 directed P.W. 14 to enter into correspondence with Calcutta and as a result that correspondence letters were put before the learned judge which satisfied him that M.O. 6 were goods that were on the train that day and therefore sabotaged goods. Apart from the question of admissibility, the documents themselves do not identify the goods. The Mills who are said to have made them expressed the view that they in all probability might be of their manufacture, because bundles of their goods were marked in the same manner in blue ink as M.O. 6. It cannot be put higher than that. But it is obvious that EX. G, series correspondence is not admissible at all. It is hearsay. An examination of the correspondence shows that the most important letter EX. G. 4 is not even from or to P.W. 14. It is a copy of letter said to have been written by the Mengna Jute Mills to Louis Dreyfus and Co., Calcutta. The only way in which the identity of M.O. 6 could be proved was calling a witness to identify them. The procedure adopted in this case with regard to the identification of these goods must be strongly condemned. There is a very special reason. This accused was a dealer in groundnuts and as such was in the habit of having in his possession very large quantities of gunnies. The evidence generally was that many bags circulated, and accordingly it was not an unusual thing for him to have in his possession large quantities of gunny bags. He actually let in evidence to prove that he purchased these very bags, but though he did call witnesses for that purpose who identified the bags as being those sold, the learned judge preferred to reject their evidence and to accept the inadmissible documentary evidence to which we have referred. We cannot help feeling that there was an impression in the Court below that the rules of procedure and evidence did not apply in these cases. Rule 23 of Ordinance 2 of 1942 by implication makes it clear that the rules of evidence apply because it expressly provides for an exception to the rules of evidence in cases coming under S.164, Civil P.C. Apart from that it is obvious that the rules of evidence would ordinarily apply unless expressly abrogated.

The result of this case is that the appellant who protested his innocence and was able to show that he was subscriber to war funds has suffered a long term of imprisonment. The appeal must be allowed. The Public Prosecutor has most properly made no attempt whatever to justify the conviction. We cannot part with the case without expressing regret that the Public Prosecutor of Anantapur placed the case before the Court in the manner in which he did. A prosecution case should never be supported by evidence which is patently inadmissible. Scrupulous fairness should have been shown in a case in which for a sentence of five years no appeal was then provided. The accused is on bail. His bail bond is cancelled. The fine which we understand has been paid will be refunded.

My dear Maxwell,

I am afraid that I have never seen any letter emanating from the Home Department which I regard as so dangerous as Tottenham's letter of 30th August¹ regarding 'Police interrogation'.

If that letter leaked out — and most letters do even if marked secret (cf. the Hallett circular!) you would have a very difficult time in the Assembly. I do not deny that interrogation is important from the C.I.D. point of view, in particular it is abundantly clear that the interrogation or investigating officer should have the necessary background; I also agree that it needs specially qualified officers to carry out these duties, in other words we want a well-trained detective staff. Though we consider that on the whole our methods of investigation, though less drastic than those of the Punjab, have yielded equally satisfactory results, yet we have recently agreed to a special interrogation centre in Lucknow, to avoid carrying on the work in jails and lock-ups, and we are by degrees building up a special C.I.D. staff for this work. I admit I agreed to the special centre with some reluctance, it will be a bungalow in Lucknow, not special cells such as apparently exist in the Delhi fort, and on the whole it seemed to me that if my senior C.I.D. officers kept close control over this centre, as they could do, it would be better than interrogation in jails or lock-ups. To that extent I am in agreement with you.

2. But the way in which the views of the Government of India have been given in Tottenham's letter very definitely convey the impression that they approve 'third degree' methods. 'Of course we did not think that the D.I.B. or the Government of India were advocating the old methods of physical torture employed by a sub inspector in a rural police station. But when we are asked to enforce 'concentration and seclusion' as the ideal psychological conditions under which satisfactory information may be obtained, surely we are being asked to adopt what most people would regard as 'third degree' methods. The views given in Tottenham's letter, in so far as they attempt to define what is meant by 'concentration and seclusion', go further than the D.I.B.'s note and are a great deal more objectionable. Then again it is suggested that this form of scientific interrogation will be useful in the case of ordinary crime. Holding as I do that this form of scientific interrogation involves mental torture and third degree methods, I interpret this as meaning that we must go back to the drastic methods of the old sub-inspector which we have tried our best to eliminate. If these views permeated down to the lower ranks, the danger is obvious.

3. I have no doubt that you are impressed by the Punjab system, but from my knowledge of that system extending over a good many years, I regard it as objectionable, even though it may have achieved some success on some occasions. My C.I.D. officers also do not like it and claim that they have achieved equally good results by less objectionable methods. We appreciate the value of scientific interrogation, that is to say interrogation by an expert officer with full knowledge of the background. But the views of the Government of India as given in Tottenham's letter go a great deal further. We shall of course be only too glad to discuss the whole question with the D.I.B. One of the main question is the extent to which detention in police custody should be allowed. I admit I do not like it; it is contrary to the principle underlying our Criminal Procedure Code and we must only allow it in exceptional cases.

Yours sincerely,

Maurice Hallett

To
The Addl. Secretary, Home Department,
Government of Bengal

Dated: 11.9.43

Sir,

I have the honour to state that one Babu Sailendra Nath Kundu s/o Babu Bankim Chandra Kundu of Sujaganj, Dist. Midnapore and of 13/A Bhabanath Sen Street, Calcutta, was served with an order of externment from the town and suburbs of Calcutta, u/r 26 DIR on 29.10.41 with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to public order.

He applied for a short leave to see his ailing mother on 5.8.43. In view of the present state of health of his mother he has however been permitted to come to Calcutta in consultation with D.I.G., C.I.D., I.B. (Bengal). He arrived here on 2.9.43. But in view of the present uncertain position of rule 26 D.I.R. and any action taken thereunder and Govt. notification No. 7689 Def. dated 25.6.43 no formal order could possibly be served on him either suspending the externment order or restraining his movement during his stay in Calcutta. He was simply informed through the S.P. Midnapore that he was allowed to come to Calcutta to attend to his ailing mother for a fortnight.

As no announcement has yet been made since the publication of notification No. 7689 Def. dated 25.6.43, I solicit instructions from Government as to how we can proceed in the matter of externment restrictions and etc. at present.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

SECRET

No. 5-3087.S.B.

From F.C. Bourne, Esquire, CIE., ICS
Chief Secretary to Government, Punjab

To The Additional Secretary to the Government of India
Home Department, New Delhi

Dated Simla E, the 17th September, 1943

Subject: Interviews between security prisoners and their legal advisers and the production of security prisoners in court.

Memorandum

Reference your secret express letter No. 3/16/43 – Poll (I), dated August the 10th, 1943.¹

I enclose a copy of a rule which is being added to the Punjab Security Prisoners Rules, 1942. It has been considered necessary to maintain the present practice by which security prisoners detained in Police custody for purposes of interrogation are not allowed interviews with their legal advisers since such interviews would break the continuity of Police interrogation and would reduce the chances of extracting statements of any value to a minimum.

2. The Punjab Government agree that there is no way open of effectively questioning the authority of the High Court to order the production of a security prisoner before it, but consider that of the various alternatives suggested the best is the amendment of sub-section 3 of section 491 of the C.P.C. so as to include prisoners detained under rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules.

F.C. Bourne

Chief Secretary to Government, Punjab

The Punjab Security Prisoners Rules, 1942

Rule 20(A)

In addition to the interviews permissible under rules 12-20, a security prisoner may, with the permission of the authority under whose orders the security prisoner is detained, interview his legal adviser in connection with a pending or contemplated legal proceeding before the proceeding is instituted. Not more than one such interview shall ordinarily be allowed in connection with a contemplated legal proceeding before the proceeding is instituted. Applications for interviews from the legal advisers of security prisoners should be preferred to the D.I.G./C.I.D. not less than 10 clear days before the date for which the interview is sought. All such interviews shall take place on the premises in which the security prisoner is confined, shall be limited to an hour's duration and shall take place in the presence of a Police officer not below the rank of Sub-Inspector deputed for the purpose by the D.I.G./C.I.D., in the case of jails in Lahore, and in other cases by the Superintendent of Police of the district concerned. Such Police officers may stop the interview if the conversation turns on any undesirable subject, and shall be responsible for preventing the passing of unauthorized communications unconnected with the case relating to which the interview is granted. The purport of all such interviews shall be reported in writing by the Police Officer present to the D.I.G./C.I.D. After the interview is over, the Police officer present at the interview shall warn both the security prisoner and the visitor that future interviews are liable to be prohibited if the visitor indulges in any publicity on behalf of the security prisoner.

This rule shall not apply to security prisoners detained in Police custody for purposes of interrogation and not charged with any substantive offence.

99: Government of Bombay to the Government of India

File No. 3/16/43 – Home Poll (I)

Home Department (Political)
Poona, 17th September 1943

From
H.V.R. Iengar, Esquire, C.I.E., I.C.S.,
Secretary to the Government of Bombay,
Home Department.

Sir,

I am directed to refer to your letter No. 3/16/43 – Poll (I), dated 10th August 1943,¹ and to the Government of India order No. 44/37/43 – Poll, dated 16th August² 1943, on the subject of allowing security prisoners to interview their legal advisers.

Paragraph 2 of the letter read with paragraph 3 of Defence Department letter No. 5–DC(b)/43, dated 2nd March 1943, lays down that if the intention of a security prisoner is to institute proceedings challenging the detention order, interviews should not be allowed except when the detaining authority is satisfied that the order was defective or invalid. On the other hand sub-paragraph (11) of paragraph 11 of the Central Government Security Prisoners Order, 1942, inter alia, allows a security prisoner with the permission of the authority under whose orders he is detained, to interview his legal advisers 'in connection with a pending or contemplated legal proceeding to which the security prisoner is or will be a party'. This expression is very wide and covers not merely proceedings challenging the validity of detention orders but every kinds of litigation – civil or criminal. It appears to this Government. Scarcely logical refuse access to counsel when a security prisoner wants to challenge his detention order and to allow it in other cases e.g. when he wants to institute money suits or file execution decrees.

The practice of this Government has been to refuse interviews with counsel in all cases and it proposes to adhere to this practice. In order, however, not to embarrass the Government of India, the rule, which is only permissive, has been adopted without change, but it will remain a dead letter.

Your obedient servant

100: Kirti Narain Singh and others Appellants v. Emperor (Varma and Reuben J.J.) (21 September 1943)

AIR, Vol. 31, 1944, Patna, pp. 345-7

Criminal appeal No. 398 of 1943, Decided on 21st September 1943, from decision of Special Judge, Muzaffarpur, dt 17th March 1943.

Prem Lall – for Appellant

C.P. Sinha – for the Crown

Reuben J – The appellants have been convicted by the Special Judge of Muzaffarpur, under Ss.143, 448,149, Penal Code, and Defence of India Rule 56 (4). In respect of the first two convictions, they have been sentenced each to rigorous imprisonment for three years. The sentences of imprisonment have been directed to run concurrently. At the time of his conviction and sentence in this case, the appellant Kirti Narayan Singh was undergoing imprisonment in other cases. The learned Judge has given a direction under S.397, Criminal P.C. that the sentences imposed in this case would also run concurrently with the imprisonment in respect of the previous cases. There were 18 other persons tried along with the three appellants. Nine of them, in addition to the three appellants, were also convicted, two of them were bound down under S.562, Criminal P.C., and the other seven were given substantive sentences. None of them has appealed.

The case arises out of an occurrence which took place on 14th August 1942 at about 1 p.m. at the Shochar police station. On that day at that time a mob of about 400-500 men carrying congress flags came to the police station shouting congress slogans. Some members of the mob were armed with weapons such as small spears, sticks, lathis and dablas. The mob entered the Thana compound some of the members got on the Thana verandah and tore down the notices posted on the Thana walls exhorting people to contribute to war funds. They wrote on the walls with chalk slogans as 'Hindustan Aazad'. Some of the mob posted a Congress flag on the gate of the hajat. Another Congress flag was posted up in the police station compound by fixing it to a pole fixed in the ground. Before the mob arrived, the Sub-Inspector of Police (P.W.I) had locked the Malkhana and the inspection room. One of the members of the mob, Harihar Pande, asked the Sub-Inspector to return the property and papers of the local Congress Office, which had been seized by the Sub-Inspector some time previously. The sub-Inspector told him that the keys are already been sent by him to the District Magistrate and that it was not possible for the Sub-Inspector to return the things. After this a portion of the mob left that place while others remained on guard near the police station watching that no work was done by the police. Work was altogether suspended at the police station from that day till 18th August. On 19th August, under the orders of his superior officers, the Sub-Inspector went with his staff to Sitamarhi where 'concentration camp' had been formed. They reached the concentration camp on the 21st at about 7 p.m.

The first information report (Ex.1) in the case was drawn up by the Sub-Inspector (P.W.I) on 22nd August, after reaching the concentration camp. It contains a list of about 33 names, including the names of the three appellants. The sub-Inspector tells us that the list was prepared by him on 14th with the help of the local dafadar (P.W.3) who is a witness in the case. Nine witnesses have deposed as eyewitnesses of the present occurrence. P.W.1 is the Sub-Inspector. P.W. 2 is assistant Sub-Inspector P.W.3 is a local dafadar 2. Ws 4, 5, 6 and 7 are police constables, havildar and P.W.9 is a village chaukidar. The main facts alleged are not disputed, and the only question in the case is the usual question which arises in such cases, namely, whether it has been proved to the satisfaction of the Court that these persons were concerned with the offence in question. There is one point, however to be considered before I turn to the individual cases, namely, whether the evidence on the record is sufficient to justify the conviction under Defence of India R.56 (4). An offence under Defence of India Rule 56 (4) is committed by a person who contravenes any order made under this rule. The only evidence upon the record relating the existence of such an order consists of the statement of the Sub-Inspector of Police.

'The order of the District Magistrate banning processions, meetings and assemblies was proclaimed by beat of drum in my claka before the date of the recent occurrence'.

Obviously, this evidence is insufficient to sustain the conviction. Before a Court can convict under this rule, or uphold a conviction under this rule, it must be satisfied that there was an order lawfully issued under this rule by an officer properly empowered thereto, which order the accused persons were bound to obey. On the statement of the Sub-Inspector as it stands, it is not possible for any Court to come to such a finding. Mr C.P. Sinha for the Crown has pointed out that there was no cross examination upon the point. The absence of cross-examination by the defence relative to this point is not, to my mind, an admission of the existence of such an order. If the prosecution fail to produce evidence which is necessary for the establishment of their case, it is not for the defence to point out the omission to the prosecution. The onus of proving all the essentials necessary to establish the guilt of the accused persons is on the prosecution. If they do not adduce the necessary evidence, the prosecution must fail, and no argument against the accused can be based on the fact that the defence failed to say anything about the commission of necessary evidence on the side of the prosecution. It is true, that the appellant Kishore Parsanna Sinha in his statement under S.342 Criminal P.C., answered in the affirmative the question.

'Did you contravene the provisions of R.56, Defence of India Rules by taking part in a procession which consisted of about 400-500 men which marched upon the Sheohar Thana on 14th August 1942?'

I would not interpret this answer as an admission of the existence of a lawful order under Defence of India Rule 56. Under the provisions of S.342, Criminal P.C., the Court is empowered for the purpose of enabling the accused to explain any circumstances appearing in the evidence against him, to put such question to him as it considers necessary. Here there was no evidence whatever regarding the existence of a proper order under Defence of India Rule 56. The Court, therefore, in putting this question went beyond its authority, under S.342. There is another way of looking at this matter, namely, that the question, besides mentioning rule 56 of the Defence of India Rules, mentions also the procession of 400-500 men, which marched upon the Sheohar Thana on that date. It would be difficult for a layman to distinguish between the two parts of the question, namely, the one relating to Defence of India Rule 56, and the other relating to the procession which went to the Police-station that day. When, therefore, he replied to this question in the affirmative he may merely have intended to reply to the second part of the question. Whether in fact his act contravened the provision of Rule 56 was not a matter of the accused to decide, that would be a matter for the Court. Mr Sinha has urged that, in view of the fact that the Sub-Inspector in his evidence refers to the order under Defence of India Rule 56 and there has been no cross-examination on the point the Crown should now be given time to produce the order and to satisfy the Court that there was in fact a lawful order under Defence of India Rule 56. I do not think that at this stage we can allow the Crown to fill in gaps in its evidence. The absence of cross-examination on the point, as I have explained above, makes no difference. The Defence were, in my opinion, well advised not to draw the attention of the Crown to the omission in the trial Court. On the above grounds, I am of the opinion that the conviction under Defence of India Rule 56(4) cannot be supported. This is a finding which affects also the cases of the convicted persons who have not appealed to this Court. [After considering the cases of the individual accused persons his Lordship held that they were all rightly convicted and proceeded - Ed.]

The next point that calls for consideration is the question of sentences. These are: six months under S.143 and one year under S.448/149 running concurrently. The offence committed was a serious one. The prosecution witnesses depose that several members of the mob carried dangerous weapons. Fortunately, there does not appear to have been much resistance offered, there might easily have been a much more serious occurrence than actually took place. For several days the work of the police station was at a stand still. In the circumstances the sentences imposed are not, in my opinion, unduly severe. Our attention has been drawn to the note made by the special judge when considering the case of appellant Kirti Narain Singh, that the services rendered by him from time to time to the police during the disturbance would be taken into consideration in awarding punishment. It is pointed out that in spite of this note the same sentence was imposed upon him as upon the other appellants. In view, however, of the order under S.397, Criminal P.C., that the sentence imposed on this appellant should run concurrently with the sentences previously imposed (which sentences according to the statement of the appellant amounted in all to eleven-and-a-half years) the sentence imposed in this case was in effect nil. We are told from the Bar that several appeals have been filed by this appellant and that in all his appeals, which have been decided up to now, he has been successful.

There is now only one appeal left in addition to the appeal with which we are now dealing. I presume, therefore, that most of these sentences which comprise the eleven-and-a-half years, mentioned by the appellant in his statement under S.342, are no longer in force. I see no reason, however, to make any alteration in the sentence imposed by the learned Special Judge in respect of the convictions now under consideration. I would leave these sentences as imposed. I would also leave untouched his order under S.397, Criminal P.C., which may make some difference in view of the appeal which is said to be still undisposed of. On the above grounds I would set aside the conviction and sentence under Defence of India Rule 56(4) against all the appellants. I would affirm the conviction and sentence under Defence of India Rule 56 (4) against the convicted persons who have not appealed to this Court, namely, Rashamohan Gupta, Maharaj Raut, Khenhar Raut, Mathuro Raut, Harihar Pandey, Janki Raut, Sheonandan Kurmi, Jugal Kishore Marwari and Birja Chowdhury. Apart from this, we see no reason to interfere with the convictions and sentence of the other accused persons.

Varma J. I agree,
R.K.

Order accordingly.

101: Law Member's Noting – Reg. Derbyshire's judgement in contempt case¹ (dt 24.9.1943) (extract)

File No. 44/57/43 – Home Poll (I)

[NAI]

The criticism of the Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court² of Rule 26 D.I.R. in so far as it involves a negation of the principle of 'Audi Alteram Partem', in contrast with the provisions relating to the Regulation 18(B) under the Emergency Powers Act, 1939, is undoubtedly cogent and reasonable and must be taken to represent the opinion legitimately held by the public. There cannot be any question to my mind that it is the duty of Government to go as far as it is possible to do so to meet this criticism and thus to produce confidence in the mind of the public that even during the stress of War and the paramount necessity created by existing conditions of securing the Defence of the country and of controlling and checking activities subversive of it, they are not unmindful of the importance of providing reasonable safeguards against the undue exercise of the power which they must possess of detaining persons without trial.

As to whether the amendments in the existing Procedure should be by a self contained Ordinance or by an amendment of Rule 26 in exercise of the powers under section 2 of the Defence of India Act read with section 2 of the Ordinance XIV of 1943, there can be no question that had it not been for the uncertain position created by the judgement of the Calcutta High Court regarding the effect of section 2 of Ordinance XIV of 1943, the only right and proper course would be to frame an amended rule under the Defence of India Act. As matters now stand, the Federal Court not having decided one way or the other on the validity of the really substantial portion of Ordinance XIV and with the appeal to the Privy Council pending, much the best course will be not to touch rule 26 but as suggested by Mr Sundaram³ to promulgate a self-contained Ordinance to embody the provisions proposed by my Hon'ble colleague the Home Member. I have not therefore applied my mind to the draft Rules suggested by Mr Sundaram.

3. I suggest that Government may go further and concede an Advisory Committee not necessarily on the U.K. model. The Advisory Committee might consist of a high executive officer of Government sitting with a high judicial officer. The committee should advise on the recorded materials which could include the grounds furnished to the detainee and any representation made by him. By a little careful drafting it will be possible to protect the grounds, the representations, and any proceedings of the Committee being produced in Court in connection with a habeas corpus application or otherwise. The Advisory Committee will deal only with original orders of detention and not with orders extending the period of detention.

4. On the question of delegation referred to in paragraph 4 of the Summary,⁴ I would recommend be noticed that the order of detention of the Regional Commissioner is an interim order.

5. I agree that it will be proper to devise appropriate provisions quite independent of Rule 129 and Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules to meet the problem of enemy agents coming into India.

Extracts from notes and orders in Home (Jails) Deptt. File No. 6-S/420/43 Re: detention of Babu Banamali Bhattacharjee and Radha Kanta Roy as Security Prisoner)

Letter No. 21630 dt 19.5.43 from the C.P. Calcutta

Radha Kumar Roy, s/o Judisthir:

Case reviewed on presentation by D.S.P., I.B. This is a young Namasudra aged about 24. The only information about him is that he was recruited by a leading R.S.P. member, brought to Calcutta and used to guard premises taken for the party and as a messenger. There is no ground for continuing his detention and he should be released but may appropriately be restricted to his village home in Dacca district. Issue these orders and show the case to H.C.M.

A.E. Porter
24.9.43

Addl. Secy.'s order above. The name of the prisoner was known in C.P. Calcutta's letter No. 21630 dt 19.5.43 as Radha Kanta Roy and detention orders were issued in that name. We are therefore to mention his name as Radha Kanta Roy in the release order.

Draft release orders are put up.¹ The Home (Defence) Deptt. may be requested to put up orders, restricting the prisoner simultaneously.

No family allowance has yet been granted to the prisoner. The report from the D.M. Dacca is awaited.

The file will be shown to H.C.M. after issue of the draft.

103: Official Notings – Access to legal advisers for detenus (24.9.43–30.9.43) (extracts)

File No. 3/16/43 Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

The Punjab letter¹ brings up the whole of the difficult question. Whether S.Ps detained under D.I.R. 26 should be kept in police custody for interrogations i.e. beyond the 2 months allowed under D.I.R. 129. We have rather shirked this question of the D.I.R. 129 and I think extracts should now be taken from that file and the point submitted for final orders.

As regards the Bombay letter² I agree that we cannot allow our instructions to remain a 'dead letter' in the manner proposed by the Bombay Govt. We may try the effect of the draft as revised. But if they remain unconvinced I shall have to submit to H.M.

24.9.43

On the file regarding custody during police interrogation, which has already been submitted separately, I have suggested that we must recognise the legitimacy of holding people under Defence Rule 26 for interrogation, where this is prolonged beyond the two months period admissible under Rule 129, and that for this purpose certain exemptions from the application of the full Security Prisoner's Order should be granted under para 21 of that Order. It would I think meet the Punjab point if the application of the proposed new sub-rule regarding interviews with legal advisers were also included in this exemption.

S.J.L. Olver

D S.(I)

In other words, while ordinarily the rule about interviews with legal advisers would apply, Govt. would have the power under the exemption provisions corresponding to para 21 of our Security Prisoners order to deny such interviews to selected prisoners, i.e. those of the type who have to be interrogated in the Red Fort.

The principle of allowing security prisoners to have interviews with their legal advisers for bona fide purposes, in addition to the interviews ordinarily allowed under the rules, is giving rise to certain difficulties. In the first place, we have had to make mental reservations regarding the prohibition of such interviews in the case of Congress leaders in the Aga Khan's Palace and at Ahmadnagar, and we have already had to take a somewhat strict line over certain legal business in which more than one of the prisoners in the latter place are concerned. There are, of course, grounds on which we can make a distinction between these leaders and other security prisoners; but there is an obvious loophole for criticism here.

2. In the second place the Punjab Government now wish to make an exception in the case of security prisoners who have been under interrogation in the Lahore Fort. There would, I agree, be grounds for prohibiting legal interviews (except perhaps, where the security prisoner was a defendant or an accused person) during the actual process of interrogation; but the Punjab Government wish to go further and not allow them to see their legal advisers after transfer from the Fort to jail custody. I must say that I do not like this idea. It merely suggests that there is something about the treatment of security prisoners under interrogation in the Fort of which we have reason to be ashamed and which will not bear the light of day. Moreover, these persons cannot be detained indefinitely and if they bring suits of the kind feared by the Punjab Government after their final release and it then becomes known that they were forbidden to have interviews with their legal advisers while in custody, the effect, I should say, would be even more damaging. I would be inclined to inform the Punjab Government that we cannot agree to this proposal but suggest that they would be entitled to make use of the fact that interviews with legal advisers are only to be allowed for bona fide purposes – a phrase which would extend to not permitting the ventilation in courts of entirely baseless and frivolous accusations. The matter is, however, one that I should like to discuss with H.M. along with the linked file.

Express Letter

From

To
The Secretary to the Government of Bombay,

No. 3/16/43 – Poll (I),

New Delhi, the 25th September, 1943

Your letter No. S.D. VI9669, dated 17th September,¹ 1943. Paragraph 2 of our letter of 10th August² read with paragraph 3 of Defence Department letter No. 5-DC(6)/43, dated 2nd

March,¹ may be open to the interpretation which you have placed upon it; but you have misunderstood our intention. While the general principle holds good that frivolous applications from security prisoners for interviews with their legal advisers are to be discouraged, we feel that principle is largely safeguarded by not allowing more than one interview before proceedings are instituted; and we regard it as important, after duly considering all aspects of the case and especially the practice in the United Kingdom, that persons detained without trial should not, except in special cases and for special reasons, be denied reasonable facilities for obtaining legal advice. Our intention is in fact correctly conveyed in the wording of the new sub-paragraph (11) of paragraph 11 of the Central Government Security Prisoners Order, 1942, which we are fully aware is wider than the formula laid down in the Defence Department letter of 2nd March, but which, in our opinion, would not debar the rejection of an application which was clearly frivolous.

2 In view of our general responsibility for the treatment of persons detained under the Defence of India Rules and directed against any single Provincial Government which consistently rejected all applications for interviews with legal advisers from such persons, we must ask you to reconsider your decision to treat the new rule as a dead letter and see whether you cannot agree to fall into line with the procedure advocated in our letter of August 10th. We shall of course be prepared to accept responsibility for defending any departure from this procedure in the case of certain persons detained at the instance of the Central Government.

[NAI]

Home Department

We must, I think, accept with regret the conclusion arrived at by the Hon'ble the Law Member in para 2 of his minute¹ that the requisite changes should be effected by means of a self-contained Ordinance rather than by amendments of the existing Rule 26. This possibility had always been contemplated and does not affect the substance of our proposals.

2. As regards para 3 of the Hon'ble the Law member's minute,² I would concede in principle that the Advisory Committee procedure is best; but the view adopted by the Home Department (as stated in para 5 of the draft Summary)³ was based on the extreme administrative difficulty of adopting such procedure in India. We experienced similar difficulties in constituting the Reviewing Committees some time ago. A 'high executive officer' who was not immediately concerned with, or responsible for, the order which had to come before the Advisory Committee would be difficult to find or to define in statutory form. Similarly the definition of 'a high judicial officer' would require care and possibly consultation with High Courts which would delay the promulgation of the proposed Ordinance. It must be remembered that cases to be dealt with by such an Advisory Committee might arise at any time and in any numbers and in this country, where the number of officers available for such purposes is so very limited, we have to be on our guard against creating by statute obligations which it might be very difficult to fulfil. We do not know the composition of the Advisory Committees in the United Kingdom. But both officials and non officials would be more easily obtainable there, and in this country it would be impossible, I fear, to associate non-officials with any such procedure. The point should, of course, be raised explicitly in the Summary for council stating the Hon'ble the Law Member's views. But on the whole we would prefer to be relieved of this obligation.

3. With regard to para 4 of the Hon'ble the Law Member's minute,⁴ I have not the U.K. Regulation available at the moment. But if we are to proceed by Ordinance this model might well be consulted. On the other points affecting delegation, I think we might accept Mr Sundaram's⁵ view and drop suggestions (1) and (3) of para 4 of the draft Summary.⁶ The position, I take it, will be that any order passed by a subordinate authority will be of an interim nature until reported to, and confirmed by, the order of the Government concerned.

4. The draft Summary will now need some revision. Where the recommendations of Home Department are stated in line 6 and onwards of the draft Summary we should explain the reason for preferring to proceed by a self contained Ordinance and then explain the new provisions which it is proposed to incorporate more or less as stated in the draft Summary, but subject to Mr Sundaram's comment on certain points and to what has been said above regarding delegation of powers and Advisory Committee. Of the alternatives suggested at B in para 3 of the draft Summary we may now, I think, in view of the advice of Legislative Department, adhere to the first (see para 3 of my note of 5/9/43).⁷

5. It would undoubtedly facilitate discussion in Council if a draft of the proposed Ordinance could be prepared and appended to the Summary. The Legislative Department, I believe, prefer not to draft until the orders of Council have been obtained on the proposals, but in practice this procedure may lead to delay since drafting may give rise to fresh questions of detail which had not been foreseen when the matter came before Council and would, therefore, require fresh reference to Council. It should not be very difficult to adapt Mr Sundaram's draft notification to take the form of a self contained Ordinance.

Defence Department should, I suppose, be kept in touch with these discussions.

I have revised the summary and pass it to legislative Department through defence Department for consideration by the latter of the proposal in para 5 of H.M's note.

2. In revising the summary I have departed in two respects from H.M's note. In the first place I have explained the proposals themselves in paras 3 and 4 of the summary, before explaining the reasons for preferring to proceed by a self-contained Ordinance. I think this comes in better as para 5. Secondly, I have slightly amended the wording of the first alternative

(which has now been accepted) in para 3B of the original summary (para 3(2) of the revised summary). Instead of the words 'Including any representations that the detained person desires to make', I have substituted 'including any representations that the detained person may have made'. The former version would invite fresh representations every six months and I doubt whether this was really the intention. In any case, it seems to me unnecessary and undesirable.

Whereas the Governor is satisfied with respect to the undermentioned person that, with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the maintenance of public order it is necessary to make this order:

4. High Court — The less said about this institution as at present constituted the better. I made a personal request to the Chief Justice to issue a direction from the High Court to Judges and Magistrates about the kind of sentences appropriate for convictions of profiteering and disobedience of the Food Control Orders, or to agree to the Local Government doing so. His reply was an attack on the Ministry, and the suggestion that it was sufficient to instruct Public prosecutors. The High Court's criticisms, however, on the Government's methods of dealing with 'detention cases were I consider justifiable, and I have turned down a proposal that we would re-issue a certain delegations [sic] to District Magistrates and Sub-divisional Officers of powers under Rule 26 D.I.R. subject to report for review by Government. . . .

Legislative Department

I had a discussion with Sir Richard Tottenham regarding para 5 of the draft Summary,² and he has agreed to the omissions indicated therein. Although the validity of restriction orders under rule 26 has not been impugned in the Courts the view taken by the Federal Court as to the validity of that rule and of section 2 of Ordinance XIV of 1943 hits the restriction orders as much as it hits the detention orders and we may as well cover the whole of rule 26 in the proposed new Ordinance.

2. The intention is that the new Ordinance should provide for the continuance of all existing orders under rule 26 and for the application to them of the contemplated new provisions, and that simultaneously with the promulgation of the Ordinance rule 26 should formally be cancelled. It is realized that a certain number of persons have been ordered to be detained under rule 26 by military authorities for purposes of interrogation etc. (vide para 7 of summary),³ and the new provisions would equally apply to them, but the period for which they would so apply would not be long as they would be brought under another Ordinance in the near future.

3. We may accordingly concur in the Summary and request the Draftsman to place on file a preliminary draft of the Ordinance as desired by the Home Department. Practically it would be a revised 'Bartley Ordinance'. The draft notification which I had prepared on 10.9.43⁴ might be of some assistance to the Draftsman in indicating present requirements.

109: Madho Saran Singh and others (Appellants) v. Emperor [Iqbal Ahmad, C.J., Allsop and Bajpai J.J. – Full Bench (12 Oct. 1943)]

AIR, Vol. 30, Allahabad, pp. 379-93

Criminal Appeal No. 494 of 1943, Decided on 12th October 1943, from order of Sess. Judge, Ghazipur, dt 19th November, 1942.

Iqbal Ahmad C. J. – After the promulgation of ordinance 19 of 1943 on 6th June 1943, numerous appeals against the decisions of Special judges and Special Magistrates in cases tried by them in accordance with the provisions of Ordinance 2 of 1942, were filed in this court and, in most of the appeals, the validity of ordinance 19 itself was assailed. A number of applications under S.491 Criminal P.C., were also filed and in those applications as well the question of the validity or otherwise of ordinance 19 was directly and specifically in issue. Before these appeals and applications were put for final disposal the question raised formed the subject of debate and discussion in and of decision by the Calcutta, Patna and the Madras High Courts, and the decisions of those courts were by no means uniform. To avoid conflict of judicial opinion in this Court on the question raised, and also with a view to have an authoritative pronouncement for the guidance of the Sessions judges subordinate to this court, who also have to deal with appeals preferred by persons filed and convicted under ordinance 2, I constituted the present Full Bench.

The circumstances that led to the making and promulgation of ordinance 19 are not, and cannot be a matter of controversy and those circumstances are set out in the judgments of the Calcutta, Patna and the Madras High Courts which will presently be referred to.

[Omitted: Quotation from relevant portions of the Federal Court judgment of 4 June 1943, and from section 3 of Ordinance 19 of 1943 – Ed.]

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that Ordinance 19, and in particular S.3 of that Ordinance, was ultra vires the ordinance-making authority of the Governor-General. This question was first raised before, and decided on 12th July by a Special Bench of the Calcutta High Court consisting of Derbyshire C.J., Khundkar and Sen J.J. in A.I.R. 1942 Cal. 489.¹ All the three Judges delivered separate judgments. Derbyshire C.J., in the course of his judgment, observed that in view of the circumstances under which, and the speed with which, the amending ordinance was passed, it would be unfair to criticise it in the way that a statute might be criticised. The proper course, in my opinion, is to take the Ordinance as a whole and in the light of the surrounding circumstances construe it so as to give effect to what appears to be its proper meaning.

He pointed out that the language of S.3, apart from sub-s. (3) is involved and that in that section words of definite and clear import like 'made and declared lawful and confirmed' as are usually used 'where it is desired to legalize something illegally done in the past' were not used. In this connexion he made reference to various validating Statutes and observed that 'to take away retrospectively' from the convicted persons the right to have their convictions quashed, would require legislation in the clearest possible terms as was done in the validating Statutes set out above – implication or inference is not enough.

He then indicated the anomalies that would arise if the construction of sub-s (1) of S.3 contended for on behalf of the Crown was accepted and summarized his conclusions as follows.

Looking at the Ordinance as a whole, as I think it ought to be looked at, and having regard to what it provides and what it omits to provide, and having regard also to the circumstances in which it was passed, I am of the opinion that the meaning and purpose of S.3 were that sentences already passed should continue to have effect as if they had been passed by a valid court, until under rights therein given to those convicted by the special courts, those sentences could be reviewed or dealt with in appeal under the provisions of Criminal Procedure Code when they should be dealt with according to law. One important feature of that law, declared by the Federal Court on 5th June 1943 . . . was that such sentences were invalid and being based upon convictions in courts which had no legal authority. In my opinion, it is the duty of the proper court which has appellate or revisional jurisdiction in the areas in which these sentences were passed to have those convictions brought up before it and quashed and, further, to direct that the persons concerned would be dealt with according to law in the ordinary courts according to the ordinary process of law. . . .

As I read that judgment of Derbyshire C.J., it appears to me that he did not hold that the Ordinance in question or any part of it was ultra vires the legislative powers of the Governor-General. He, however, held that sub-s. (1) of S.3, of the Ordinance had the effect of validating the trials held under ordinance 2 only up to the time that the matter was taken in appeal or revision or came before the appellate or revisional authority and that, thereafter the conviction and the sentence must be deemed to have been passed by a court that had no jurisdiction to hold the trial and should, accordingly, be quashed forthwith. Khundkar J., agreed with the judgment of Derbyshire C.J.; Sen J., on the other hand, disagreed with the majority of the judges constituting the Bench and held that S.3 is ultra vires. In the course of his judgment he is reported to have observed as follows.

There is a fundamental difference between a Sovereign and subordinate Legislature. No court can question the validity of a law made by a sovereign Legislature like the Parliament inasmuch as it has unfettered legislative powers. Bodies of persons given legislative powers by Parliament are in a different position — they are subordinate or non-Sovereign Legislatures and as such their Acts may be adjudicated upon by Courts which in a proper case, may declare them to be ultra vires . . . a non- Sovereign Legislature which has made a law which is ultra vires of itself cannot by a subsequent Act declare such law or any part thereof to be intra vires. To permit this would be to permit a Legislature with powers limited by some other authority to enlarge its powers by its own Act without reference to the authority creating it. How if this cannot be done directly, obviously it cannot be done indirectly, by means of drafting or other devices.

The question under consideration then came before the Patna High-Court and was decided on 20th Julv. 1943, by Brough and Sinha J.J., in A.I.R. 1943 page 346.² They formulated the question for decision in the following words. What, if any, is the legal effect of Ordinance 19? Brough J., held that the substance of the Ordinance, that is to say, the execution of the sentences passed by the Special Courts, subject to such modification as may be made on merits on appeal or in review, has been expressed with sufficient clarity to take effect and is not ultra vires, and Sinha J. agreed with this conclusion. The question whether sub-s. (1) of S.3 of ordinance 19 embodies a valid proposition of law was then considered and decided by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court on 10th August 1943 in A.I.R. 1943 Mad. 602.³ The learned Judges had copies of the judgments of the Calcutta and Patna High Court⁴ before them and they dissented from the Calcutta decisions and agreed with the pronouncement of the Patna High Court. In the course of arguments before us the Advocate-General stated that the Bombay High Court and the Chief Court of Sind had agreed with the decisions of the Patna and the Madras High Courts, but the Bombay and the Sind decisions have not so far been reported. It would thus appear that, even though there is conflict of judicial opinion as regards the validity and effect of sub-s. (1) of S.3, the weight of authority at present is in favour of the view that the sub-section is intra vires the legislative powers of the Governor-General and that subject to the rights of appeal and powers of revision given by sub-s. (2), the trial held by the Special Courts must be deemed to have been held in accordance with the code of criminal procedure, 1893 (5 of 1898), by a Session Judge, an Assistant Sessions judge or a Magistrate of the first class respectively, exercising competent jurisdiction under the said code.

In other words, the sentences passed by the special courts cannot be set aside on the ground that those sentences were passed by a court that had no jurisdiction to do so, and the appeals and revisions have to be heard and decided on the merits. That the answer to the question under consideration is beset with considerable difficulties is apparent not only from the fact that the view taken by Sen J. did not find favour with Derbyshire C.J. and Khundkar J. and further that the view taken by all these three eminent judges did not commend itself to the Patna and the Madras High Courts, but also from the fact that there is not even unanimity between the three judges constituting the present Bench and my brother Bajpal J. is disposed to agree with the view taken by Sen J. To say the least the matter is involved in great doubt and that doubt will be set at rest only on an authoritative pronouncement by the Federal Court where, I am given to understand, appeals raising the question under consideration are pending.

In these circumstances if I adopt the one view or the other, it is obvious that I do so with great diffidence and with equal respect to the learned judges from whom I dissent. After giving due weight to the arguments that have been addressed at the Bar, and giving the question my best consideration I am disposed to agree with the decisions of the Patna and the Madras High Courts, and I respectfully adopt the reasons given by the learned judges of those Courts in support of the conclusions arrived at by them. I shall, however, summarize, as briefly as possible, the reasons that have led me to adopt this course

[Omitted: An extensive listing of the reasons – not very brief – Ed.]

For the reasons given above I hold that sub-s. (1) of S.3 is valid and operative and that Ordinance 19 is intra vires the Ordinance making power of the Governor-General.

Allsop J. – I agree with the conclusions of the learned Chief Justice. As we were referred to a passage in Stubbs' Constitutional History of England on the subject of the distinction between statutes and ordinances, I think it is necessary to point out the danger of the fallacy of equivocation. The term 'Ordinance' in Sch.9, Government of India Act, has not necessarily the same meaning as it has in the passage to which our attention was drawn. It was doubtless used in the schedule in the first instance because an ordinance was to have effect only for a certain period but that limitation has now been withdrawn. It may be, as the learned Judges of the Federal Court have observed, that it is intended that ordinances should be temporary but that is a matter of policy, not of law. It is possibly the intention to have them re-considered at some time by legislative assemblies or councils but they will at no time automatically cease to have effect. They will continue in operation till they are repealed and in that respect they do not differ from any Act or Statue. It is to be remembered too that the promulgation of an Ordinance is not an executive but a legislative action. Government of India Act has given the Governor-General legislative powers in times of emergency and he is the sole judge of the question whether an emergency exists. It may appear wrong to some that legislative functions should be exercised by a single person but it is our duty to construe the Act as it is and not to question the policy upon which it is based. In the circumstances which existed when ordinance 19 of 1943 was made, that Ordinance had the same force as an Act of any legislative body created by the Government of India Act and the Governor-General had the same legislative powers as any such body would have had. As that is so, it seems to me wise in order to avoid the danger of any unrecognized effective influence to test the validity of the ordinance as though it was the Act of a legislative body.

If the Ordinance had been such an Act, I can see no ground on which its validity could have been questioned. There is no provision in the Government of India Act preventing the Legislature from creating Courts of any kind for the trials of criminals or from laying down any procedure which such Courts should follow. The Federal Court held that it was within the competence of the Governor-General to create special courts with their own procedure for the trial of offences of certain types. It found that ordinance 2 of 1942 was defective not in substance but in form, partly because it did not expressly repeal certain sections of the code of Criminal Procedure and partly because it did not itself decide which cases were to go before the special courts. The legislature could have re-enacted ordinance 2 of 1942 after removing these formal defects and there is no question of its attempting to do indirectly what it could not do directly.

If the person designate who presided over the special courts set up by Ordinance 2 of 1942 had no power to try and punish offenders their position was no better or worse than that of Courts Martial and I can see no reason why the principles laid down in 1907 A.C. 93 should not apply to this case. The fact that these persons happened also in other capacities to preside over regular criminal courts would make no difference. When they dealt with cases under the ordinance, they did not purport to exercise jurisdiction under the code of Criminal Procedure. If they had no jurisdiction under the ordinance, they had no jurisdiction at all, no more jurisdiction than a military officer or anybody else who took it upon himself to try and punish an offender. The fact that Natal has a Sovereign Legislature and India Subordinate Legislatures does not, in my judgment, affect the issue. Except in so far as the powers of the Indian Legislatures are expressly limited by the Government of India Act they are plenary powers as large and of the same nature as those of Parliament itself. There is nothing in the Government of India Act to prevent an Indian Legislature from passing a validating Act of the kind with which their Lordships of the Privy Council were dealing in 1907 A.C. 93.

It was suggested that Ordinance 19 of 1943 did not deal with any subject within the Legislative Lists excepts possibly preventive detention. It certainly does not deal with that subject. It deals with the punishment of criminal offence already committed and I cannot understand how that matter can be excluded from the denotation of criminal law and criminal procedure. We were referred to some remarks made in a treatise on the Constitution of the United States of America which, in my judgment, are not relevant. The powers of Legislature in the United States are limited by the written Constitution of that country which lays down certain fundamental rights. The powers of the Legislatures in India are limited only by the Government of India Act which is in quite different terms and makes no reference to any such rights. I can see no reason for holding that ordinance 19 of 1943 is invalid and difficulties (if any) in applying it would not make it so. I hold that the ordinance is intra vires and that that the sentences passed by the Special Courts are valid till set aside on their merits by an appellate Court.

Bajpai J. — One appeal and four miscellaneous proceedings are listed before us, and it is not necessary for me to state in detail what these five proceedings are, but it is sufficient to say that in each one of them the general effect of the Repealing Ordinance, 19 of 1943, has got to be considered. Prior to this ordinance, ordinance 2 of 1942 had been promulgated by which certain special criminal courts were constituted, and the applicants in the present cases were tried under the above ordinance. Most of the High Courts in India, including this court, had held the special criminal courts ordinance (ordinance 2 of 1942) intra vires, but the Calcutta High Court in A.I.R. 1943 Cal. 285 was of the view that certain sections of the said ordinance were ultra vires, and on 4th June 1943 the Federal Court by a majority affirmed the judgment of the Calcutta High Court. It will be convenient at this stage to state exactly what the Federal Court decided about ordinance 2 of 1942 and I can do no better than quote the views of the majority as put down in the head. Note of (1943) 6 F.L.J.F.C. 79 at page 80.

Under S.292, Government of India Act, 1935, so long as 5, 23 and 29, Criminal P.C., have not been 'altered, repealed or amended by a competent Legislature or other competent authority' those provisions of the Code must govern every criminal proceeding both as regards the tribunal by which a crime is to be tried and so as to the procedure to be followed. The Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 2 of 1942, has not by itself repealed SS.28 and 29, Criminal P.C. It is only the order of the executive authority passed under S.5, 10 or 16 of the Ordinance, in respect of each case or group or class of cases that in fact operates to repeal those provisions of the Code to divest the regular courts of their jurisdictions and to invest the Special Courts of their jurisdiction and to try any particular case or group or class of cases. Such executive orders cannot in law have any such effect and therefore SS.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance are open to objection as having left the exercise of the power thereby conferred on executive officers to their absolute and unrestricted discretion, with any legislative provision or direction laying down the policy or conditions with reference to which the power is to be exercised.

The learned Advocate-General threw a challenge to the counsel for the appellant and the petitioners to show if the Federal Court had anywhere used the word ultra vires in connexion with the Repealed Ordinance. It may be conceded that the word 'ultra vires' has not been used by the learned judges of the Federal Court, but this is only a verbal difference. There cannot be the slightest doubt that their lordships arrived at certain definite conclusions on the main grounds of attack against the validity of the Ordinance, and a perusal of those grounds makes it abundantly clear that Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Repealed Ordinance were open to grave objections. From the point of view of the Government a serious situation was brought into existence, for thousands of people had been convicted throughout the length and breadth of British India under the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance and were undergoing terms of imprisonment and had paid fines. The genesis of the Repealing Ordinance (No. 19 of 1943) is, therefore, fairly obvious; and it is set out in the latter ordinance that whereas an emergency had arisen which made it necessary to repeal the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 1942 (2 of 1942) and to provide for certain matters in connection with such repeal, the Governor-general was pleased to make and promulgate the Repealing Ordinance, in exercise of the powers conferred by S.72, Government of India Act 1935 (26 Geo. V, C.2). I shall have myself to consider the five provisions of the Repealing Ordinance later on. At present I may say at once that the High Courts of Madras, Patna and Bombay have held that the effect of the Repealing Ordinance is to validate the trials and sentences passed under the special Criminal Courts Ordinance, and the Calcutta High Court has held that no such result is achieved.

The Repealing Ordinance consists of five sections. The first section says that the Ordinance may be called the Special Criminal Courts (Repeal) Ordinance 1943, and shall come into force at once. The second section says that the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, 1942 (hereinafter referred to as the said ordinance) is hereby repealed. The third section which deals with confirmation and continuance, subject to appeal, of sentence, says in effect that a sentence passed by the Special Courts shall continue to have effect as if the trial at which it was passed had been held in accordance with the code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and notwithstanding anything contained in any other law any such sentence shall be subject to such rights of appeal as would have accrued and to such powers of revision as would have been exercisable under the said code if the sentence had at a trial so held been passed on the date of the commencement of this Ordinance. The fourth section says that where the trial of any case pending before a court constituted under the said Ordinance has not concluded before the date of the commencement of this Ordinance the proceedings of such Court in the case shall be void, and the case shall be deemed to be transferred to certain other courts who will enquire into or try the case in accordance with the code of Criminal Procedure, 1898. The fifth section provides for indemnity in the cases of servants of the Crown for passing any sentence under the said Ordinance or for carrying out any sentence passed by the Special Criminal Courts. It might be made clear that wherever the words 'the said Ordinance' are used, the reference is to the Special Criminal Court Ordinance, and wherever the words 'this ordinance' are used the reference is to the Repealing Ordinance.

The decision in Benoi Lal Sarma's case was given by the Calcutta High Court, on 21st April 1943, and the decision by the Federal Court in the same case given on 4th June 1943. The Repealing Ordinance came into force on 5th June 1943. The Government must, therefore be deemed to have been on their guard ever since 21st April 1943, and I cannot, therefore, assume that the Repealing Ordinance was enacted in a hurry and therefore, it should be construed in a spirit favourable to the Crown. All penal enactments, as a rule are interpreted in an atmosphere free from all bias and, if necessary, where there is an ambiguity, in favour of the subject. There is a slight difference between ordinary legislation and legislation by ordinance. Stubbs in his book on Constitutional History of England, Vol. II, p. 615, points out the difference between an ordinary statute and an ordinance in the following passage which might be quoted with advantage:

... The statute claims perpetuity: it pretends to the sacred character of law, and is not supposed to have been admitted to the statute roll except in the full belief that it is established for ever. The ordinance is rather a tentative act which, if it be insufficient to secure its object or if it operates mischievously, may be easily recalled, and if it be successful, may by a subsequent act be made a statute . . . the fundamental distinction appears to lie far deeper than anything here stated, while in actual use the statute and the ordinance come more closely together. The statute is primarily a legislative act, the ordinance is primarily an executive one.

And the Federal Court in *Benoari Lall's case*⁵ has said:

'Though legislation by ordinance has been given the same effect as ordinary legislation and the ambit as to the subject-matter is the same in both cases, there are two fundamental points of difference. One is that by the very terms of S.72 of Sch. 9, Constitution Act, the operation of the ordinance is limited to a period of 6 months (and even now it is only temporary, though the particular limit has been removed), and secondly, it is avowedly the exercise of a special power intended to meet an emergency. These two circumstances differentiating legislation by Ordinance from normal legislation afford ground for doubting the applicability of the principle of Burah's case to ordinance. Further, it is only consistent with the special character of this kind of law-making that the responsibility for it should have been laid on the Governor-General whose personal judgment and discretion must be taken to be a very important factor. It may be that his position cannot be described as that of an 'agent' or 'delegate', but the very conception underlying the ordinance-making power so connects it with the personal judgment and discretion of the Governor-General that the objection against delegation to subordinate executive authorities of any matter of principle is even more serious in this case. (Head — note of (1943) 6 F.L.J. 71 at p. 81).

This is perhaps not a matter of great importance for it may be conceded that under S.72 of sch.9, Constitution Act, the Governor-General can promulgate ordinance within the ambit of his power and the ordinance will have the same effect as an ordinary law, but its temporary character has to be borne in mind. It may be said that all legislation in a sense is temporary, but this is not quite accurate. It is true that legislation can be repealed and then its force is lost, but an ordinance by its very nature is temporary for it is limited to the period of emergency which has come into existence and an emergency is in its character more or less, ephemeral.

Validating Acts are not unknown to law, and Derbyshire, C.J., in A.I.R. 1943 Cal. 489 has mentioned some of the Validating Acts. Broadly speaking, the Validating Acts are of two kinds. (1) Where it is intended to validate an act done by another person when that person had no power to do that act, provided the lack of power in that person does not arise from any want of legislative power in the authority seeking to validate it. In the former case, the validation will be all right, but in the latter case, according to my view, the validation will be futile, as it will be an attempt to exercise a power which ex hypothesi did not exist. In the statutes referred to by the learned Advocate-General the defect in the Acts sought to be validated did not proceed from any want of power in the legislature validating those Acts; but where, for example a particular Legislature has no power to legislate with respect to persons and things beyond a certain territory but erroneously passes an Act which affects such persons and things and attempts to bring about certain rural relation, then upon the discovery of the mistake and after knowledge that the Legislative Act was void, it would not be open to the same Legislature to declare that the Act was a valid one, because that would amount to a repetition of the same mistake. Legitimate legislative devices are well-known, but the present legislation, to my mind, is not amongst those legislative devices. By S.5 of this Ordinance indemnity is granted clearly for acts done under the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance, and by S.4 it is clearly provided that where the trial of cases pending before the Special Criminal Courts has not concluded at the date of the commencement of the Repealing Ordinance the proceedings of the Special Criminal Courts shall be void; but I do not think that the sentences passed by the Special Criminal Courts in concluded trials have been legalized. In this matter S.9 and the general effect of the Repealing Ordinance — its pith and substance — has got to be considered. The general effect may be said to be the repeal of the Special Criminal Courts and the provisions of S.4 and the result of the Federal Court decision make it quite clear that the trials by the Special Criminal Courts are absolutely void. Is it possible then to argue that although the trials were held by the Special Criminal Courts not invested with proper jurisdiction, the sentences passed by them would be justified? It might be argued that all that matters between the subject and the Crown is the sentence for all practical purposes, but with all respect I make bold to assert that the trial and a valid trial also is of great importance. As has so often been said, 'Justice should not only be done but should appear to be done' and the appearance of justice, and even the semblance of it, can be obtained only when the trial is regular. The Special Criminal Courts are repealed and yet their sentences are said to be operative. The trials are rendered void, the process through which the sentence has been passed is without jurisdiction and yet it is laid that the sentence or, in other words, the punishment is effective. Ordinance 19 of 1943 validates sentences passed under ordinance 2 of 1942, and this is endeavoured to be done by the employment of fiction. As regards the meaning of the expression 'deemed to have been' employed in sub-cl. (3) of S.3, the observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 1930 A.I.J. 73, are pertinent and they are as follows. 'Now when a person is deemed to be something, the only meaning possible is that whereas he is not in reality that something the Act of Parliament requires him to be treated as if he were'.

By the use of legal fiction, the sentences which were nullities are revived and treated as sentences passed by a Sessions Judge, an Assistant Sessions Judge or a Magistrate of the first class. Legal fiction is a 'portent contrivance', and S.537, Criminal P.C., is very often utilized for curing certain errors, omissions and irregularities, but under cover of legal fiction death sentences cannot be resurrected. The Repealing Ordinance operates on sentences which came into existence before the ordinance was passed, and Ordinance 2 of 1942 and the sentences passed under it are dead. But if an authority has no power to bring about a certain result directly, it cannot bring about the same result indirectly by the employment of a fiction. Ordinance 2 of 1942 created courts but did not invest them with jurisdiction over any class of cases or persons but left it to the executive to invest those courts with the requisite jurisdiction, and this the Governor-General had no power to do under the constitution Act. The result was that all proceedings before such courts were ultra vires, and the sentences and convictions were nullities and did not exist in the eye of law. By ordinance 19 of 1943, the same sentences passed by the same courts which were not properly invested with jurisdiction are validated by the employment of a 'colourable device'. And in substance and in truth the Governor-General says in effects:

'Although I have not properly invested the Special Courts with jurisdiction, although the proceeding before such courts were nullities and although the convictions were therefore void, yet without bringing into existence Special Court with jurisdictions validly conferred, I declare and say that those sentences passed by those courts are valid and should be treated as sentences passed by other courts which are already in existence.'

If this in fact is the result of the new legislation, then is not the Governor-General usurping judicial powers and is it not in effect and substance as if he himself is passing the sentences? And I believe it is firmly established that the executive cannot usurp the functions of a court and pass a sentence. So far as the powers of the legislature are concerned, there is only one provision that I know of which can legislate in this direction, and that is provided for in List 2, and the Legislature can pass a law regulating 'preventive detention for reasons connected with the maintenance of public order; persons subjected to such detention' (List 2, No. 1); but this is a different thing from passing a sentence. The sentences, according to the Repealing Ordinance, still stand firmly rooted in a jurisdiction which, it is insisted, is good, although as a result of the Federal court decision they stand rooted in proceedings taken by Special Criminal Courts which had not been invested with jurisdiction properly. Speaking about the validity of the sentence I feel inclined, though not in a spirit of levity, to quote what Tennyson said about Lancelot:

'His honour rooted in dishonour stood, and faith unfaithful kept him falsely true.'

There is a distinction between Sovereign legislation and subordinate legislation. Legislation by Parliament is a Sovereign legislation and legislation by the Governor-General or the Central Legislature or the Provincial Legislature is a subordinate legislation. The Constitution Act, namely the Government of India Act, 1935, 'is enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same; and no Court in India or in England can question the validity of anything contained in the Constitution Act. The same, however, can not be said of an Act passed by the central Legislature or an Ordinance promulgated by the Governor-General. A subordinate Legislature has limitations upon its law-making powers. It can legislate only in respect to matters over which it has jurisdiction and Courts can declare (as indeed the Federal court has declared certain provisions of the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance ultra vires) that in certain respects the sub-ordinate legislature has exceeded its powers. As Sen J., observes in A.I.R. 1943 Cal. 489 at page 505:

It follows from this that non-Sovereign legislature which has made a law which is ultra vires of itself cannot by a subsequent act declare such law or any part thereof to be intra vires. To permit this would be to permit a Legislature with powers limited by some authority to enlarge its powers by its own act without reference to the authority creating it. Now if this cannot be done directly, obviously it cannot be done indirectly by means of drafting or other devices.

Section 72 of Sch. 9, Government of India Act, cannot be questioned because it is the result of sovereign legislation, but the provisions of the Ordinance (being promulgated by the Governor-General who is subordinate to parliament) can be scrutinized and in proper cases can be declared ultra vires where they are beyond the powers conferred by the Constitution Act.

It is said on behalf of the Crown that certain rights of appeal against the sentences have been provided in S.3 (2) of the Ordinance and they are sufficient safeguards, but it must be conceded that the validity of cl. (1) of S.3 is to be determined by that clause alone and not by a reference to clause (2). But I am of the opinion that this right of appeal is, more or less, illusory. A notional trial has come into existence and the trial by a Special Judge is deemed to be a trial by a Session Judge and one by a Special Magistrate by an Assistant Sessions Judge and one by a Summary Court by a Magistrate of the first class, and it is provided that the prior trials should be deemed to have been conducted by a sessions judge, an Assistant Session Judge and a Magistrate of the first class respectively exercising competent jurisdiction under the Code of Criminal Procedure. Now under the Criminal Procedure Code Sessions Judges and Assistant Sessions Judges conduct their trials with the help of a jury or with the help of assessors. Under S.418, Criminal P.C., in trials by jury appeals lie only on questions of law. If therefore regard is paid to the provisions of cl. (2) question of fact cannot be agitated in connection with those offences where the trial by the Session Judge and the Assistant Sessions Judge in respect to a particular offence would, under the law, have to be conducted with the help of a jury. Where previous trials were held by a Summary Court, the convicted persons will have a right of appeal on questions of fact, but as the repealed Ordinance had special rules of evidence and special rules of procedure it will not be open to the appellants to show that certain procedure provided by the Criminal Procedure code was violated and certain rules of evidence enunciated in the Evidences Act were not followed. Apart from that, the pith and substance of the Repealing Ordinance is that the former proceedings are rendered void and it will be necessary for the appellate Court to look into those void proceedings and to try and administer justice within a narrow compass. I do not, therefore, think that the right of appeal is, in any sense, a valuable right.

I shall now discuss some of the important cases which have a bearing on the point under consideration.

[Omitted: References to more than a dozen cases, from the legal history of British India, Canada, and the Union of South Africa – Ed.]

. . . The principles laid down in these cases are applicable to the point under discussion in the present cases, and I hold the view that the sentences passed by the Special Criminal Courts under Ordinance 2 of 1942 must be quashed.

Appeal dismissed.

Official Notings

1. In paragraph 3 of my note dated 24.9.43,¹ when I said that the Advisory Committee might consist of a high executive officer of Government sitting with a high judicial officer, I intended that the Committee should consist of specific officers falling within certain categories. I did not intend that the words 'high executive officer' or 'high judicial officer' should be used in the Ordinance. My idea is that the Central Government and each of the Provincial Governments should have an Advisory Committee. In the case of the Central Government, the Advisory Committee might consist of, say, the Secretary or the Joint Secretary of the Legislative Department and the District Judge of Delhi or any District Judge of 10 years', standing. In the case of a Provincial Government, the committee might consist of, say, the Judicial Secy. and a District Judge of 10 years; standing.

2. As regards the draft Ordinance itself, I would prefer that the proviso to clause 6 (1) should be omitted. I do not think the proviso is really necessary. The substantive provision merely enacts that the orders of detention should not be capable of being challenged on one particular ground. If there are other valid grounds of challenge they would be available to the detainee without the help of the proviso.

3. As regards clause 11, I would like to have the matter further considered. As the clause stands, courts cannot call for the production by a public officer of the representation, but there is, nothing to prevent the detainee from using a copy of the representation in court or sending it to the Press or giving it publicity. Either clause 11 should be omitted as being ineffective or made effective by adding a further provision making it penal to publish the representation or the grounds of detention and also making such representation or grounds inadmissible in evidence in a Court of Law.

4. As regards the Preamble, I am inclined to prefer the old one, but would like to have it added to in order to bring out that the object of the grounds of detention and to put a limit to the duration of such detention.

5. Rule 26 should remain in the Statute Book, though possibly as a dead letter, till the question of vires is decided by the Privy Council. The cancellation of the Rule now may mean that the Privy Council will refuse to adjudicate on the validity of a Rule which is no longer in force.

We could issue a fairly convincing and rather cutting reply to the C.B.R.'s memo.¹ I do not think we need, in any case, delay the issue of our letter until we have C.B.R.'s final views and I would be inclined to delay our reply to C.B.R.'s memo until we have issued our draft and to present them with a fait accompli.

This memo needs no reply. The CBR have only made some debating points and do not (as I read their letter) object to the principle. The suggestion in para 7 of their memo will do. When we issue our letter, we shall endorse it to C.B.R. for action as in para 7 of their memo.

This Department does not appear to have seen these papers hitherto, and I must observe that the legal aspect is wider than that discussed in the present p.u.c. The fact that the reasons for refusing a licence are in certain cases expressly required to be recorded in writing is relevant only in that this requirement inevitably facilitates the public disclosure of the policy.

2. I assume at the onset that it is not contemplated to give this policy legislative sanction, and in the absence of such sanction the wide range of the policy envisaged in the draft letter² will, I fear, have to be whittled down in one, if not two, directions before it will find any support in the courts.

3. A policy based on the refusal of licences definable as those 'which may be expected to be a source of profit to their possessors' would, I have no doubt at all, come in for rough treatment by the courts, and would, I suspect, prejudice those cases where licences may legitimately be refused by reason of the applicant's anti-Government activities. It will not suffice, as Mr Olver in his note of 23.7.43 would do, to take a stand on a literal reading of words, and rely on the use of 'may' as opposed to 'shall'. There is ample judicial authority that the use of 'may' may, and often does not, imply an unfettered discretion, and that it may in certain contexts be indistinguishable from 'shall'. (Page 143 of Mr Bartley's edition of the General Clauses Act may be seen in this connection.)

4. According to Crazies 'On Statute Law' (4th Edn, Page 250) – 'In deciding what may be done under statutory powers Courts of law will always take into consideration the objects for which the statutory powers have been conferred.'

And later (at page 252) in discussing a case where a public company was given power by the legislature to acquire land, judicial authority is cited for the view that —

It is not sufficient for the company to make a mere statement that the proses for which they are about to exercise their power . . . are within the contemplation of the Act; they must do more than this, they must be prepared with satisfactory evidence to prove this to a court of justice if they are called upon to do so.

5. There can be no doubt that the courts would entertain a declaratory suit brought against a refusal to grant a licence on the contemplated grounds, or that they would apply the principles embodied in the two quotations above to the exercise of statutory powers by authorities of Government. These two principles may be briefly put in the form — (i) the use of the power must be relevant to the purposes of the enabling law; and (ii) the onus of showing that the use complies with (i) is upon the authority using the power. I am convinced therefore that the Courts would hold as ultra vires action implementing a policy which does not rest on the first of these principles, but in fact ignores it and is aimed at hitting the pocket, and perhaps the livelihood, of the individual.

6. But I do think that the contemplated action can be taken in respect of certain licences, i.e. those where the individual's anti-Government activities are relevant to the purpose of licensing: in which particular cases can be judged only with reference to that purpose. To consider some examples, I do not think that much exception can be taken to the Madras policy within the limits to which it was confined in G.O. No. 387 dated 17.2.43,⁵ that is, in relation to licences in respect of arms, explosives and poisons (though I am extremely doubtful about the last), or more generally to any refusal in respect of which the reason indicated in the last sentence of para 5¹ of that order can be given without mental reservation. Petroleum in my view is a borderline case: the rationale of the licensing of this substance is that it is dangerous to life and property when not handled and stored with proper caution. But it is also a recognised weapon of the 'fire-bug', and as such I think there is some justification for withholding the authority to possess it in quantities from persons in touch with revolutionary activities. But surely the borderline is definitely crossed when we come to licences under the Cinematograph Act, and emphatically so with stamp vendors' Licences, excise and salt licences and the like.

7. The grant of mining concessions and leases of land are perhaps on a different footing and not governed by principle (i). Here government is functioning not so much qua Government in its executive capacity as qua owner of property or property rights, and may as such legitimately decide by any criteria it chooses with whom it will deal.

8. The above indicates the major direction in which I think that the contemplated policy will need to be modified before it could hope to survive challenge in the Courts. A lesser point is that the recent trend of cases in the courts would seem to disclose a judicial dislike for the criterion of 'suspicion' or even 'reasonable suspicion'. Under principle (ii) the court will throw the onus on the Government authority of justifying his proper exercise of power, and this being so, there would seem to be no narrowing of scope in adopting the less debatable Madras formula 'known supporters of the Congress.'

[H.D. Benjamin]

A.D.S. 22.10.43

I agree generally with Mr Benjamin. I.L.R. 42 Bom. 259 at p. 279 et seq is direct authority for the proposition that the mere expression of a statutory provision for the issue of licences in terms of 'may' does not operate to vest the licensing authority with absolute discretion to grant or withhold a licence at pleasure. In the light of that case and of more general principles, I apprehend that the courts, if moved in this behalf by the aggrieved party, would intervene to overrule a refusal of a licence in pursuance of the policy enunciated in the draft letter, unless it could be shown either (1) that the statutory provisions applicable to the relevant licences were so drawn as to vest the licensing authority with absolute discretion to grant or refuse the same, or (2) that the ground of refusal (paragraphs 2 and 3 of the draft letter) was within the scope and objects of the enactment imposing the licence requirement.

Subject: *Statement of cases involving the validity of Ordinances.*²

In all 19 Appeals were heard together from decisions of Patna, Nagpur, Madras and Allahabad High Courts. These decisions were all in favour of the validity of the Ordinance. The judgement of the Federal Court was pronounced on 1st Dec. 1943. Ordinance XIX of 1943 was held valid. On merits Appeals were in some cases allowed but in most of the cases the Appeals were dismissed.

Ground on which decision is based.

1. The Ordinance is within the legislative powers of the Governor General.
2. The language of section 3 (1) of the Ordinance is intended to meet the requirements insisted upon in the previous decision of the Federal Court in Benoari Lal Sarma's case and should be given full effect.
3. Section 3(1) confers validity and full effectiveness on sentences passed by the special courts functioning under Ordinance II of 1942.

113: Government of Punjab to the Government of India — Treatment of Security Prisoners

File No. 3/16/43 – Home Poll (I)

[NAI]

D.O. No. 5172. A.D.S.B.

Punjab Civil Secretariat,

128

Lahore, dated the 23rd October, 1943.

My dear Tottenham

Will you please refer to your most secret demi official letter No. 3.16/43 – Political (I), dated October the 9th, 1943,¹ regarding interviews between security prisoners who have been under interrogation and their legal advisers?

2. I am desired to say that the Punjab Government admit the force of your objections to denying security prisoners all interviews with their legal advisers after their removal to jail custody, and are, therefore, now introducing the rule, a copy of which was forwarded with my secret memorandum No. 3087-A.S.B., dated September the 17th/20th,² 1943.

3. As stated in my demi official letter No. 165-N of September the 23rd, 1943,³ the Punjab Government do not believe that security prisoners and others held in the Lahore Fort for interrogation are tortured or maltreated. Such methods would be merely short cuts to the extraction of statements but not to the extraction of truth, and it will, I think be admitted that the statements recorded in the Fort at Lahore have proved to be remarkably reliable and straightforward statements of fact and surprisingly free from the false admissions which torture might be expected to extort. We do not believe that such statements could have been obtained by inhuman treatment. At the same time, it is obvious that no suspect can be expected to incriminate himself and his associates unless considerable pressure is exerted on him. The actual methods of interrogation naturally vary with the psychology of each individual, but the main factors governing success in interrogation are an intimate knowledge of the suspect's background and antecedents, patience, perseverance and concentration, skill in handling men and detailed questioning. In other words, our interrogating officers do no more than pit their brains, knowledge and determination against those of the persons whom they are interrogating.

4. The Punjab Government are not surprised to learn that certain quarters are not altogether prepared to accept the assurance given that Punjab methods of interrogation do not involve inhuman treatment, as they have reason to believe that the successes in interrogation obtained in the Punjab in recent years have led to some resentment at the exposure of the failure of some Provinces to use interrogation as an aid to intelligence. That we have nothing to conceal should be apparent from a recent offer made by Wace to Jenkin that Special Branch officers from other Provinces should be asked to collaborate with Punjab Criminal Investigation Department officers in the interrogation of suspects belonging to their Provinces. A case in point is that of Jai Parkash Narain whose interrogation has been postponed till the arrival of qualified interrogating officers from Bihar and Bengal, because Wace did not feel that his officers had necessary knowledge to interrogate him with any reasonable hope of success.

Yours sincerely,

(F.C. Bourne)

File No. 44/57/43 – Home Poll (I)

... After referring to the provisions of Regulations 18 (8) (3) (4) and (5) which dealt with the manner in which an aggrieved person might make representation after being furnished with such particulars as would enable him to present his case, the Chief Justice observed that 'Provisions similar to that are completely omitted from rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules. I draw attention to this matter in the hope that those responsible for this legislation may consider it'.¹

2. In making these remarks the Chief Justice was under misapprehension in two respects.

In the first place Regulation III of 1818 does not contain a specific provision for enabling the detenu to be told what are the grounds for his detention and for enabling him to show cause against it. The preamble to that Regulation refers to the fact that when it is determined that any person should be deprived of his liberty thereunder, he should at all times be allowed freely to bring to the notice of Government all circumstances relating either to the supposed ground of such determination or to the manner in which it may be executed. The operative part of the Regulation (section 5) reads:

the officer in whose custody any state Prisoner may be placed is to forward, with such observations as may appear necessary, every representation which such state prisoner may from time to time be desirous of submitting to the government.

The Government of India are advised (by a minute of the Law Member dated 7th of October 1932) that the policy of the Regulation is that the prisoner should be in no better position than to guess why he has been under personal restraint. The Regulation does not contemplate that he should know the grounds, far less that he can demand disclosure.

In the second place, although it is true that there is no direct provision in Defence Rule 26 for allowing a detained person to show cause against his detention, there is, of course, nothing to prevent any such person from making any representation he may wish to Government and many of them have, in fact, done so.

It is also true that the observations of the Chief Justice do not relate to any judicial issue before the court and that, as an expression of opinion, they have no binding force.

3. Nevertheless, the Home Department recognize that comments of this character coming from a high judicial authority have considerable effect on the public mind and must be examined with the respect that they deserve. The Home Department have for some time felt that the provisions of Defence Rule 26 in so far as they relate to detention are defective in several respects, namely –

- (1) the detention once ordered is of indefinite duration;
- (2) no provision is made for the periodical review of cases; and
- (3) no explicit provision is made giving the detained person a right to be heard on his own behalf or to be informed of the reasons for his detention.

Provisions of this kind, which are inherently in accordance with the public conscience, would not weaken, but rather strengthen, our position in holding persons in detention without trial. The Home Department, therefore, recommend that the law governing detention without trial should be amended to contain provisions on the following lines:

(1) As soon as may be after an order of detention has been made the Government concerned shall -

- (a) inform the person detained of the grounds on which the order has been made against him, so far as it may be possible to do so without divulging secret information, and shall furnish him with such particulars as are in their opinion sufficient to enable him to present his case;
- (b) inform him of his right to make representations to Government in writing with respect to his detention; and
- (c) secure that he shall be given the earliest opportunity of making such representations if he so desires.

A proviso should be added to the effect that no public officer should be compelled to produce in evidence the grounds for detention or any representation in writing made under this provision and also to prohibit the disclosure to the public of the grounds for detention or the contents of any such representation.

(2) No order of detention shall continue to be in force for more than six months provided that the Government concerned, after further consideration of all the circumstances of the case, including any representations that the detained person may have made, may extend the period of detention for periods not exceeding six months at a time.

4 The Home Department further consider that it would be desirable to restrict the powers of subordinate authorities (to whom, at present, powers to make detention orders may be delegated under section 2 (4) and (5) of the Defence of India Act) on the lines adopted in the United Kingdom, where a Regional Commissioner under Regulation 18 BB may direct the detention of a person 'pending consideration by the Secretary of State of the question whether an order should be made against that person under Regulation 18 B'. The provision suggested should be to the effect -

- (a) that every subordinate authority to whom the power to make detention orders is delegated should report to Government every order of detention made by him as soon as possible after it had been made and should also forward to Government, with the least possible delay and with such comments as he might wish to make, any representation made by any person detained under his order, and
- (b) that all orders of detention passed by subordinate authorities should, when so reported be examined by Government and should only remain in force if approved by Government, in which case the order of the subordinate authority should be replaced by an order of Government.

5. In the ordinary way these proposals would be given effect to by amending Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules. In view, however, of the fact that, as matters now stand, the Federal court has not decided one way or the other on the validity of that portion of Ordinance XIV of 1943 which purported to validate Defence Rule 26 and in view also of the fact that an appeal on this point to the Privy Council is pending, the Legislative Department recommend, and the Home Department agree, that the best course will be not to touch Defence Rule 26 itself but to promulgate a self-contained Ordinance which will embody the whole of its provisions, including those now under consideration. Since such an Ordinance would contain several new features which would go a considerable way to meet public opinion, it should have a better reception than most Ordinances; and there is also the fact that an Ordinance is less liable to alteration than statutory rules and therefore would confer a greater degree of permanency on the provisions proposed above. A preliminary draft of such an Ordinance is accordingly attached to this summary.² It will be seen that it reproduces in a self-contained form the existing provisions of Defence Rule 26, covers the proposals made in paras 3 and 4 and provides for the continuance of the existing orders made under Rule 26 and the Application of the new provisions to those orders, so far as they are capable of application.

6. The observations of the Chief Justice quoted in paragraph 1 refer also to the advisory committee to which orders of detention may be referred under Regulation 18 B of the United Kingdom Regulations. The Hon'ble the Law Member has suggested that Government might concede the principle of advisory committees, though not necessarily on the United Kingdom model. He suggests that the advisory committee might consist of a high executive officer of Government sitting with a high judicial officer. The committee should then advise on the recorded materials, which should include the grounds furnished to the person detained and any representation made by him. It would be possible, in his opinion, to protect the grounds, the representations and any proceedings of the committee from being produced in court in connection with a habeas corpus application or otherwise; and the committee should deal only with original orders of detention and not with orders extending the period of detention. The Home Department recognize that any amendment of the law which did not introduce a counterpart of the advisory committee system in India would be unlikely to give complete satisfaction to public opinion in this country; and they do not deny that the committee procedure is best in principle. Nevertheless, they consider that the system would be unworkable in this country, where the number of different authorities concerned and the number of detention orders are considerably greater than in the United Kingdom, and they are convinced that Government must be careful not to create by statute obligations which in practice it would be very difficult to fulfil. Great practical difficulties were actually experienced in constituting reviewing committees some time ago to examine detention orders; and if there was a legal obligation to appoint such committees difficulties would immediately arise regarding their composition and the manner in which it should be defined by law. Consultation would almost certainly be necessary both with Provincial Governments and with High Courts, before the wording of the law could be settled, and this would only delay the promulgation of the proposed ordinance; there is also no doubt that it would be extremely hard to find suitable high executive officers who had not been concerned with, or responsible for, the orders which had to come before the advisory committee. The Home Department would definitely prefer, therefore, to be relieved of this obligation.

7. These proposals have received the general concurrence of the Defence Department. The proposals in paras 3 and 4 would gravely embarrass them. The military authorities in Assam and Bengal have already been compelled to use Defence Rule 129 and Defence Rule 26 for the detention of a considerable number of enemy agents who have been sent into India from Burma and other countries; and it is quite possible that the numbers of such persons, civil and military, will reach very large proportions. Certain military officers have already been vested, by delegation, with powers under Defence Rule 26 and, in the nature of the case, it is difficult to establish the guilt, or the degree of guilt, of the persons arrested. The most careful examination, and often most prolonged interrogation, are necessary to establish grounds for action; and the authorities to whom powers under Defence Rule 26 have been delegated would be gravely embarrassed if their powers of detention were restricted in the manner proposed. The Central Government itself would also be gravely embarrassed if it became necessary to confirm every order passed by subordinate authorities, to inform each detained enemy agent of grounds for action against him, to invite representations from such persons (they may run into many hundreds), and review each case at frequent intervals. The Home Department recognize the force of these objections and consider that some special powers (quite independent of Defence Rule 129 and Defence Rule 26) should be devised for dealing with this particular problem. The Defence of India Rules, as drafted, were not really intended for such a purpose. In this opinion the Defence and Legislative Departments agree and certain proposals on these lines are already under consideration. Meanwhile the Home Department recommend that their proposals should be accepted to cover the cases of persons who are normally made the subject of detention orders. If this recommendation is approved, they further recommend that the proposals should be communicated to provincial Governments for information, but not for an expression of opinion, before they are given effect to.

8. The case is submitted for H.E.'s orders whether it should be circulated to Hon'ble Members, either for opinion, or for discussion in council.

File No. 44/37/43 – Home Poll (I)

The excellent summary¹ prepared by office gives a clear general picture of this very complicated question as it is ever likely to be possible to obtain. We have asked for information urgently from the U.P. to complete the picture. Even then, it will be seen that we are on many points of detail far from clear as to what the provincial practice is. With the exception of the few outstanding points which will be dealt with below, the situation as regards matter of principle is I think satisfactory; there is no doubt that there has been a considerable levelling up since the issue of our letters of July 21st² and September 14th,³ and no alteration of our principles as they now stand, nor any further general letter to provinces on the subject, appears necessary for the moment. It would, nevertheless, be of considerable value particularly round about Assembly time, if we could have a more complete picture of the detailed practice in provinces. It is not, I think, any good going back repeatedly to provinces over individual details and I would suggest as an alternative, and more hopeful method of approach, that we should adopt a procedure similar to that used for obtaining statistics of the Congress movement. I would suggest that we should supply to provinces a printed or cyclostyled form giving in one column, the principles laid down by us for the treatment of both Congress and non-Congress S.Ps. and asking them to note against each, in another column, the practice adopted in the province. The result would be a table on the lines of the enclosure to the Bengal letter of 31.8.43^b and we could ask provinces to let us have a revised version every six months, timed to arrive shortly before the opening of the autumn and spring sessions of the legislature. It is now too late to hope to get any complete statement on these lines before the coming session; details of provincial amendments to their rules are gradually coming in and helping to complete the picture; and I would suggest therefore that we should wait until about the middle of December and then address Provinces on these lines asking for their first statement to be submitted by about the end of March. I think incidentally that all Provincial amendments and orders, a number of which have been included on the correspondence Folio I, should be removed and kept separately and I think the clearest way will be to keep a separate set of provincial rules and orders for each province as a separate loose-leaf folio, to which amendments are made as they are received.

2. As observed above, there is at the moment no matter of principle arising out of further provincial replies since the issue of our letter of 14th September. The only question of general application is that raised in para 4 of the Punjab Government letter of 9th October.⁷ This is not quite as simple as it would appear at first sight. As far as correspondence is concerned – and this is only specific point raised by the Punjab – our principle can probably be taken as representing a minimum only, and there is probably no great objection to any province which wants to exceeding that minimum as the Punjab have done. On the other hand, there are a number of matters of principle where more generous treatment than that laid down by us would be definitely embarrassing; an obvious example is that of parole, and such questions as accommodation, allowances and funds and possibly even interviews, fall within the same category. We cannot, therefore, agree to a general interpretation of our principles as minima, below which provinces should not lower their standards, but which may be exceeded at the provinces' discretion. There are one or two other examples in which our principles have been exceeded – the question of diet in Sind, for instance, referred to below, and I think our attitude must be that, in the interests of uniformity, the principles laid down by us should be as far as possible strictly adhered to, provincial practice neither falling short of them nor exceeding them.

A general reference to this question might be noted for inclusion in the letter to provinces suggested in the preceding paragraph.

The following individual points arise from provincial replies and may be dealt with in separate letters to the provinces concerned.

- (a) Bengal: Correspondence of congress S.Ps. see item 7 of statement B enclosed with their letter of 31.8.43.^b We could reasonably insist on any Bengal S.P. whom the Provincial Government can definitely call a Congress, as opposed to a terrorist, prisoner (see para 2 of their letter), to conform to our principle as regards correspondence; the number is not great, but, on the other hand, the principle is I think important. We might I think extend the references and insist that this restriction of correspondence should be applied to all security prisoners detained in connection with the Congress movement whether they are regarded as 'Congress' or 'Terrorist' by the provincial Government. I think we should be justified in insisting on this but the point is for orders.

- (b) Punjab: Our reply to para 4 of the Punjab letter of 9th October,⁷ should I think be to the effect that we wish our principles to be as strictly observed as possible in the interests of uniformity, but that in the specific matter of correspondence raised by them, we agree that withdrawal of the concession already granted would be undesirable and have no objection to the practice continuing; we should ask for examples of any other specific points on which their practice exceeds our principles. We should at the same time I think specifically enquire about family allowances, which were previously forbidden to Congress security prisoners in the Punjab.
- (c) C.P.: In their letter of 7th October⁸ they have indicated that their practice in regard to correspondence of Congress security prisoners is rather more liberal than our principle. As in the case of the Punjab. I do not think we need object and no separate reply to the C.P. is necessary.
- (d) Orissa: In their letter of 17th September, ⁹ Orissa express the intention of retaining their single class of security prisoner. Since they have only two non-Congress security prisoners, we need not object at this stage, but there would I think be no harm in our making it clear that should the number increase, we should regard a separate non congress classification as essential. An added reason for this is that as regards amenities (see para 2, diet allowances in their letter) their prisoners are at present apparently treated as class I.
- (e) Sind: In para 2 of their letter of 1st Oct.¹⁰ Sind have refused to accept our principle that where segregation between Congress and non-Congress S.Ps. was not possible, classification of Congress S.Ps. should follow that adopted for non-Congress S.Ps. They are at present therefore treating their Congress security prisoners as a special single class, which is incidentally getting class I treatment, although they are not segregated from the ordinary non-congress security prisoners. Our principle was I think based on the idea that it would give rise to difficulties in practice if persons of roughly equivalent status, kept together, were treated differently according to whether they were Congress or non-Congress, and this reasoning still seems to me sound, though Sind have in practice apparently had no difficulty in enforcing the differential treatment. Owing to superior treatment which their Congress security prisoners are getting, they would doubtless find it difficult now to adopt classification which would result in the down-grading of a number of their prisoners. The only real objection that I see to their present practice is that all their Congressmen are receiving class I treatment, which is in many cases doubtless not justified. I doubt, however, whether it is worth our insisting on the enforcement of our principle in this case, and I would suggest that we should write accepting the present position, but stating that if further Congress prisoners were detained, we would expect our principle to be observed.

S.J.L. Olver

As regards the question of principle dealt with in para 2 of Under-secretary's note, our difficulty in practice has been to get provinces up to a certain level of treatment of security prisoners rather than the reverse. The treatment which we have prescribed has in general been that which we considered sufficient, but not more than sufficient, to enable us to defend it and we should, I think, be putting ourselves in a false position if, after all the efforts we have made to improve the general level of treatment, we now asked provinces to scale down their practice in certain matters in which provinces should not be allowed to be too generous. These are really security matters rather than matters of ordinary treatment and are mainly concerned with interviews and correspondence. I should not be inclined to countenance too much latitude in regard to interviews; but in regard to correspondence we can allow provinces a certain margin particularly where, as in the Punjab, more latitude in regard to correspondence is accompanied by greater restrictions in regard to interviews. In such matters as segregation, diet, classification, etc., I should leave provinces a fairly free hand except where their treatment was obviously below the general level. These remarks will apply to the proposals made in para 3 of Under Secretary's note. . . .

I do not think I shall require these papers when the various questions in the Assembly are to be answered, but the combined statement at flag F will probably be useful at that time.

The various Assembly question files are returned herewith.

In reply to your secret D.O. No. 44/2/43 – (II) Poll (I) dated the 28th August, 1943,¹ to Bowstead regarding the treatment of prisoners detained under rule 129 of the Defence of India Rules, I am desired to say that the gist of the proposals seems to be that, where any investigation has to be done during the period of detention under rule 129 or where the prisoner has to be interrogated, he should be in Police custody, while only in those cases where no further investigation is required as to the necessity for detention or where no interrogation has to be done, the prisoners are to be detained in jail custody. In the opinion of the Provincial Government, however, the mere fact that the Police are investigating the case against the suspect should not make it necessary to detain him in Police custody. As regards interrogation also, this can be done by interview in jail, or, if necessary, by temporary remand to Police custody for this purpose. There are certain practical difficulties in keeping prisoners in Police custody for any length of time, which would appear to render necessary the opening of a sort of Police jail at every District Headquarters and the building up of a special Police staff trained as jailors. It is also apprehended that this course will not be well-received by public opinion.

The proposals were approved subject to further examination of . . .

- (1) questions of detail including the question whether the provision for six-monthly review should be retained;
- (2) the simultaneous treatment of the category of detenues referred to in paragraph 7 of the Summary.

I presume that it is not intended, in reply to this question, to enlarge on the details already given to Sardar Mangal Singh (File No. 22/45/43 – Poll (I))¹ In connection with the reply to Sardar Mangal Singh's question, H.M. has already been supplied with a statement showing the details, so far as we know them, in regard to which Provinces have improved their treatment as a result of our reference to Mr Krishnamachari's resolution.²

Discussed with H.E. today. He noted the following points as outstanding for consideration–

- (1) The six-monthly period,
- (2) Supply of information to prisoners,
- (3) Advisory Committees and
- (4) The Commander-in-Chief's point.¹

(2) I think C.-in-C.'s point will be met if we give at least a month's notice to Provinces within which the War Department Ordinance can be ready. Advisory Committees were not recommended in our proposals to Council and although the Law Member mentioned the point, I think Council have accepted our recommendations. As regards supply of information to prisoners about the grounds of their detention, need we suppose that this will present any material difficulty? The main point for consideration will be the six-monthly period which might give rise to agitation for the release of Gandhi and members of the working Committee whenever renewal of orders became due. As I pointed out, this proposal could, if necessary, be dropped without affecting the other proposals. But I am not inclined to do so, especially as we are not accepting Advisory Committees. Although there is no such provision in the corresponding Regulation in Great Britain, sub-clause (2) of Regulation 18B has somewhat the same effect since under sub-clause (3) a refusal of the Secretary of State to suspend the operation of an order must come before the Advisory Committee. I feel myself that one of the principal causes of objection to the detention orders at the present moment is their indefinite duration.

3 H.E. proposed to consult Governors informally about this proposal at his forthcoming conference before bringing the matter again before Council. For this purpose a sufficient number of copies of the draft Ordinance together with a covering Summary should be supplied to P.S.V. Probably the Summary placed before Council would be sufficient. But Additional Secretary might consider whether it needs any modification for this purpose. It might be well to add the preliminary explanations of these proposals which I gave in the Council discussion. For this purpose Additional Secretary may refer to the first paragraph of the minutes of the discussion held on the 10th November. P.S.V. will circulate copies of the draft Ordinance and of our summary privately to Governors before discussion with H.E. The Governors' Conference will, I understand, begin a week hence, so necessary copies should reach P.S.V. before their arrival.

File is returned herewith.

Our summary for council¹ was rather long and, if it had been a question of preparing a new one, it might have been worth while considering -

- (1) the replacement of paras 1 and 2 by a much briefer exposition of the Chief Justice's comments; and
- (2) the replacement of paras 3 and 4 by something much briefer on the lines of H.M.'s opening remarks to Council.

The stencil is, however, still in existence, and the summary does present the whole case in a self-contained manner. I would, therefore, propose to retain it as it is, except for the last eight lines. The summary could then end at the words 'detention orders'. . . .

Fate of Indian Detenus

Delhi Speculations

(From Our Correspondent)

New Delhi, Nov. 12

The recent Federal Court judgements vis-a-vis detenus has been under close examination of the authorities here.

One view is that the provision under Defence of India Rules for indefinite detention without appeal is too drastic and contrary to British conception of rule of law.

Lobby circles believe Government is likely to modify such provision with a view to give facilities to detenus for right of appeal. Similarly the period of detention under Defence of India Rules is likely to be limited. It is pointed out that Government already possess powers under the regulations to indefinitely detain persons, if it is so desired.

It is also learned that the decision to allow interviews with Congress detenus, including members of the Congress Working Committee has been left with the Provinces.

Move to Review Security Prisoners' Cases

(From Our Correspondent)

New Delhi, Nov. 14

A Board of Revision I understand is being set up to review the cases of all Congress security prisoners periodically.

According to lobby anticipations Government is shortly amending Defence of India Rules which at present empowers indefinite detention. According to the revised plan, no detention will be permissible for more than six months, which period could be extended by six months at a time. The defence will be furnished grounds for detention and be allowed permission to make representation for refuting the charges. His representation will be considered by the Revision Board which otherwise also will review cases periodically every six months. Congressmen presently under detention will be regarded arrested 'de novo' and their cases will be subject to review immediately.

Government to Revise Detention Rules

Setting up of Revision Boards

Proposed Facilities for Security Prisoners

(From our Special Correspondent)

New Delhi, Sunday . . . 14.11.43

I understand that the Government of India are considering the question of revising detention rules under the Defence of India Act.

According to the proposed revision, a detention order under Defence Rules 26 will normally be for a period of six months, but the Government will have the right to renew any such order for a further period of six months. In practice, this will not make much difference, for the Government can keep a man in detention for any length of time by issuing renewal orders every six months.

It is also proposed to set up Revision Boards in every province who will periodically examine the cases of detenues and make recommendations in the Government.

Detenus will, if they so desire, be given a statement of the charges against them. In reply to these charges they will be allowed to make representations. For preparing their defence and placing their case before the Revision Board they will be permitted to have the assistance of their lawyers.

The proposed revision follows to some extent, the recent changes in detention rules in the United Kingdom.

Draft ordinance replacing Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules.¹

The Viceroy said that this measure, which he had asked the Home Member to circulate to Governors during their stay at New Delhi, had the full support of his Executive council. He would be obliged if Governors would communicate their remarks to the Home Member as soon as possible, as the case would come before Council again shortly. He hoped that the change would not cause undue inconvenience in the Provinces.

The Governor of Bengal said that it was important that the new Ordinance should come into force before the 15th December next, the date of the hearing of some Habeas Corpus cases in Calcutta.

Home Department

The Federal court in its original judgment declaring Defence Rule 26 to be ultra vires of the rule making power, drew attention to the obligation which, in its opinion, lay on those who had the power to make detention orders to specify as clearly and accurately as possible the true grounds on which the order was made. Provincial Governments were addressed on this point in a Home Department letter of May 1st, 1943.¹ Subsequently, in what was known as the 'contempt case', the Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court last July dilated, in the same connection, on the legal maxim audi alteram partem.² He referred (wrongly) to the provisions of the State Prisoners Regulations and (rightly) to those of the United Kingdom Defence Regulations, under which a person detained without trial has a right to be informed of the grounds for the order and to make representations against it. Under United Kingdom Regulation 18 I there is a system of advisory committees to which 'any person aggrieved by the making of an order against him, by a refusal of the Secretary of State to suspend the operation of such an order, by any condition attached to a direction given by the Secretary of State, or by the revocation of any such direction' may make his objections. It is the duty of the Secretary of State to secure that 'any person against whom an order is made shall be afforded the earliest practicable opportunity of making to the Secretary of State representations in writing with respect thereto and that he shall be informed of his right, whether or not such representations are made, to make his objections to an advisory committee'. It is also prescribed that the Chairman of the advisory committee is to inform the objector of the grounds on which the order has been made against him and furnish him with such particulars as are in the opinion of the Chairman sufficient to enable him to present his case'. The Secretary of State has to report to Parliament at least once a month the action taken under this Regulation and the number of cases, if any, in which he has declined to follow the advice of an advisory committee. The Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court drew attention to this matter 'in the hope that those responsible for this legislation may consider it'.

2. Although the observations of the Chief Justice did not relate to any judicial issue before the Court and, as an expression of opinion, had no binding force, the Home Department recognised that comments of this character have a considerable effect on the public mind and must be examined with the respect that they deserved. For some time they had felt that the provisions of Defence Rule 26, in so far as they related to detention, were defective in several respects, namely –

- (1) the detention once ordered is of indefinite duration;
- (2) no provision is made for the periodical review of cases and
- (3) no explicit provision is made giving the detained person a right to be heard on his own behalf or to be informed of the reasons for his detention.

The Home Department also considered that it might be desirable to limit the powers of subordinate authorities, to whom the power to make detention orders might be delegated under the Defence of India Act, on the lines adopted in the United Kingdom, where a Regional Commissioner under Regulation 18BB may direct the detention of a person 'pending consideration by the Secretary of State of the question whether an order should be made against that person under Regulation 18B'. The Home Department had no desire whatever to make it more difficult for any Government to place persons in detention; but they felt that provisions of the kind referred to were inherently in accordance with the public conscience and that their incorporation in the law would not weaken, but rather strengthen, the hands of Government in keeping persons under detention without trial. Since the Government of India is primarily responsible for war legislation and its operation by the Provinces, the Home Department also considered that there was no necessity to consult Provincial Governments on the principles involved, although they would have to be given full warning of the changes proposed and an opportunity to bring to light any administrative difficulties that might be involved in giving effect to them.

3. In the ordinary way these proposals might have been given effect to by amending Defence Rule 26. The ruling of the Calcutta High Court that Ordinance XIV of 1943, which had amended the Defence of India Act so as to validate Defence Rule 26, was itself invalid on the ground that an Ordinance could not amend an Act of the Indian Legislature, led to pressure by the Bengal Government for the replacement of D.R. 26 by a substantive Ordinance. The Government of India had hoped that this aspect of the case would be disposed of by the decision of the Federal Court on the appeal from the Calcutta decision; but the Federal Court abstained from deciding this crucial issue with the result that the whole position is still left open. In these circumstances it was thought preferable to replace D.R. 26 by a new self-contained Ordinance which would incorporate the 'liberalizing proposals' referred to above. The draft of such an Ordinance is attached to this note. Clauses 3 to 5 merely repeat the provisions of D.R. 26; clauses 6 to 11 contain the new provisions (see especially clauses 7, 8 and 9); while clauses 12 and 13 reproduce certain necessary provisions of the Defence of India Act.

4. At a preliminary meeting of council the general principles of the new Ordinance were accepted, but no final decisions have yet been reached. There are three outstanding points:

- (i) Advisory Committees. There has been some feeling that, if the provisions of Defence Rule 26 are to be liberalized on the basis of United Kingdom practice, it might be as well to go the whole distance and introduce some form of advisory committees in this country, though not necessarily on the exact United Kingdom model. The Home Department do not deny that the advisory committee system may be the best in principle, but they consider that it would be unworkable in this country, where the number of different authorities concerned and the number of detention orders are considerably greater than in the United Kingdom. They are also convinced that Government must be careful not to create by Statute obligations which, in practice, it would be very difficult to fulfil. Great practical difficulties were actually experienced in constituting reviewing committees some time ago. Moreover, the proposal that detention orders should not remain in force for more than six months unless renewed, which has no counterpart in the United Kingdom Regulations, may, to some extent, be regarded as a substitute for advisory committees, since it will ensure a constant review of cases.
- (ii) The practical difficulties involved in the six months limitation and in supplying information to detained persons. For the reasons given under (i) the Home Department would prefer to keep the six months limitation, although the proposal could, if necessary, be dropped without effecting the other proposals. It appears from the provisions of the United Kingdom Regulations quoted in paragraph 1 that the case of a detained person may repeatedly come before an advisory committee on a variety of grounds and certainly one of the principal cause of objections to detention orders at present is their indefinite duration. The ordinance has, however, been so drawn as to make all existing detention orders passed under Defence Rule 26 date from the commencement of the new ordinance, with the result that Provincial Governments will have an interval of six months in which to complete their reviews and decide which of the orders are to be further extended. It is not thought that any difficulty should attend the completion of the necessary processes within this period. The Home Department also do not think that there should be any great difficulty in supplying sufficient information to detained persons about the grounds of their detention. It is not, of course, contemplated that secret evidence should be revealed or that any lengthy exposition of the grounds for detention should be given. In most cases, it is thought, a very brief statement would suffice.

- (iii) The case of enemy agents etc. The Commander-in-Chief has pointed out that the new procedure would be embarrassing if applied to the class of persons entering India from Burma etc. who are now examined at various Interrogation Centres and against whom orders under defence Rule 26 are passed if there are grounds for suspecting them to be enemy agents. In the nature of the case the evidence of the guilt of these persons does not exist in India, but in the country from which they come. The most careful examination, and often most prolonged interrogations are necessary to establish grounds for action, and it is generally agreed that some special powers (independent of the Defence of India rules) should be devised for dealing with this particular problem. This question is under separate examination.

Detention Rules

According to certain Press reports, Lord Wavell has taken up question of revising detention rules under the Defence of India Act. Whatever may be the truth of these reports, the new Viceroy must be doubtless aware that quite apart from considerations of ordinary justice and equity, recent judgements of the Federal Court¹ and High Courts² have cast a moral, if not legal, obligation on the Government of India to revise these rules. It was the Chief Justice of Calcutta, Sir Harold Derbyshire,³ who expressed surprise that there was no provision under Rule 26 to inform a detenu of the grounds on which he was detained and also no provision for his being allowed to show cause against his detention. After referring to the old principle of the law enunciated in the Latin maxim audi alteram partem which meant 'Hear the other side' he expressed the hope that those who were responsible for the omission of these provisions from Rule 26, might consider it. Though four months have elapsed since the Chief Justice made these observations, nothing has been done to revise these rules so as at least to bring them into conformity with the practice obtaining in the United Kingdom. It can hardly be denied that the procedure still being followed in India in arresting and detaining people for political reasons under Defence rule 26 has a mediaeval touch about it. This procedure is all the more indefensible as the legality of the rule itself has been questioned by the highest court in the land.

There is the oft-quoted dictum of Lord Atkin that 'in accordance with British jurisprudence, no member of the executive can interfere with the liberty or property of a British subject except on condition that he can support the legality of his action before a court of justice and it is the tradition of British justice that judges should not shrink from deciding such issues in the face of the executive.' The way in which Defence Rule 26 has been used in this country for purely political purposes goes counter to this well-known principle of British jurisprudence. So strangely muddled is the executive mind that subordinate officials have gone to the length, for instance, of arresting under Defence Rules, a Press reporter for an alleged wrong report and a Barrister who merely went to another province for filing a habeas corpus application. Not only are the authorities passing detention orders unwilling to prove the legality of their action before a court of justice but they are not even prepared to submit the cases of these detenues to an independent committee or tribunal for judicially examining the worth of the evidence', if any, on the basis of which these persons have been detained. They are neither told the charges against them nor given an opportunity to defend themselves. In England, the public has at least the satisfaction of knowing that the Home Secretary, who is answerable to Parliament, goes into every case personally before passing an order for detention, but in India it is the executive which has practically constituted itself into the prosecutor, the judge and even the rule-making authority to detain persons at will. The Federal Court felt constrained to observe in a recent case: 'Today, in India the situation is complicated by the fact that when large and undefined powers are entrusted to Provincial Governments and their executive officers, the constitutional limitations, conventions and etiquette implied in the theory of provincial autonomy make it difficult even for the authority promulgating the ordinances to interfere to check the improper use of such powers.' We consider it the clear duty of Lord Wavell not only to revise these detention rules with some regard to accepted standards of justice and equity, but to take up the larger question of examining whether there is any justification for retaining the many Ordinances and Defence Rules issued by his predecessor in reckless disregard of ordinary civil liberties.

Detention Rules Need for Revision

The existing rules under the Defence of India Act regulating the thorny subject of detention of political prisoners, is notorious, are extremely harsh. Therefore, the report that the Government of India is at present engaged in considering a revision of these rules, if true, is very welcome. At present, numbers of politically-minded men in all provinces are detained under these rules at the pleasure of the Administrations concerned. The detenus are not given a charge sheet or otherwise apprised of the offences for which the authorities find it necessary to keep them in jail and much less are there any facilities afforded to these unfortunates who have chanced to incur the displeasure of the authorities to defend themselves legally in judicial proceedings. Further, once a political suspect was kept in detention as an undesirable from the Government's point of view, there was no machinery for reconsideration of his case in the light of altered circumstances inevitably brought about by the passage of time. Once a detenu always a detenu' seems to be the guiding principle governing these hard cases. It is undeniable that the unsympathetic application of such rules by unimaginative authority has led to much avoidable and unjust sufferings.

The proposed revision, if caused into effect, should certainly go some small way in mitigating this undue severity. In the first place, the proposed rule that all detentions will normally be for a period of six months, subject to renewals where necessary would, if applied carefully, do away with the scandal of detentions without a time limit. True the authorities are still vested with power to order renewals of the detention period but in working practice the proposed rule for automatic revision of detention awards after the initial period of six months, should tend to a more humane application of the rules and the release of many an unoffending detenu. Much will of course depend on the personnel of the Revision Boards that are to be set up in the provinces for this purpose and the spirits in which they administer their powers and discharge their responsibilities. The new rule that the detenus will be duly apprised of the charges against them and given facilities for proper defence by lawyers satisfy only the barest essentials recognised by civilized judicial procedure. All the same these provisions will tend to free the Government from the odium necessarily attaching to imprisonment without specific charges and denial of adequate defence facilities.

The proposed revision, we understand, follows to some extent the recent changes in detention rules in force in the United Kingdom. In Great Britain a Government elected by the will of the people, is in power, whereas in India an alien bureaucracy is enthroned in power against the will of the people. The protection of detenus by at least a minimum of legal safeguard is therefore a vital necessity in India. It is to be hoped that the proposed revision will be carried out immediately and in such a way as to lead to a general gaol delivery of innumerable detenus now kept behind prison bars.

My dar Maxwell,

When in Delhi I received a copy of the Draft Ordinance to replace Defence Rule 26. While I recognize that there are good grounds for the changes it is proposed to introduce, and provisionally I am not disposed to question them seriously, some of them will undoubtedly make the position more difficult for Provincial Governments and I hope that before His Excellency promulgates the Ordinance, they will be given an opportunity of commenting on it. As the draft was given to me personally, I had not felt the liberty to show it to my Government.

In view of the preceding note¹ it is presumed that this case² will have to be mentioned in Council again before we can address Provincial Governments. Since the Bengal Government, in particular, is most anxious that the Ordinance should be promulgated before December 15th,³ if possible, it is desirable that the case should come before Council again at the earliest opportunity after H.E.'s return. It is also suggested that it may not be necessary to enter the item formally on the agenda, but that it might suffice if H.E. were to explain, with reference to the conclusions of the last meeting, that he had had further consultations with the Home Member and the Commander-in-Chief on the two points mentioned and that he had also taken the opportunity to provide Governors while they were in Delhi with a note on the whole subject. He was now satisfied that the case might proceed on the basis of the proposals made by the Home Member and generally accepted by Council, and he, therefore, proposed that the Home Department should address Provincial Governments immediately, with a view to the promulgation of the Ordinance about the middle of December. Such an early date was desirable in view of the effect that the Ordinance might have on certain cases which would come up shortly for consideration in the Courts, especially in Calcutta; but if any Provincial Government were to press for an extension of time for valid reasons, the date of promulgation might have to be reconsidered.

2. The amended draft letter⁴ to Provincial Governments, if approved, may be held in readiness for issue directly after the Council meeting. It should, however, be seen first -

- (a) by the War Department, who may be asked whether their proposals for their new Ordinance will be ready by the date suggested; and
- (b) by the Legislative Department, who may be asked whether they have any comments to make regarding the concluding sentences of paragraph 3 or the Annexure to the draft, or generally.

War Dept. new ordinance is almost ready and is now with Mr Bartley for addition of a provision dealing with existing orders under Rule 26 of Defence of India Rule. Our ordinance has not yet been seen by Home, Defence and Legislative Dept., but we hope to send the file to them as soon as it is returned by Mr Bartley. The case has not yet been seen by H.E., and we don't know whether H.E., would wish to take it in Council. We do not anticipate any difficulty in promulgating our ordinance on the morning of 14th December unless any unexpected hitch occurs.

I have made some suggestions in the text of paragraphs 3, 5 and 8.^b The second ground given in paragraph 3 for the switch to the general or special order phraseology is, if I may say so, beside the point in as much as sub-rule (5) of Rule 26 obviously admits of a special no less than of a general determination.

2. The reference in paragraph 8 to 'promulgation with effect from the morning of December the 14th' is misconceived. Under the operation of section 72 of the old Act read with sub-clause (3) of its own clause 1, the ordinance will come into force immediately on promulgation and there is no question of promulgating it 'with effect from' any particular day or time of day. Incidentally, it is quite certain that if the ordinance is sent to the Press for promulgation on the 14th it will not, in fact, be promulgated before the afternoon of that day.

G.H. Spence

- A. I have had Sir G. Spence's amendments and I hope we have interpreted them correctly.
- B. My draft about the wording of clause 3 (4) was based on a rather hazy recollection of the noting at pp. 66-70 on the D.D. File Nos DC(6)/43. But I am afraid I don't quite understand how it is relevant to say (with respect to a clause in a new ordinance) that this change has been made with a view to attracting section 3 of the Defence of India Act.
- C. As regards in G. Spence's amendment in para 5 of the draft and his marginal comment thereon the sentence refers both to the action required under sect 7 and also to reporting cases to the provincial Government. Is not a reference to sect 8 therefore relevant.

Sir G. Spence (Legislative Dept.)

'A' on pre page — 'The first sentence of paragraph 2 of Mr Sundaram's note dated the 6th October' refers to paragraph 17 of Bose J.'s judgement and is expressed in terms of the general rules or instructions contained in the various Security Prisoners Orders because Bose J.'s observations were directed to the general rules or instructions in force in the Central Provinces. The sole point was and is that determinations under sub-rule (5) of rule 26, whether specific or embodied in general rules or instructions, do not possess the status of orders for the purposes of the Defence of India Act and the sole object and effect of the switch to the general or special order terminology is to secure the status of orders for the purposes of the corresponding provisions of the draft ordinance.

'B' on pre page. This was of course a slip on my part for which I apologize. The last sentence in the slip attached to paragraph 3 of the draft may be amended to read as follows:

'This change has been made in view of the fact that, as has been held judicially, determinations under sub-rule (5) of rule 26 do not possess the status of orders for the purposes of sections 3 and 16 of the Defence of India Act and the effect of the change in terminology will be to confer the status of orders for the purposes of sub-clause (9) of clause 3 and clause 10 of the proposed ordinance.'

'C' on pre page. If Sir Richard Tottenham will refer to the concluding words of the proviso to sub-clause (2) of clause 6, he will I think be constrained to agree that clause 8 has no conceivable application to the subject matter of the relevant portion of paragraph 5 of the draft. It might conduce to lucidity if the relevant sentence in paragraph 5 of the draft were recast to read as follows:

Under the operation of clause 7 read with sub-clause (2) of clause 6 the obligation to furnish grounds as soon as may be will fall to be discharged in the case of a pre-existing order made in pursuance of a delegation under sub-section (5) of section 2 of the Defence of India Act, by the officer who made the order, and the officer should without delay forward any representation received as the result of the furnishing of grounds to the provincial Government for disposal in accordance with proviso to section 9.

I spoke to H.M. about this case . . . now submit the file with the draft letter to Provincial Governments and a draft summary for H.E.'s orders. I have ascertained that there will be a Council meeting at 10.30 a.m. on Wednesday, December 1st. I will file any further replies from Governors received by H.M. So far there is only the reply from Sir Andrew Clow to which I have referred in the summary.

H.M.

I was prepared to accept Addl. Secy's summary and draft, but in the meanwhile I received from him the letter of the 26th November¹¹ from the Secretary to the Governor of Bengal. The points raised in that letter may not be very material but they will have to be examined and it is beginning to be evident that we shall get into trouble over this Ordinance unless we give the Provinces opportunities of raising any points of doubt they feel about the drafting and of bringing to notice any particular administrative difficulties in regard to which we might perhaps ease their position. We could have done this under our original time-table but the attempt to bring out the Ordinance by the 14th December would make it impossible. I am inclined to think, therefore, that we shall have to abandon the attempt to promulgate the Ordinance by the earlier date and give the Provinces time to comment on the draft Ordinance. If this procedure will give some inconvenience to the Bengal Government with regard to their habeas corpus applications we cannot help it. I think we might still consult Provincial Governments and have their replies in time to issue the Ordinance by the 1st January or soon after, but we must give a definite date by which their replies must be received here in order to allow us time to study their points. On this plan the draft letter to Provincial Government will need a few slight modifications, e.g., in the last sentence of para 2 and in para 8. We should, I think, make it clear that we do not desire comments on the principle of the proposals, but that we wish to give them an opportunity of bringing to notice points of the kind which I have mentioned above. (This in fact is what the Bengal Governor's Secretary has done.) I think, perhaps, it would still be useful if His Excellency would agree to round off the matter in Council by mentioning it at the next meeting and explaining what we propose to do. When the principles were thus fully accepted the adjustment of details could be left to us in consultation with the Provinces. The summary would then need slight modification also; but if Addl. Secy. cannot find time for this before the Council meeting the matter could perhaps remain over until the next Council meeting, P.S.V. being so informed.

R.M. MAXWELL

I have spoken to H.M. and have revised the draft to Provincial Governments and the summary for H.E. H.E. need not, I think, bother to read the draft to Provincial Governments, which repeats the substance of the note already circulated to Governors. The chief point for consideration is whether H.E. would be able to mention the case in Council tomorrow morning as suggested in para 3 of the summary.

128: Government of Bengal to the Government of India (new ordinance)

File No. 44/57/43 – Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

Government House,
Calcutta
26th November 1943

Dear Sir Richard,

When I saw you in Delhi on the 20th November, 1943, I mentioned that His Excellency the Governor was in general agreement with the provisions of the proposed Restriction and Detention Ordinance, 1943. It does not appear that the Provincial Government have again been consulted officially in regard to the promulgation of this Ordinance, but His Excellency has shown it privately to Porter, who deals with matters relating to persons detained under rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules, and as a result of consultation with him, the following for consideration:

- (1) Clause 5 contains no provision for the delegation of the powers conferred by clause 4, and in consequence a direction under clause 4 can be given only in respect of a person against whom an order under clause 3 has been made by Government itself. No direction under clause 4 can therefore be given in respect of a person against whom an order has been made in the exercise of delegated authority. This is a loophole which might well be closed.
- (2) For the reasons stated respectively in paragraphs 3 and 6 of Porter's letter No. 517, dated the 3rd July, 1943,¹ addressed to Bartley, it seems doubtful whether the provisions of clause 3(4) and clause 12 can be regarded as satisfactory.
- (3) It also seems doubtful whether the provisions of clauses 6 and 10(2) will suffice to obviate the difficulty which confronts us in respect of orders, purporting to have been made under D.I.R. 26, but declared by Courts not to have been so made because of non-compliance with the provision requiring that Government must be satisfied that such orders were necessary. It would seem still to be essential to submit, for the consideration of His Excellency, all orders already issued which have not yet been reviewed by him.
- (4) The application of clauses 7 and 9 will be difficult in the case of 'politicals' who are members of secret subversive organisations. It will not be easy to furnish them in useful form with grounds for their detention without uncovering sources whose usefulness and existence may be thereby endangered; and as there are upwards of 1400 such prisoners, the time taken to produce statements will be considerable and may give rise to allegations of unnecessary delay. The same difficulty arises in regard to the necessity for reviewing orders every 6 months, and even if detention for an indefinite period cannot be any longer permitted, it is suggested that instalments of 12 months will be more satisfactory than instalments of 6. In addition to the 'politicals', we also have about 3000 'Goonda' security prisoners, and although it would be simple enough, by reference to their previous convictions, to furnish them with grounds for their detention, the application of clauses 8 and 9 to such a large number of cases would entail a very great deal of additional labour.

2. It is appreciated that these points have probably been considered already, but it is felt desirable that full account should be taken of its problem which they present.

129: New summary for His Excellency – Home Department

File No. 44/57/43 – Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

Subject: Proposed Ordinance to replace Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules

This proposal was approved at the Council meeting held on November 10th, subject to further examination of:

- (1) questions of detail including the question whether provision for six-monthly review should be retained; and
- (ii) the simultaneous treatment of the category of detenus referred to in paragraph 7 of the previous summary, i.e.,¹ persons who had to be detained for military reasons.

As regards (1) above, the opportunity of the Governors' presence in Delhi was taken to circulate to them a note on the subject with the intimation that their views, if any, should be communicated to the Home member. The Home Member has only received one reference (from the Governor of Assam)² which expresses the hope that his Government will be given an opportunity of commenting on the proposed Ordinance before it is promulgated. One or two Governors intimated while they were in Delhi that they saw no objection in principle to the Ordinance and the Governor of Bengal went so far as to press that it should be promulgated before December 15th, which is the date on which certain habeas corpus applications, with references to D.R. 26, will come up for hearing in Calcutta. A letter has, however, just been received from the Secretary to the Governor of Bengal³ raising various points that will require examination and will render it impossible to promulgate the Ordinance so early. It is possible that comments from other Governors (notably N.W.F.P. and Bombay) may also be received on certain points of detail.

As regards (ii) above, the War Department has prepared the draft of an Ordinance, which has been accepted by the Home and Defence Departments and which is now under consideration with the Legislative Department. The War Department anticipate no difficulty in having this Ordinance ready for promulgation in the near future.

2. In these circumstances, the Home Department would like to go ahead with the Ordinance on the lines originally proposed, but they think Provincial Governments must be given a chance to raise any points of doubt they feel about the drafting of the Ordinance and to bring to notice any particular administrative difficulties in regard to which it might be possible to ease their position. A draft to Provincial Governments has been prepared accordingly and is ready for issue. It has been accepted by the War and Legislative Departments. It asks for replies before the end of December with a view to the promulgation of the Ordinance on January 7th, which seems the earliest possible date by which examination can be completed.

3. At the last meeting of Council H.E. intimated that the case would be placed before Council again after further discussion on the points mentioned. It would seem hardly necessary to enter the item formally on the agenda. H.E. may consider it sufficient to mention the matter informally at the next meeting on December 1st, explaining that he had had further consultations with the Home Member and the Commander-in Chief and that he had also taken the opportunity to provide Governors while they were in Delhi with a note on the whole subject. If approved, H.E. could then say that he was satisfied that the case might proceed on the basis of the proposals made by the Home Member and generally accepted by Council and he, therefore, proposed that the Home Department should address Provincial Governments immediately with a view to the promulgation of the Ordinance as early as possible.

File No. 44/2/43 – Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

The draft to Sind may be issued if DIB agrees. I don't think any reply to Punjab is necessary at present. Developments in the J.P.N.¹ habeas corpus application may be availed and also the issue of our new ordinance. H.M. does not insist that all interrogation should be completed when a man is in police custody under DR 129 that is to say he contemplates that it may continue after an order under DR 26 has been issued. But he thinks the total length of interrogation in any one case should not exceed two months.

DIB may have some comments to make.

Spens C.J. – These appeals (from judgments of different High Courts) were heard together, as they raised common questions of law. The appellants had been convicted by Courts functioning under the Special Criminal Court Ordinance (Ordinance 2 of 1942). On 4th June 1943, this Court (by a majority) held that the Courts constituted under that Ordinance had not been duly invested with jurisdiction, in view of the nature of the provisions contained in SS.5, 10 and 16 of that Ordinance. The next day, the Governor-General made and promulgated another Ordinance (Ordinance 19 of 1943) whereby Ordinance 2 of 1942 was repealed and certain provisions (to be referred to presently in detail) were made in respect of sentences which had been passed by the special Courts and in respect of cases which were pending before them on that date. By sub-s. (2) of S.3 of the new Ordinance, a right of appeal against sentences which had already been passed by the special Courts was given and appeals were accordingly preferred to the High Court in some cases. In certain other cases, applications for a writ in the nature of habeas corpus were made. In both sets of cases, it was contended on behalf of the accused that the new Ordinance did not, and in any event could not, give validity to the sentences which had been passed by the special Courts, and it was claimed that the sentences should be treated as void or set aside without any examination of the merits of the case, and that the accused should, if necessary, be directed to be tried by the ordinary criminal Courts in due course of law. The various High Courts which had to deal with the cases that have now come up before us declined to accede to this contention, though in the Allahabad High Court one learned Judge (Bajpai J.) dissented. The habeas corpus applications were dismissed and in some instances the appeals were also dismissed on the merits. In the cases from Nagpur, the High Court pronounced a preliminary judgment in the appeals, overruling the appellants' contentions on the points of law above referred to and gave a certificate under S.205, Constitution Act, even before the appeals had been finally disposed of. It may be a question whether it is proper to entertain an appeal merely against the preliminary judgment. It may also be a question whether the validity of Ordinance 19 of 1943 can be challenged in an appeal preferred under and by virtue of the Ordinance itself. Such objections were however not raised by counsel for the Crown and as the points of law had in any event to be decided in the habeas corpus cases, we permitted the questions of law to be argued on behalf of all the appellants. It may be mentioned that among the High Courts whose decisions are not directly now before us on appeal but which we have had to consider, the Bombay High Court upheld the validity of the Ordinance and placed on it the same interpretation as had been adopted by the High Courts at Allahabad, Madras, Nagpur and Patna. In the Calcutta High Court, two learned Judges (Derbyshire C.J. and Khundkar J.) placed the narrower interpretation on the impugned provision of the Ordinance rather than hold it to be invalid; Sen J. held the Ordinance to be invalid.

It will be convenient to set out here the material provisions of the new Ordinance. Section 2 repealed the earlier Ordinance and S.5 provided an indemnity for all officers, judicial or executive, in respect of what they had done under the repealed Ordinance. Section 4 provided that where the trial of any case pending before a Court constituted under the said Ordinance has not concluded before the date of the commencement of this Ordinance, the proceedings of such Court in the case shall be void and the case shall be deemed to be transferred to the ordinary criminal Courts for enquiry or trial in accordance with the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Section 3 is in the following terms:

3. Confirmation and continuance, subject to appeal, of sentences. — (1) Any sentence passed by a Special Judge, a Special Magistrate or a Summary court in exercise of jurisdiction conferred or purporting to have been conferred by or under the said Ordinance shall have effect, and subject to the succeeding provisions of this section shall continue to have effect, as if the trial at which it was passed had been held in accordance with the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 (V of 1898), by a Sessions Judge, an Assistant Sessions Judge or a Magistrate of the first class respectively, exercising competent jurisdiction under the said Code.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law, any such sentence as is referred to in sub-s.(1) shall, whether or not the proceedings in which the sentence was passed were submitted for review under S.8, and whether or not the sentence was the subject of an appeal under S.13 or S.19, of the said Ordinance, be subject to such rights of appeal as would have accrued, and to such powers of revision as would have been exercisable under the said code if the sentence had at a trial so held been passed on the date of the commencement of this Ordinance.

(r) Where any such sentence as aforesaid has been altered in the course of review or on appeal under the said Ordinance, the sentence as so altered shall for the purposes of this section be deemed to have been passed by the Court which passed the original sentence.

Two lines of argument have been advanced on behalf of the accused: first, it was said that on a reasonable construction of all the provisions of ordinance 19, it could not have been intended to, and did not, in fact, give validity to the sentences passed by the special Courts, but only gave them a kind of provisional regularity of existence till they were brought before a Court of appeal or revision by whom they were expected to be immediately set aside on the ground that they had been passed without jurisdiction. Secondly, it was contended that if the Ordinance sought to give validity to those sentences, it was beyond the competence of the Governor General to enact it. To appreciate and assess the force of these contentions, it is necessary briefly to advert to the provisions of Ordinance 2 of 1942 and to the precise terms of the judgment pronounced by this Court in relation to their operation. The Ordinance was promulgated under S.72 of Sch.9, Constitution Act which empowers the Governor-General 'in cases of emergency' to make and promulgate Ordinances for the peace and good government of British India or any part thereof. The Ordinance accordingly recited that an emergency had arisen which made it necessary to provide for the setting up of Special Criminal Courts. Sub-section (3) of S.1, however, enacted that the Ordinance should come into force in any Province only if the Provincial Government (being satisfied of the existence of an emergency arising from a hostile attack, etc.), should by notification declare it to be in force in the Province. This way of framing the Ordinance gave rise to a contention that it had not been enacted in accordance with and in circumstances contemplated by S.72. This point was left open in the previous judgment of this Court. The Ordinance proceeded to empower the Provincial Governments to constitute certain classes of Special Courts, defined the classes of persons who could be appointed to those Courts, specified the sentences which each of those Courts was authorized to impose, prescribed certain special rules of procedure for the conduct of trials before those courts and to that extent excluded the application of the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It also made provision for appeals in certain classes of cases and a special provision for what is spoken of as 'review' in certain other cases and completely excluded the jurisdiction of the High Cou.: either as a Court of appeal or revision or as a Court exercising powers under S.491 or S.526, Criminal P.C. As the Courts created under the Code of Criminal Procedure continued to function alongside of these Special Courts, an attempt was made by Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance to define the cases or classes of cases that should be tried by the special courts under the Ordinance and not by the ordinary Courts in the ordinary way. It was enacted that they should try such offences or classes of offences or such cases or classes of cases as the Provincial Government or certain executive officers may, by general or special order in writing, direct.

The validity of Ordinance 2 of 1942 and the legality of sentences passed by Courts functioning under that Ordinance were questioned before all the High Courts and all but the Calcutta High Court held the Ordinance to be valid and the sentences to be legal. The Calcutta

High court however took a different view and directed the release of persons who had been sentenced by the Special Courts subject of course to their liability to be tried before the ordinary Courts. It was on an appeal by the Crown against this judgment of the Calcutta High Court that the matter came before this court in May/June 1943. This Court (by a majority judgment) held that so long as the code of Criminal Procedure had not been repealed or validly and effectively excluded, a trial for any crime could only be held by a Court constituted under the Code and in accordance with the procedure therein prescribed. It further held that it was only by a legislative provision that the Courts constituted under the Ordinance could be invested with jurisdiction to hold a criminal trial, and that Ss.5, 10 and 16 which left it entirely to the executive authorities to determine what cases should be tried by the regular Courts and by the special Courts respectively, were not valid legislative provisions and that they were accordingly inoperative either to divest the regular criminal Courts of their jurisdiction or to invest the Special Courts with jurisdiction. It also pointed out that the powers of the High Court were only taken away by the executive orders under Ss.5, 10 and 16 and that this was not permissible in view of S.223, Constitution Act. It was, however, expressly stated in that judgment that there could be no suggestion that the Ordinance was ultra vires the Governor-General on the ground that its subject-matter lay outside his Ordinance making powers. There could be no doubt that by a properly framed Ordinance the Governor-General could have constituted Special Courts, invested them with jurisdiction to try specified cases or classes of cases and prescribed the procedure to be followed by them in the trial of such cases even to the exclusion of material provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Whatever opinion might be held as to the expediency of curtailing the safeguards enacted by the Code to ensure a fair trial, no doubt could be cast upon the competence of the Ordinance-making authority to restrict or even remove any of these safeguards: see (1885) 10 A.C. 675.

The arguments now urged before us on behalf of the appellants were based on two assumptions, (i) that Ordinance 19 of 1943 had been enacted on the admitted footing that Ordinance 2 of 1942 was void and inoperative and (ii) that the new Ordinance attempted to do something which this Court had held that the Ordinance making authority had no power to do. Neither of these assumptions seems to us to be justified. The situation as it stood on 5th June 1943, was as follows: The Calcutta High Court and two Judges of this Court had held that Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance were not the proper way of investing the Special Courts with jurisdiction. All the other High Courts in India and one Judge of this Court had taken a different view and this Court had granted leave to the Government to take the matter on appeal to His Majesty in Council. The government had however to make immediate provision for the numerous cases which had before that date been decided by the Special Courts in the various Provinces and in respect of the cases which were at the time pending before those Courts. It would have been scarcely reasonable to keep the whole position problematical till the matter could be decided by the Judicial Committee. It must have seemed equally unreasonable to ignore the judgment of this Court. A solution in the nature of a compromise between the two extreme positions seems to have been thought to be the best in the circumstances. As regards pending cases, the best that could be done in the light of this Courts judgment was to direct them to be tried by the regular Courts. It would no doubt have been possible to continue the Special courts by reframing Ss.5, 10 and 16; but this court had also strongly commented on the provisions excluding the jurisdiction of the High Court. As regards cases where sentences had already been passed by the special Courts, it would have been a serious demand on public time, not to speak of public funds, to think of the retrial of all the accused who had been thus sentenced, as their number must have been very large. Nor could it be assumed that it would in all cases have been to the interest of the accused themselves to be retried, if they could in some other way be given an opportunity of showing that their conviction was not justified. In view of this Court's observations on the policy of excluding the High Court's jurisdiction, it was apparently felt that the best thing to do in the circumstances was to maintain the convictions, but to allow them to be questioned by way of appeal and revision as provided by the Code of Criminal Procedure. Whether it was competent to the Ordinance making authority to make these provisions or not is not the question, when we have to interpret the provisions of the Ordinance. It may be that when there are two possible constructions, one of which will make the enactment void and the other give it some effect, the latter may have to be preferred, though it may not wholly achieve the purpose of the framers. But in the view that we take on the question of the validity of the Ordinance, no such difficulty arises in the present case. It is not right to assume that Ordinance 19 admitted that Ordinance 2 of 1942 was void. On that assumption, even its formal repeal would not have been necessary, further, it is not easy to reconcile the provisions of sub-Ss. (1) and (2) of S.3 with that assumption. Even S.4, which declares pending trials before the special Courts void, does not necessarily import that the previous Ordinance was void, it only shows that Government preferred to have the pending cases tried by the regular Courts rather than hold them up till the question of the operativeness of Ordinance 2 of 1942 was decided by the Privy Council.

It was strongly insisted that sub-s. (1) of S.3 did not use familiar words like 'validation' or 'confirmation,' though the word 'confirmation' is used in the heading. The question has however to be determined by a consideration of the words actually used and not by speculation as to why other words had not been used. It had to be admitted on behalf of the accused that some kind of operativeness had been given by S.3 (1) to the sentences that had been passed by the special Courts, but it was said that this was only to the extent required to make proceedings by way of appeal or revision possible. And, as the formality of an appeal or revision need not have been insisted on if the Legislature had proceeded on the assumption that the sentences were void, it was suggested that it must have been the intention to leave it to the convicted persons either to acquiesce in the sentences or avail themselves of the opportunity given by the Ordinance to get the sentences set aside. It was explained that the cases dealt with under S.3 (1) were not assimilated to those dealt with by S.4, because an accused person who had already been convicted might in some cases prefer to undergo the sentence that had been imposed upon him rather than face a retrial which would be the result if the sentence had been declared void as one passed by a Court which had no jurisdiction. It was also said that having regard to the disabilities imposed on the accused at a trial by the Special Courts, it would not be fair to assume that the Ordinance-making authority intended to confirm sentences passed at such a trial or believed that adequate justice would be done to the accused in such cases merely by giving them a right of appeal or revision on the record as it stood. We are not satisfied that there is much force in these arguments. In our opinions they do not give due effect to the language of sub-ss.(1) and (2) of section 3.

Sub-section (1) of S.3 requires the sentence to be treated as if (1) 'the trial at which it was passed had been held in accordance with the Code of Criminal Procedure', (2) by an officer 'exercising competent jurisdiction under the said code.' It is obvious that these two groups of words were employed for the purpose of meeting the two requirements insisted on by this court in the previous judgment, namely, that so long as the Criminal Procedure Code had not been effectively excluded, the trial must be held in accordance with the Code and by Courts having jurisdiction under the Code. The suggestion that they might have been put in to indicate the classes of cases where remedies should be sought by appeal and revision respectively is unconvincing. The purpose would have been achieved even by the remaining words found in the section, namely, as if 'they had been passed by a Session Judge, an Assistant Sessions Judge or a Magistrate of the First class respectively.' That the purpose of this section was to indicate not merely the forum but also the nature and extent of the relief to be had is made clear by sub-s.(2) which subjects the sentence 'to such rights of appeal as would have accrued and to such powers of revision as would have been exercisable under the code' and then repeats the words 'if the sentence had at a trial so held been passed.' 'At a trial so held' obviously means, as set out in sub-s.(1), a trial held in accordance with the Code and by a Court having competent jurisdiction under the Code. As sub-s.(2) gives the right of appeal and the power of revision only on this hypothetical footing, the appellate or revisional authority cannot ignore this basic postulate and give relief on the very ground that the trial had not been held under the Code or before a Court exercising competent jurisdiction under the Code. If S.3 (1) gives any validity at all to the sentences that had been passed by the Special Court there is nothing to limit such validity up to the time that the sentences are appealed against. As for the argument based on the improbability of an intention to confirm sentences passed at trials which were characterized as unfair to the accused, it seems to us incorrect to assume that the authority which enacted Ordinance 19 would have thought that the procedure prescribed by itself in Ordinance 2 of 1942 was not in the circumstances sufficiently fair to the accused. It might well have thought that any hardship even on this score would be remedied by allowing the right of appeal or revision. It was only reasonable to expect that if the appellate or revisional authority found reason to think on going into the merits that the accused had been prejudiced by the nature of the trial, would set things right. But this is different from saying that the appellate or revisional authority should automatically set aside the sentence merely on the ground that the accused had not been tried in accordance with the Code. It has been suggested that the right of appeal would in the circumstances be illusory. We are by no means satisfied that that would be so. We see no justification for importing a fictitious or notional 'trial by jury' and on that assumption limiting the powers of the appellate court. Even this possible doubt has been removed by ordinance 32 of 1943, which allows a right of appeal both on questions of fact and on questions of law. In any event, questions of fairness or policy are not matters which the Court can take into consideration when the language of the enactment leaves little or no room for doubt.

It has been further contended that as S.4 proceeds on the footing that the trials before the Special Courts were void, consistency requires that S.3 also must be interpreted on the same assumption. It was even said that any other view would make the provisions of the Ordinance illogical and self contradictory. It is difficult to follow this argument. It seems to us that on this basis there would have been no need to make separate provisions for the two classes of cases respectively dealt with the Ss.3 and 4. Even S.4 cannot be said to have proceeded on the assumption that the trials before the Special Courts were void. On the principle embodied in S.6 (e), General Clauses Act, the result of the repeal of an enactment on cases pending at the time of the repeal would be that they would continue as if the enactment had not been repealed. But this is subject to the qualification that the repealing enactment contains no provision or indication to the contrary. It was open to the Government to insist that in spite of the decision of this Court on the last occasion, cases pending before the Special Courts at the time should continue to be tried before them, in the expectation that the Judicial Committee might take a different view as to the operation of Ordinance 2 of 1942. This would have been the position even after the repeal, if the matter had been allowed to rest upon S.6 (2), General Clauses Act. But apparently as the Government were not prepared to adopt that attitude, they have enacted S.4 in its present terms. As already explained, there is sufficient reason for making a distinction between cases dealt with by S.3 and cases dealt with by S.4 and there is no illogicality or contradiction involved in such distinction. A point has been made that S.3 (1) seeks to give validity only to the sentence and no to the conviction. Nothing turns on this, because the section requires the sentence to be treated as one passed by a competent Court at a proper trial. On this footing no separate provision referring to the 'conviction' was necessary.

In arguing the question as to the validity of the Ordinance, counsel for the accused recognised that the principle of validation by subsequent legislation was quite as applicable to judicial as to ministerial proceedings. This is expressly so stated in the very passage on which they relied from Cooley's 'Constitutional Limitations' Extn.B, P. 205 (see also pp. 773-6). They laid stress on the author's statement as to the limitations on that power and contended (1) that the Ordinance had sought to give validity to what the Ordinance-making authority could not have authorized even by antecedent legislation; (2) that while such legislation might seek to aid and support judicial proceedings, the Legislature could not under the guise of legislation be permitted to exercise judicial power, and (3) that it was not competent to the Legislature by retrospective legislation to make valid any proceedings which had been held in the Courts, but which were void for want of jurisdiction over the parties. The first of these limitations is without doubt recognised in the English law: see per Willes J. in (1870) 6 Q.B. 1 at p. 17. In support of limitations (2) and (3), Cooley cites the decisions in 19 LLL.226 and 2 ALLEN. 361 see also 19 Am. Rep. 656.

The argument with reference to the first limitation was based on the assumption that Ordinance 19 sought to validate the very delegation of power to the executive which was attempted by Ss.5, 10 and 16 of Ordinance 2 of 1942 and which, it was held by this court in the previous case, could not be validly done. This assumption is, in our opinion, unwarranted. The expression 'what could have been antecedently authorized' implies that this had not as a matter of fact been done previously. In the circumstances of this case that could not be said of the delegation of power to the executive authorities, because that had, in fact, been done by Ss.5, 10 and 16 of the previous Ordinance. It is the acts of the Special Courts in trying cases and passing sentences as they had done that had not in fact been duly authorized on the previous occasion and it is those acts that are now sought to be declared valid. The enquiry under this head must therefore be whether the Ordinance-making authority had power (if only it had properly exercised such power) to create these special Courts and authorize them to try cases and pass sentences. On the existence of such power no doubt was cast by this court on the previous occasion and it has not been denied even by counsel for the accused in these cases. There is accordingly no substance in this objection. In this view, no question arises of the legislating authority attempting to do indirectly what it could not do directly. We were in this connexion invited to express a definite opinion on the point which we had left open in (1943) 6 F.L.J. F.C. 79 viz, whether Ordinance 2 of 1942 was promulgated on a declaration of emergency of the kind contemplated by S.72 of Sch.9. We do not see that it would make any difference to the decision of the present question even if Ordinance 2 of 1942 should be held to have been inoperative on that ground; that would not imply the absence of power in the Governor-General, but would only involve the conclusion that the power had not been properly exercised on the previous occasion.

Turning to the other two objections referred to above, it is necessary to consider how far they rest upon peculiarities of the American Constitution. As a general proposition, it may be true enough to say that the legislative function belongs to the Legislature and the judicial function to the judiciary. Such differentiation of functions and distribution of powers are in a sense part of the Indian law as of the American law. But an examination of the American authorities will show that the development of the results of this distribution in America has been influenced not merely by the simple fact of the distribution of functions, but by the assumption that the constitution was intended to reproduce the provision that had already existed in many of the State constitutions, positively forbidding the legislature from exercising judicial powers: [see paras 520 et seq. in Story's 'Commentary on the Constitution of the United States']. The reasons contained in the passages cited from the 'Federalist' in paras 1585, etc., of Story and the quotation from Mr Tucker in the foot-note to para 1637 will explain the development of the American rule. In one case, it was observed:

It is a fundamental principle that every person restrained of his liberty is entitled to have the cause of such restraint enquired into by a judicial officer. The judicial department of the Government cannot by any legislation be deprived of this power or relieved of this duty. [103 Am. St Rep. 944, quoted in the foot-note on page 185 in Cooley's 'Constitutional Limitations'].

This view is partly based on considerations which will be discussed when dealing more specifically with the third objection. One result of the application of this rule in the United States has been to hold that 'legislative action cannot be made to retract upon past controversies and to revise decisions which the Courts in the exercise of their undoubted authority have made'.

The reason given is that this would not only be the exercise of judicial power, but it would be its exercise in the most objectionable and offensive form, since the Legislature would in effect sit as a Court of review to which parties might appeal when dissatisfied with the rulings of the courts. [See Cooley's 'Constitutional Limitations', page 190].

In India, however, the legislature has more than once enacted laws providing that suits which had been dismissed on a particular view of the law must be restored and retried. Two well-known instances are S.31 (2), Limitation Act, 1908, which provided for the restoration of suits dismissed on the ground that the 12 years' period of limitation under Article 132, Limitation Act applied to suits for sale by holders of simple mortgages and the Public Suits Validation Act (11 of 1932) which provided for the restoration of suits dismissed on a particular interpretation of S.93, Civil P.C. Again, debt relief legislation in the various provinces has provided even for the reopening of decrees passed inter parties. In view of the history of the rule in America, it is questionable whether it would be right to apply the same rule in this country. Further, the American authorities themselves show that, even in the United States, limitations had to be placed on the strict American rule and that it was not found possible to differentiate by a clear-cut definition the exercise of legislative power from the exercise of judicial power. [See Will's 'Constitutional Law of the United States', p. 142.]

An Australian case (1931) 38 com. L.R. 153, to which we were referred by the Advocate-General of India, bears some resemblance to the present case. An Act of 1922 had constituted a Board of Appeal to deal with appeals in income-tax matters and this Board had given certain decisions. But the law courts declared that the Australian Parliament had no power to invest this Board of Appeal with judicial power. A later Act established what was described as a Board of Review and assigned to it functions which were held to be different in character from those assigned to the former Board of Appeal. It, however, went on to provide that decisions which had already been pronounced by the Board of Appeal 'should be deemed to be and at all times to have been decisions of a Board of Review given in pursuance of the provisions of the later Act'. The later Act was also challenged as vesting judicial power in the Board of Review, but this contention was overruled. The validating provision in the later Act was next challenged as constituting 'an attempt by Parliament itself to exercise the judicial power of the Commonwealth.' The answer to this argument is relevant here. One learned Judge (Isaacs J.) interpreted this provision as implying a 'retrospective creation' of the Board of Review and placing the decisions of the old Board of Appeal on the same footing as they would be on if the now existing Board of Review had then pronounced them (pp. 173, 174). Another learned Judge (Starke J.) observed:

Parliament simply takes up certain determinations which exist in fact, though made without authority, and prescribes not that they shall be acts done by a Board of Review, but that they shall be treated as they would be treated if they were such acts. The sections, not doubt, apply retrospectively, but they do not constitute and exercise of the judicial power on the part of the Parliament (p. 212).

We think that this latter description is apposite to what happened in the present case and also answers the argument that it is an impossible feat to convert what was not a trial under the Code of Criminal Procedure into a trial under the Code.

Judged by any reasonable test, it seems to us difficult to hold that what the Ordinance has attempted to do in this case amounts to an exercise of judicial power. A passing reference was made in this connexion to S.71 (3), Constitution Act, which precludes the legislative chambers from conferring on themselves 'the status of a Court'. This and the similar provision in S.28 (3) have no bearing upon the present question. They were intended to set at rest the question whether these legislative bodies had the power to punish for contempt. (CF. (1866) L.R. 1.P.C. 328 (1886), 11 A.C.197 and (1896) A.C. 600.) Section 313 (1) which was also relied on in this connexion relates to the 'executive' authority of the Governor-General in Council and not to the 'law making' capacity of the Governor-General. It was contended that once the decisions of the Special Courts were held void for want of jurisdiction, the position in the present case would be nothing different from a sentence imposed by the Legislature directly on each of the accused in all the cases that had been before the special courts. This does not seem to us to be a fair or correct view of the position. The Legislature has not attempted to decide the question of the guilt or innocence of any of the accused. That question had as a matter of fact been decided by tribunals which were directed to follow a certain judicial procedure. The effect of the absence of jurisdiction in these tribunals falls to be considered when dealing with the third objection. For the present purpose, however, we see no justification for importing a fiction that there had in fact been no judicial trial and that it is the legislation that declares the guilt of the accused in all the cases and imposes sentences upon them. It must be remembered that even under the Ordinance, the sentences are in due course subject to appeal to and revision by other regular Courts of the land.

In dealing with the third objection, it is again necessary to examine the basis of the American rule in order to determine whether it can be followed here. It is clear from the American authorities that this limitation has been derived from the interpretation placed by the American

Courts on what are known as the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments which provide against any person being 'deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law.' The expression 'due process of law' has been interpreted as referring only to 'judicial process' and as not including legislation, and 'judicial process' was held to imply competence or jurisdiction in the Court and an opportunity for a hearing. As this requirement had been made part of the written constitution, it followed that no enactment passed by a Legislature limited by that constitution could authorize anything in violation of it. [See Willoughby's 'Constitution of the United States', paras 1115 to 1117, 1122 and 1123]. Hence the rule (stated by Cooley) that it would be incompetent for the Legislature, by retrospective legislation, to make valid any proceedings which had been had in the Courts but which were void for want of jurisdiction over the parties.

The constitutional position in India is different. Comparing the American Amendments with the provisions of the Constitution Act, 1935, it will be seen that the latter contains nothing corresponding to so much of the Amendments as related to deprivation of 'life or liberty' and that even as to 'property' it only requires that such deprivation should be 'by authority of law': see S.299. This does not of course mean that the well-established principle of British jurisprudence as to the sacredness of personal freedom is not part of the law of British India. But as pointed out by Dicey, the rule remains only as a principle of 'private law' and is not a part of the Constitution: [See Dicey's 'Law of the constitution', Edn. 9, p. 203 and Wade and Phillips, 'Constitutional Law.' Edn. 2, p. 354]. While its enactment as an article of the Constitution would have placed it beyond the power of the Indian Legislature to alter it, the position must be different so long as it remains a rule of private law, however cardinal and fundamental: [See Dicey, p. 200, footnote]. The principle of the English law as to personal liberty was stated by Lord Atkin in (1931) A.C. 662 in the following terms:

In accordance with British jurisprudence no member of the executive can interfere with the liberty or property of a British subject except on the condition that he can support the legality of his action before a Court of justice.

Comparing the language of the American Amendments with this statement of the English rule, it will be noticed that what is required under the English rule is not 'due process of law', but 'legal justification' and such justification may be shown as much by legislation or statutory rules as by production of an order of Court: see (1917) A.C. 260. It does not however follow that Legislatures in India can arbitrarily interfere with the life or the liberty of the citizen, because they have only such powers as have been conferred on them by Sch.7, Constitution Act.

The real question in the present case therefore is whether the Ordinance is covered by any of the entries in Sch.7, Constitution Act. It was not contended that the mere absence of a specific provision about 'validating laws' was by itself of much significance. As observed by this Court in 1940 F.C.R. 110 at p. 136 the power of validation must be taken to be ancillary or subsidiary to the power to deal with the particular subjects specified in the Lists. No question arises in this case as to the distribution of the subjects between the Provincial Legislature and the Central Legislature, because a declaration of emergency under S.102, Constitution Act, has been proclaimed. It was contended that under the terms of S.102 (1) the Legislature could make laws only 'for a Province'. that is, separately for each Province and not for a number of Provinces together. There is no basis for this contention. Under the Interpretation Act, the use of the singular number will in the absence of any indication to the contrary in the context or the nature of the subject, include the plural; the clause has apparently been worded in that particular form, because it has been enacted as an exception to S.100 (3) which excludes the power of the Federal Legislature 'to make laws for a Province' in certain cases. If the Central authority can make laws for each of the Provinces, there is no principle in insisting that even when a uniform law has to be enacted for each of several Provinces, there can be no single enactment, but that there must be as many enactments as there are Provinces. It was further contended that where, as in this case, a proclamation of emergency under S.102 referred only to a threat 'by war', the Central Legislature could encroach on provincial subjects only in respect of matters necessitated by the war and not in respect of subjects relating to 'internal disturbance.' The words of the section do not justify any such limitation. As regards authorization by the Lists in Sch.7, it seems to us sufficient to say that the subject-matter of the present Ordinance is in our judgment covered by the expression 'administration of justice' in entry No. 1 of List II and the expression 'criminal procedure' in entry No. 2 of List III.

On behalf of the Crown, strong reliance was placed on the decision of the Judicial Committee in (1907) A.C. 93 and of the High Courts in India in 55 Bom. 263 and 60 Cal. 742 and as much controversy raged round them we feel we should refer to them shortly. The decision in 1907 A.C.93 is on the face of it, a strong authority in support of the contention advanced on behalf of the Crown. Their Lordships were dealing with an Act passed by the Natal Parliament which provided that 'all sentences passed by any person administering martial law . . . shall be deemed to be final sentences passed by duly and legally constituted courts of this colony'. It is no doubt true that the matter was then before their Lordships on an application for special leave and it might have been sufficient answer to the application to say that the decision of a martial law authority was not that of a judicial tribunal at all and could not therefore be brought up before their Lordships. But their Lordships nevertheless proceeded to give other reasons in support of their dismissal of the application. The sentences in the judgment which have been particularly relied on by counsel for the Crown run as follows:

An Act of Parliament has been passed in Natal which in terms enacts the legality of the sentences in question and provides that they shall be deemed to be sentences passed in the regular and ordinary course of criminal jurisdiction. This board has no power to review these sentences or to enquire in to the propriety or impropriety of passing such an Act of Parliament. The Act has been assented to by the Governor and having the force of law, is binding on their Lordships.¹

We have been asked to treat this as a complete answer to two of the contentions advanced on behalf of the appellants, namely, that legislation conferring validity on sentences passed by an authority which had no jurisdiction in law is not permissible and that such legislation is in the nature of the exercise of judicial authority. On behalf of the appellants, two grounds of distinction (mentioned in the judgment of Bapjai J.) were relied on. It was said (on the strength of an observation of Mr Brand in his book on the Union of South Africa referred to by Bapjai J.) that under the South African Constitution, the Parliament was supreme and that even in Natal, as in Great Britain, the Courts had no authority to act as interpreters of the Constitution. This was answered by counsel for the Crown by pointing out that whatever might be the position in South Africa after the Statute of Westminster and after certain South African legislation of 1934, the position in 1906, when the Natal legislation considered by their Lordships was passed, was nothing different from that of any other Crown colony, as the Natal Charter of 1856 only contained the usual clause authorizing legislation for the peace and good government of the colony. That the same continued to be the legal position even after the Union of South Africa Act till the enactment of the Statute of Westminster was shown by comparing the decision in 1930 South African L.R. App. Div. 431 with, that in 1937 South African L.R. App. Div. 229. It was next urged by counsel for the appellants that this decision had been treated by certain writers on Constitutional Law only as an authority for the proposition that an English Court could not enter into the propriety as opposed to the legal validity of a colonial statute (Chalmers and Asquith 'Outlines of Constitutional Law', 3rd Edn. p. 203 and Ridges' 'Constitution Law of England', 6th Edn, p. 491) and they asked us to infer therefrom that the question of the validity of the statute had apparently not been argued before their Lordships. On behalf of the Crown, attention was drawn to the report in (1906) 22 T.L.R. 413, where the history of the proceedings of the martial law tribunal in Natal has been set out and the arguments at the Bar at that stage have also been more fully stated and we were asked to say that the same learned counsel who appeared for the petitioner in 1907 A.C.93 could not have omitted to raise the question of validity. Lastly, it was contended that a martial law tribunal was more analogous to an executive authority than to a judicial authority and that the decision was no authority for the contention that a void judgment of a judicial tribunal could be validated by subsequent legislation. Their Lordships, observation is very general and it seems rather difficult to restrict its effect in the way that counsel for the appellants asked us to do.

The decision in 55 Bom.263 is no doubt an authority in favour of the Crown in so far as it held S.11 of the Ordinance then in question to be valid, but there is little discussion of the point there. In 60 Cal. 742 the Court had not to consider the questions arising in the present case. 1920 A.C. 230 which was also cited before us, throws little light on the questions arising here. Their Lordships had not to deal with a question of validation but only with a limited plea of ultra vires based on the exception to S.93 (1), British North America Act, to the effect that the law should not prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the Union.

Two other grounds of invalidation were suggested, though but faintly. It was said the provisions of the Ordinance were hardly likely to conduce to peace and good government, and were not therefore authorized by S.72 of Sch.9. It is sufficient answer to this to say that the Judicial committee have laid down that this is not a matter for the Courts to investigate. It was next said that S.3 (1) of the Ordinance was retrospective in its operation and that the Governor-General had no power to pass Ordinance with retrospective effect. The question has been discussed at some length in Federal court cases Nos 13 to 21 of 1943 and S.3 (1) of ordinance 19 is no more retrospective in its operation than S.3 of ordinance 14 of 1943 which was then held to be valid. We accordingly hold that S.3 (1) of Ordinance 19 of 1943 confers validity and full effectiveness on sentences passed by Special Courts functioning under the Special Criminal Courts Ordinance (Ordinance 2 of 1942) and that this provision is not ultra vires the Governor-General.

Two questions have arisen in the course of the hearing on the construction of S.4 of the Ordinance. It has been brought to our notice that in some instances (cases Nos 39 and 54 before us) references which had to be made or have been made under S.8 of Ordinance 2 of 1942 had either not been made or had not been disposed of by the Review Judge, when the new Ordinance (19 of 1943) came into operation. A question arises whether such cases fall under S.3 (1) or S.4 of the Ordinance. Section 4 purports to deal with cases of which the 'trials' before the Special Courts had not 'concluded'. The Advocate-General of the United Provinces admitted that the trial could be said to be concluded only when the Judge had pronounced his judgment (vide the way that the sections are grouped in sub-divisions F.&H. of chap. 23, Criminal P.C.), but he maintained that the 'review' proceedings under S.8 of the Ordinance were no part of the trial. The Advocate-General of Bihar maintained that the trial must be held to have concluded as soon as the case became ripe for judgment (vide chap.26 of the Code which treats the judgment as coming after the close of the trial). Our attention was drawn in this connexion to A.I.R. 1933 Cal.551 and A.I.R. 1938 All.102. The discussion in these cases only confirms what one would have thought even independently of them, viz, that the meaning of the word 'trial' must largely depend on the context and the scheme of the enactment in which it occurs. Though the word may sometimes denote only the recording of evidence, it is obvious that in the context in which it occurs in Ordinance 19 of 1943 it must comprise all stages of the proceeding, including the imposition of the sentence. The contradistinction made by the Ordinance is between cases in which a sentence had been passed by the Special Courts and cases in which no such sentence had been passed, the former falling under S.3 (1) and the latter under S.4. If it should be assumed that the two categories might not be exhaustive and cases might be conceived which even while not falling under S.4 might not fall under S.3 (1), the result would only be that the proceedings in such cases would be void under the former decision of this court and the accused would have to be retried before the regular courts. The cases which are dealt with by cls (a) and (b) of S.8 of Ordinance 2 of 1942 stand on a special footing. The two clauses provide for review of the Special Judge's judgment by one of the Judges of the High Court nominated by the Provincial Government. The cases which are dealt with by cls (a) and (b) of S.8 of Ordinance 2 of 1942 stand on a special footing. The word 'review' does not appear to have been used in any technical sense there, but it obviously differs both from a review as understood in the Civil Procedure Code as well as an appeal, because these proceedings are ordinarily initiated by the party concerned. The scheme of S.8 of Ordinance 2 of 1942 is that in the more serious classes of crimes therein referred to, the sentence of the Special Judge should, apart from any initiative of the accused, be considered by the reviewing judge. There is of course a difference between cls (a) and (b) to this extent that in cases falling under cl.(a) the review follows compulsorily and automatically, whereas in cases falling under cl.(b) there view procedure becomes available only if the Special Judge thinks it necessary to submit the case to the reviewing Judge. But once the case has been so submitted, there is no difference in the legal position between cases falling under cl.(a) and cases falling under cl.(b) of S.8. It may perhaps be putting the position too high to describe the sentence of the Special Judge in these cases as only provisional or tentative; but the scheme of the section undoubtedly is that the proceeding against the accused in such cases is not to be regarded as complete till after the review is over. In this view, we are of the opinion that in all cases falling under S.8 (a) and in all cases where references had been made by the Special Judge under S.8 (b) the accused will have to be tried under S.4 of ordinance 19 of 1943, unless the reviewing Judge, acting under the special Criminal Courts Ordinance, had given his decision before the new Ordinance 19 of 1943 came into operation. The words 'whether or not the proceedings in which the sentence was passed were submitted for review under S.8' in cl.(2) of S.3 must be taken to have been used only to indicate that even the adverse termination of the review proceedings would not exclude the right of appeal and revision given by the clause. The possibility that the High Court as a Court of appeal or acting as a confirming Court under chap. 27, Criminal P.C., may consider or confirm the sentence will not in our opinion suffice to bring this special class of cases under S.3 (1) of the new Ordinance, or take them out of the operation of section 4.

A further contention was advanced with reference to cases in which the accused had been sentenced to death by the special courts. It was argued that as under Ss.31 and 374, Criminal P.C., a sentence of death passed by a Sessions Judge was subject to confirmation by the High Court and as no such confirmation by the High Court as such had been provided for in the Ordinance, one of two consequences must follow: either the unconfirmed sentences must be treated as incapable of execution on the ground that there was no one who could properly refer them for confirmation, or the cases should be treated as pending cases within the meaning of S.4 of the Ordinance. Whilst we agree that such sentences cannot be executed until confirmed by the High Court, we can see nothing to prevent the judicial officer who passed the sentences or the Sessions Judge for the time being referring them for confirmation to the High Court. We are also unable to accede to the contention that such cases can be treated as falling under S.4 even after they had been dealt with by a Review Judge under S.8 of Ordinance 2 of 1942. Section 4 of Ordinance 19 can be invoked only in cases where the trial before the Special Courts had not concluded. The High Court acting as such under the Criminal Procedure code cannot be spoken of as a 'special court' within the meaning of the above provision. We now turn to the individual cases before us.

Cases Nos 39 and 54 – In these two cases the convicted persons have come up in appeal against judgments of the Patna and Allahabad High Courts respectively dismissing their appeals from sentences passed by Special Judges. In both cases the sentences were subject to review under S.8 (a) of Ordinance 2 of 1942. On the date of the commencement of Ordinance 19 of 1943 the review had not been completed. These cases therefore fall within the purview of S.4 of that Ordinance, with the result that the proceedings had in respect of them before the Special Judges must be held to be void and the cases must be deemed to have been transferred to the appropriate court under that section for inquiry and trial in accordance with the provision of the Criminal Procedure Code. The appeals in these two cases are allowed and further proceedings will be taken in accordance with the provisions of S.4 of ordinance 19.

Cases Nos 35, 36, 43, 44, 45, 46 and 49 – Cases Nos 35 and 36 are appeals from orders of the Patna High Court refusing writs of habeas corpus, while case No. 49 is an appeal from an order of the Madras High Court refusing writ of certiorari. Cases Nos 43, 44, 45 and 46 are appeals from a preliminary judgment of the High court at Nagpur upholding the validity of S.3 (1) of Ordinance 19 of 1943. The conclusions at which we have arrived concerning the validity and effect of S.3 of the Ordinance must result in the dismissal of all these appeals and we order accordingly.

Cases Nos 40, 41 and 42 – These are appeals from judgments of the Patna High Court dismissing in each case the appeal of the convict from a sentence of death and confirming the sentence passed by a Special Judge for the offence of murder in the first two cases and for the offence of waging war against His Majesty the King in the third case. In these and in other cases where the High Courts had dismissed the appeals of the convicts on the merits, we granted leave on applications made to us for grounds on the merits of the cases to be raised before us. In some of these cases counsel made attempts to persuade us to assess the weight of evidence for ourselves in order to determine whether the conviction was or was not justified in each case on the evidence. This we declined to do as we hold the view that in cases of this description we should ordinarily accept as final the conclusions of fact at which the High Court has arrived unless it can be shown that the High court has either misread any part of the evidence or has overlooked any material portion of it. In these three cases we have not been shown sufficient grounds for disturbing the conclusions at which the High Court has arrived concerning the guilt of the appellants.

As regards the sentence it was urged that the death sentence imposed in these cases should be reduced to transportation for life on account of the time that has elapsed since the sentences were first pronounced: see 21 I.C. 882 at p. 893. It is true that death sentences were imposed in these cases several months ago, that the appellants have been lying ever since under threat of execution, and that the long delay has been caused very largely by the time taken in proceedings over legal points in respect of the constitution of the courts before which they were tried and of the validity of the sentences themselves. We do not doubt that this Court has power, where there has been inordinate delay in executing death sentences in cases which come before it to allow the appeal in so far as the death sentences is concerned and substitute a sentence of transportation for life on account of the time factor alone, however right the death sentence was at the time when it was originally imposed. But this is a jurisdiction which very closely entrenches on the powers and duties of the executive in regard to sentences imposed by Courts. It is a jurisdiction which any Court should be slow to exercise. We do not propose ourselves to exercise it in these cases. Except in case No. 47 (in which we are commuting the sentence largely for other reasons as hereafter appears), the circumstances of the crimes were such that if the death sentence which was the only sentence that could have been properly imposed originally, is to be commuted, we feel that it is for the executive to do so. We do not doubt that in each case the executive will give the fullest consideration to the period that has elapsed since the original imposition of the sentence and to the consequent mental suffering undergone by the convict. It has been further suggested that in England when cases in which a death sentence has been imposed are allowed to be taken to the House of Lords on account of some important legal point, the consequential delay in finally disposing of the case is treated as a ground for the commutation of the death sentence, and that if such a practice is recognized in cases which go with the Attorney-General's authority to the House of Lords because they 'involve some point of law of exceptional public importance' [Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, S.1 (6)] a similar course might well be taken in this country in these cases in connexion with which 'substantial questions of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution Act' have twice had to be considered by this Court in view of the granting by High Courts of certificates under S.205, Constitution Act. We consider however that these matters are primarily for the consideration of the Executive and do not in the circumstances of these cases justify us in commuting the death sentences by orders of this Court. With these observations we dismiss these appeals.

Case No. 47 — The appellant in this case was convicted by a Special Judge of the offence of murder and was sentenced to death on 10th September 1942. His appeal to the Allahabad High court was dismissed and the sentence of death was confirmed. The appellant is a young man of 25 who has been twice widowed. His victim was his aunt, 30 years of age, whose husband (Kanchan) had about six years previously murdered his own brother, appellant's father. Kanchan was sentenced to death for the murder, but lost his reason while awaiting the execution of the death sentence, and is now detained as a lunatic. The evidence in this case leaves no room for doubt that the appellant was rightly convicted of murder. There is some confusion as to the exact motive for the undoubtedly brutal assault of which the appellant made his aunt the victim. The prosecution alleged that the appellant being a widower was chagrined by the refusal of his aunt to become his mistress. In his statement before the Special Judge he said that another uncle (P.W.7) who according to the appellant was behind the prosecution was on terms of improper intimacy with the deceased and resented even small acts of kindness on the part of the deceased towards the appellant. In the appeal preferred by him through the jail authorities to the High court, the appellant stated that his aunt was a woman of loose character and was pursuing him with unwelcome attentions. The previous history of this family indicates that the appellant probably suffers from an unbalanced mind. The nature and ferocity of the assault upon his aunt appear to confirm this. In committing the offence the appellant must have been actuated by jealousy or by indignation either of which would tend further to disturb the balance of his mind. He has besides been awaiting the execution of his death sentence for over a year. We think that in this case a sentence of transportation for life would be more appropriate than the sentence of death. We accordingly reduce the sentence of death to one of transportation for life and subject to this modification dismiss the appeal.

Case No. 38 — The appellants in this case, convicted by a Special Judge of the offence of rioting and mischief by fire and were sentenced to three years rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 300, in the case of Jagan Nath, and four years rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 300, in the case of Ramanand. Their appeal was dismissed by the Patna High Court. The appellants are alleged to have been members of an unlawful assembly consisting of about two thousand people who raided a police beat house on 21st August 1942, and destroyed various items of Government property, and also looted a post office and a liquor shop close by. The question on which we feel considerable doubt is whether the complicity of the two appellants before us in these events has been satisfactorily established. On the evening of 21st August an entry (i.x.1) was made in the station diary kept at the beat house, by the Assistant Sub-Inspector in charge of the beat house, recording a brief summary of the incidents that took place in the course of the riot but omitting all mention of the names of any accused persons in connexion therewith. On 26th August, Bansi Lall Chaudhury (P.W.4), the liquor vendor, and Umapat Lab (P.W.6) the branch postmaster, handed to the police reports in respect of the incidents relating to the liquor shop and the post office respectively. These reports are EX.3 and Ex.5. Exhibit 3 contains the names of eleven persons including those of the appellants, while Ex.5 refers to a mob consisting of Ramanand Sahu and others. The formal first information report was not drawn up till 3rd September 1942. It contains the names of the appellants and several others. The evidence in the case consists of the testimony of Siva Chandai Tewari (P.W.1), Assistant Sub-Inspector in charge of the beat house; Ramanand Singh (P.W.2), constable, and Abbas Mian (P.W.3), dafadar, both attached to the beat house; Bansi Lall Chaudhury (P.W.4); Nagina Prasad (P.W.5), Sub-Inspector of Police, who carried out the investigation; and Umapat Lab (P.W.6). These witnesses were examined in Court on 21st and 22nd December.

The investigation had been supervised by Babu Rameshwar Prasad Singh, Divisional Inspector. On the morning of 23rd December a petition was put in on behalf of Ramanand Sahu asking that Babu Rameshwar Prasad Singh should be summoned as a witness, as it was the case of Ramanand Sahu that none of the prosecution witnesses had during the investigation mentioned his name to this officer as an accused person. This application was rejected by the Special Judge on the grounds, first, that the witness had been transferred to a neighbouring district and that undue delay would be occasioned to the trial if he were to be summoned to give evidence, secondly, that the application ought to have been made earlier and that there was no explanation for the delay in making it, and thirdly, that the evidence of the witness was not material. We are unable to appreciate the reasons given by the Special Judge for declining to summon this witness. In our opinion, he was a material witness and should have been examined as a prosecution witness or at least offered for cross-examination. His transfer to a neighbouring district should have made no difference as it should have been possible for the Crown to procure his attendance with the minimum of delay. The necessity for procuring the attendance of this witness for examination became apparent to the particular accused and his advisers only on 22nd December during the examination of Nagina Prasad (P.W.5). We fail to see how the accused could be charged with undue delay in making the application. (On this ground alone we would have been disposed to hold that serious prejudice had been occasioned to Ramanand Sahu, appellant, by the failure of the Judge to direct the attendance of this witness.

There are other unsatisfactory features in the case and, on the evidence, we do not think the conviction in this case can be sustained. To continue with the case of Ramanand Sahu, his name is found in the first information report both in the list of accused persons as well as among the witnesses. He was examined by the police during the course of the investigation as a witness, though the investigating officer made an attempt to explain this away by saying that he was examined as an accused person. As no other accused person was examined during the course of the investigation it is difficult to accept this explanation as correct. Further in the first information report of 3rd September 1942 the Assistant Sub-Inspector states, after describing the incidents, that he asked the accused 'who was present in the mob to see to this occurrence but he replied that he was unable to do anything as the mob was out of control'. This is not easily reconcilable with the view that the accused was himself one of the rioters. The special Judge found that the investigating police were not able to make up their minds for sometime whether Ramanand Sahu was present with the mob as a member of the unlawful assembly or as an innocent spectator. If that was so, it is not possible to maintain his conviction for the reason that the only evidence that can be taken into account against him on behalf of the prosecution is the testimony of P.W.1 (Assistant Sub-Inspector) and P.W.3 (Police dafadar). This testimony was available to the police at the earliest possible moment and if true should have put the matter of the complicity of Ramanand Sahu in the riot beyond doubt. If nevertheless the investigating police could not make up their minds with regard to the complicity of Ramanand Sahu, the only inference to be drawn therefrom is that they were not satisfied with the statements of these two witnesses made in the course of the investigation.

It is true that P.W.2 (Ramanand Singh, constable) also mentioned Ramanand Sahu's name at the trial as one of the rioters, but it has been established that this witness had stated during the investigation that he was being so much mobbed during the riot that he was unable to identify anyone. His subsequent statement in Court against Ramanand Sahu was therefore worthless. Both Ramanand Sahu and Jagannath Sahu were stated by P.W.4 and P.W.6 to have taken part in the riot, but the testimony of these two witnesses was rightly rejected by the High Court on the ground that they did not mention the names of these two accused persons before the Deputy Superintendent of Police during the investigation. The prosecution case is, however, open to challenge on a more serious ground. According to the investigating Sub-Inspector the names of certain rioters, including those of the two appellants, were definitely ascertained immediately after the riot; yet he gave instructions to the Assistant Sub-Inspector not to enter the names of the accused persons in the entry made in the station diary (Ex.1) the same evening as 'a matter of precaution'. The explanation given was that as copies of the entries in the station diary had to be sent to head-quarters and the countryside round about was in a very disturbed state it was feared that a copy of the entry might fall into the hands of the rioters or their sympathizers and that this might attract reprisals against the police. We do not consider this explanation satisfactory. The apprehension of reprisals, if it was at all justified, would result just as much from the fact of the incident of the riot being entered in the diary as from the mention of the names of accused persons in it. As a matter of fact the diary does mention the name of Ramanand Sahu as a person near whose house the mob was when it was first observed by one of the police witnesses. The direction by the Sub-Inspector deliberately to keep the names of the accused persons out of the diary raises so strong a doubt with regard to the whole of the prosecution case that, taking it with the other features of the case that we have mentioned above, we are forced to the conclusion that it would not be safe to maintain the conviction of either of the appellants. We, therefore, accept their appeal and acquit them. They must be released forthwith and the fines, if recovered, should be refunded.

Case No. 53 – In this case the five appellants were sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for a period of seven years, a fine of Rs 200, and a whipping of ten stripes each of attacking a railway station and damaging the telephone and telegraph apparatus, machinery in a signal box and other Government property, about 1.30 p.m. on 15th August 1942. Their appeal to the Allahabad High Court was dismissed and the sentences were upheld. The Special Judge who tried the case found that the whole of the prosecution evidence was unsatisfactory but nevertheless convicted the appellants and some others who were acquitted by the reviewing Judge. The learned Judge of the High Court who dealt with the case on appeal took on some points a view of the evidence different from that taken by the Special Judge and upheld the conviction and sentences as he found that some of the prosecution evidence was less open to objection than the trial Judge thought was the case. We are unable to agree with this view. The first information report was alleged to have been drawn up at 3 p.m. on 15th August, almost immediately after the occurrence. The Special Judge found that the report was not made at 3 p.m. but after 7 p.m. and that it was deliberately ‘ante-timed’. The learned Judge of the High Court did not reject this finding. This finding alone would be sufficient to cast serious doubt on the prosecution case with regard to the participation of particular individuals in the incidents that occurred at or near the railway station. Again, the prosecution case was that as the mob was damaging the telephone and telegraph apparatus the appellants along with others were arrested at or near the railway premises after a chase and were brought to the railway station where they were identified by the railway staff. This version was flatly contradicted by the railway staff, and the trial Judge found that the prosecution case on this point could not be accepted. With regard to the evidence of the station staff, the only observation made by the learned Judge of the High Court was that the matter was not of any very great importance and that the failure of the station staff to support the prosecution case on this point was immaterial. The learned Judge went on to find that the appellants were arrested in the manner alleged by the prosecution, but this was based more upon the importability of the defence version on the point rather than upon the reliability of the prosecution evidence. This is unsatisfactory. We think that the finding of the trial Judge that the arrests were not made at or near the railway station was fully justified. We must point out that at the very least these two findings, namely, with regard to the time of the recording of the first information report and the time and place of the arrest, establish the complete unreliability of the police witnesses who were examined in the case.

The rest of the evidence consisted of the testimony of three headmen, three boys of the local vernacular school aged 11, 12 and 13, and two witnesses named Dip Singh and Kanhai. As regards the last named two witnesses, the trial Judge held that it was impossible to place any reliance upon their statements. The learned Judge of the High Court also ignored their evidence as he found that they had clearly been unwilling to give evidence against any of the accused. With regard to the headmen, the finding of the trial Judge was that the witnesses were not present during the occurrence at all, nor did they take part in the arrests, and he consequently altogether ignored their testimony. The learned Judge of the High Court, on the other hand, held these witnesses to be witnesses of truth. We have gone carefully through the detailed reasons given by the trial Judge for rejecting the testimony of these witnesses and we agree with him that their evidence cannot be accepted as true. The learned Judge of the High Court did not consider all the reasons given by the trial Judge for disbelieving these witnesses. He dealt with only one point in this connexion, namely, whether the witnesses had given good reasons for being present in the town where the riot took place on the day and at the time of the riot. He appeared to think that apart from any reasons given by these witnesses for being present in the town, it was quite natural that they should be in the town especially when there was some excitement going on about that period. He found the stories related by them quite natural and convincing. We regret we are unable to agree. In our opinion, it was the reverse of natural for these headmen who belong to neighbouring villages, to leave their villages where their duties lay, at a time of excitement. The trial Judge having given convincing reasons for rejecting the testimony of these three witnesses, the learned Judge of the High Court was not, in our opinion, justified in overriding the finding of the trial Judge merely because he had himself a feeling that this testimony should have been accepted. He should have tried to meet the detailed reasons given by the trial Judge in support of his finding before overriding it. We are ourselves unable to accept the evidence of these witnesses as true.

This leaves us with the evidence given by the three school boys. The position with regard to this is little better. It appears that these boys were taken into custody on the day of the riot and were only released on certain persons standing surety for them. At the time of giving evidence at the trial, they were living with the sureties and not with their parents. One of them stated that he had been told that he could go home only after giving evidence. They made completely contradictory statements in their examination-in-chief and cross-examination. The trial Judge observed with regard to two of them that they had probably been won over by the defence and with regard to the third that he was making a tutored statement. The learned Judge of the High Court was of the opinion that these boys had been influenced against the prosecution and that they were not willing witnesses. He concluded from this, however, that anything that they had stated against the appellants was worth a good deal more than it would have been if they had been friendly to the prosecution. We do not consider this a correct or fair approach. Once a witness has been found to be wholly unreliable it is unsafe to place any reliance upon any part of his testimony. It should not be open to the prosecution to pick out a bit here and a bit there from the evidence of a witness whom they themselves are not willing to accept as a witness of truth, and to use these salvaged bits, from testimony which is otherwise contaminated, to bolster up their case against particular accused persons.

The gist of the learned High Court Judge's finding on the whole case is contained in the observation that there was really no explanation why anybody should have invented a false case against the appellants. This is not in our opinion a justifiable point of view to adopt in a case like the present where the prosecution evidence was found to be largely false and riddled with defects and contradictions. The prosecution having failed completely to establish the guilt of the appellants by good and reliable evidence, it was not for the appellants to explain why their name had been mentioned by the prosecution witnesses as persons who had participated in the riot. We have already stated why it is in our opinion unsafe to rely upon the testimony of the police witnesses in this case. As the trial Judge did, however, rely upon the testimony of Chhabnath Singh, constable, and based his finding with regard to the guilt of at least two of the appellants solely upon that evidence, we consider that an observation or two are called for in that connexion. The trial Judge stated that there was no reason to disbelieve this witness though he had undoubtedly made untrue statements on certain points. He then went on to observe that this witness had certainly falsely accused one of the persons whom the trial Judge acquitted on a positive finding that he was not present among the crowd that committed the riot. The trial Judge having found that this witness had told lies with regard to the time at which the first information report was recorded, with regard to the time and place of the arrests and with regard to the participation of Soney Lal accused in the riot, we fail to see how any reliance could be placed upon his testimony with regard to the alleged participation of other accused persons in the riot.

The view that we take of the case is that the trial Judge gave good and convincing reasons for rejecting the testimony of the prosecution witnesses and wrote what in effect amounted to a judgment of acquittal. For some reason, however, he thought it the better part of wisdom to convict some at least of the accused persons who had been put on their trial before him. The learned Judge of the High Court should have treated the judgment as one of acquittal and should have addressed himself to the question whether in case of an appeal by Government he would have been justified in upsetting the judgment if it had been given the form, as it already possessed the substance, of a judgment of acquittal. If the learned Judge of the High Court had approached the question from that point of view, we feel sure, he would have declined to reverse the trial Court's findings with regard to the value to be attached to the prosecution evidence and would have given effect to them by himself passing an order of acquittal. We are clearly of the opinion that on the record as it stands there is nothing to support the appellants conviction, which must be set aside. We therefore accept the appeal, acquit the appellants and direct that they should be released forthwith, and that the fines, if recovered, should be refunded.

Cases Nos 37, 50, 51 and 52 — In these cases the appellants were convicted by Special Judges for serious offences committed during the disturbances of last year and were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment. Their appeals to the Patna High Court were dismissed. Nothing was urged before us which served to raise any doubt in our minds with regard to the propriety of the convictions and sentences. Our attention was however drawn to what we cannot but regard as a very serious irregularity committed by the Special Judge in case No. 37 in recording the evidence of some of the prosecution witnesses, e.g., P.W.S.3, 4, 5 and 7. The memorandum of the substance of the evidence of P.Ws.1 and 2 having been recorded, the Judge contented himself in the case of several other witnesses with summarizing their examination-in-chief relating to the main incidents to which they were deposing by recording merely that they corroborated or supported the statement of P.W.2, or gave the same story as P.W.2. Under the provisions of S.6 of Ordinance 2 of 1942, the Special Judge was not bound to record the evidence of any witness verbatim, but he was bound to record a memorandum of the substance of the evidence of each witness examined. The record of the evidence of P.W.2 no doubt represents the substance of the evidence given by that witness. The statement that other witnesses corroborated or supported the statement of P.W.2 or gave the same story as P.W.2 with respect to certain incidents surely does not constitute a memorandum of the substance of the evidence given by those witnesses. We have no doubt that the failure on the part of the Judge to comply with the provisions of S.6 of Ordinance 2 of 1942 put the accused at a certain disadvantage and occasioned a certain amount of prejudice to them in the conduct of their defence. We are however satisfied on an examination of the whole record that the irregularity did not in fact occasion a failure of justice. We dismiss these appeals.

R.K. Order accordingly.

Secret

Government of India,
Home Department.

Express Letter

From Home, New Delhi.

To
All Provincial Governments.

No. 44/37/43 - Poll (I)

New Delhi, the 4th December 1943.

Subject: Publication of Provincial Security Prisoners Orders/Rules.

We are not clear as to the practice in all provinces regarding the giving of publicity to the various rules and orders made by them to govern the conditions of detention of their security prisoners. In some provinces these rules are treated as secret or confidential, while in other they appear to have been published, either in the Provincial gazette or as official publications. We have in the last two sessions of the Legislature been pressed to place copies of provincial Governments' security prisoners rules in the Library of the House. We have hitherto resisted this pressure on the ground that it is inappropriate for details of Provincial Governments' rules to be communicated to the Central Legislature. The weakness of this position is, however, manifest. In particular, it can well be argued that since Central Government prisoners detained in Provinces are subject to the rules obtaining in that Province, the latter rules are the legitimate concern of Members of the Central legislature, and since we are responsible for the general principles governing the treatment of persons detained without trial, we have in fact given a considerable amount of information about provincial practice in reply to questions on this subject. A further point is that refusal to disclose these rules must give rise to a suspicion, which might well be avoided, that there is something to conceal and that the rules contain harsh provisions which Government dare not make public. As against this, it could be argued that to make available for Members of the Central Legislature copies of all Provincial rules would merely be furnishing them with further ammunition for detailed questions on the practice in an individual Province and on divergence of treatment as between one Province and another. Provided however, as we believe to be the case, that provincial practice in the various matters of principle laid down by us is now substantially uniform, we do not anticipate any difficulty in refusing to investigate matters of detail.

2. We do not suggest that any Province should give wide publicity to its rules, e.g. by giving them to the Press. But we do consider that there would be advantage in placing in the Library of the Central Legislature copies of provincial security prisoners orders/rules, as we have already done in the case of Central orders. To supply copies in the case of some Provinces and to withhold them in the case of other would be less desirable. Will you please let us know whether you agree to our placing a copy of your Security Prisoners orders/rules in the Library of the Central Legislature?

- (a) if all other Provincial Governments agree, or
- (b) whether or not all other Provincial Governments agree.

134: Government of Madras to the Government of India (regarding new ordinance) – (dated 11th December 1943)

File No. 44/57/43 – Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

From
G.W. Priestly, Esq., C.I.E., I.C.S.
Chief Secretary to the Government of Madras
Fort St George, Madras

To
The Additional Secretary to the Government of India
Home Department, New Delhi

Ordinance to replace Defence of India Rules 26 – Your letter No. 44/57/43 – Poll (I) dt 3.12.43.

The Government of Madras observe from paragraph 8 of your letter¹ that they are not consulted as to the principles underlying the draft of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance, 1943, but are only given an opportunity of bringing to notice any points of doubt about the drafting of the ordinance or any substantial difficulties of an administrative character that may be anticipated in giving effect to the ordinance.

2. I am directed to say that this Government have carefully and critically examined the provisions of the draft ordinance² and they agree with the Government of India that an ordinance on the proposed lines is really desirable and necessary. In the urgency of the case and in the circumstances explained in the concluding paragraph of the above letter, this Government do not propose in this letter to indulge in an elaborate and detailed criticism of the several provisions of the ordinance, but wish to confine their observations to a few points of interest which are deemed worthy of notice.

3. (a) Sections 1–5, 8, 12 and 13 of the ordinance require no comments. It is observed that section 6 which is designed to validate all orders passed under Defence of India Rule 26 will have the desired effect of completely setting at rest all doubts and disputes raised regarding the validity of ordinance No. XIV of 1943 which amended section 2 of the Defence of India Act, by extending the rule making powers so as to cover a rule like Defence of India rule 26.

- (b) Section 7 requiring the authority concerned to communicate the grounds of detention to the person affected and inform him that he is at liberty to make any representation in writing against the order of detention is recognised as a very desirable provision which, if enacted should obviate much of the criticism now levelled against orders made under Defence of India Rule 26. I am at the same time to sound a note of warning that the Government of Madras foresee the possibility of trouble in complying with the requirements of this section. Experience shows that many of the detenus being lawyers will be apt to make capital of this section and start complaints that representations cannot be made properly, unless access is allowed to particular documents and officers and persons and unless they are allowed to cross-examine the witnesses and officers who made reports against them. Possibly the case may even arise where a detenu may refuse to avail himself of the opportunity accorded to him of making his representation, on the ground that a particular facility desired and considered necessary by him has been denied to him. In the circumstances, I am directed to suggest for the consideration of the Government of India whether section 7 should not be tightened up so as to guard against extravagant claims for facilities in making representations.

In this connection I am to point out that the word 'practical' in the last line of section 7 is apparently a mistake for 'practicable'.

- (c) Section 9 specifically restricting the period of detention to 6 months in the first instance and providing for extension by the Government themselves after considering the necessity for such extension in each case as contemplated in paragraph 4 of the Home Department letter is, a satisfactory substitute for Advisory Committees, as it ensures a periodical review of all cases of detention.
- (d) Section 10 excluding as it does the jurisdiction of courts to issue orders in the nature of 'habeas corpus' under section 491 of the code of criminal Procedure, is considered an important provision. I am to invite attention to the fact that the rule of presumption laid down in clause (3) of this section will only apply when an order passed under the ordinance purports to be signed by the authority making it. An order of Government is not signed by the Government as such but is only authenticated by a Secretary to Government or other officer empowered to sign Government orders by the rules framed for the transaction of the business of the Government. I am accordingly directed to submit for the consideration of the Government of India whether the scope of clause (3) does not require to be extended so as to cover orders of Government signed by a Secretary to Government or other officer empowered in this behalf.
- (e) A provision on the lines of section 11 which precludes the court from allowing statements to be made or evidence to be given as to the contents of any communication made under section 7 in regard to the grounds of detention or any representation made under that section appears very desirable and follows as a consequence of section 7.

4. In conclusion, I am directed to say that the Government of Madras have noted that the Government of India have under separate consideration the promulgation of an ordinance in respect of the class of persons entering India from Burma, etc. In the opinion of this Government such an ordinance is necessary especially in view of the fact that there are in this province a number of such persons including the 14 accused acquitted in the recently concluded Enemy Agents Case.

Your obedient servant,

Chief Secretary

1. Not printed – Refers to letter dated 3.12.43 wherein it says 'Since the Government of India are primarily responsible for war legislature and its operation by the Provinces, they do not consider it necessary to consult Provincial Governments on the Principles of these proposals'.
2. Draft ordinance not printed – See Doc. 145 for the final version of the ordinance.

135: Government of Bengal to the Government of India regarding new ordinance

File No. 44/57/43 – Home Poll (I)

[NAI]

Dated 11th December 1943

The Government of Bengal do not wish to record any objection to the principles newly embodied in the draft Ordinance¹ which in fact, they endorse.

2. There will, however, be very considerable administrative difficulties in furnishing to security prisoners in Bengal a statement, under clause 7 of the draft, of the grounds on which they have been detained. In perhaps a far larger proportion of cases in Bengal than elsewhere it will be impossible in the public interest to furnish grounds, to which in effect the prisoner will be able to submit any reply, and it will be necessary to confine the grounds furnished to a purely conventional, general and uninformative statement, such as that suggested for terrorists in paragraph 5 of the Government of India's letter. The Government of Bengal apprehend that this will arouse both public dissatisfaction and persistent criticism within and outside the Legislature, which may, and in all probability will, create acute embarrassment for any Ministry for the time being in power.

3. (i) The provincial Government understand that an amendment to the draft is under consideration with the intention of removing the lacuna at present existing in clauses 4 and 5 of the draft, which do not make it possible for Government to pass an order under clause 4 in respect of persons detained by authorities exercising delegated powers.
- (ii) They also press for the amendment of clause 3(4), to which they understand that the Government of India contemplate giving effect, and which will authorize Government by order to prescribe conditions of detention generally, including specifically conditions as to maintenance, discipline etc.
4. Very grave administrative inconveniences are expected to follow from the prescription of so short a time as six months as the maximum period for which an order of detention may be passed and the consequent requirement to review 'all the circumstances of the case', with the object of issuing a continuing order under clause 9, within the period of six months prescribed. The preparation of even such grounds, as it may be possible, in the public interest, to furnish under clause 7 of the draft, the receipt and due consideration of representations, made by prisoners against the order upon receipt of these grounds, and the issue of orders thereafter, in the very large number of cases in Bengal (which in virtue of clause 6(2) will all be deemed to have been made on a single date, and therefore, to be valid only until the same date, in each case, six months ahead) involve labour which the Provincial Government gravely doubt whether it would be possible conscientiously to complete within the period fixed. They, therefore, desire to press that the initial period of detention under clause 3 and the periods by which detention may be continued in force under clause 9 of the draft should be extended to twelve months.

5. The attention of the Government of India has been drawn in previous correspondence to the necessity of effectively providing against improper inquisition by the courts into the validity of orders passed under Defence Rule 26. The same necessity will continue under the Ordinance as now drafted, and the Government of Bengal very strongly urge that provision should be made to exclude rigorously, and without the possibility of legal quibble, any such transgression of their jurisdiction by the courts. What the Government of Bengal feel must be protected against such inquisition is not only orders 'in good faith made' but also orders 'purporting to be made' under the Ordinance. They gather that it is in the contemplation of the Government of India to issue a further communication on this subject to all provincial Governments and they trust that this point will be reconsidered by the Central Government.

6. Finally, with what the Government of India refer to as the 'contempt case' in mind,¹ the Provincial Government desire to press once more the necessity of completely protecting officers acting or purporting to act in accordance with the Ordinance from all suits, prosecutions on other legal proceedings whatsoever without previous sanction of Government.

136: Judgement in the case of Ratnamamba¹ – (dt 11.12.1943)

[I.N.A.]

In the Court of the Joint Magistrate, Bezwada Judgement in Caiender case No. 143/43 Joint Magistrate of Bezwada.

Complainant Rex. Station House Officer Kankipadu, Cr. No. 114/43

Accused Edupuganti Ratnamaba of Penama

In the Court of the Joint Magistrate, Bezwada. Present – A.G. Barson, Esq., I.C.S., C.C. 143/43.

This case coming on for hearing on 20.9.43, 23.10.43, 16.11.43, 29.11.43, 6.12.43 and having stood over for consideration the court delivered the following:

Order

The Station House Officer, Kankipadu has charged the accused under 39(6) read with 34 of the D.O.I. with possessing prejudicial literature.

5 P.W.s were examined. P.W.1. is the Inspector of the Special Branch Police. He states that on 24.7.43 he received information that one S. Ramasesha Rao of Gudivada, who had gone out of view, and one M. Satyanarayana who was an absconding accused in the Ongole Bomb case, were being harboured by the accused at Panamakur. He says that he also received information that some prejudicial reports had been received from Bombay for translation and distribution among members of the National Youth League, which is said to be implementing the Congress Rebellion Programme. He says that he learned that a meeting had been arranged some 2 miles from Panamakur for the night of 25.7.43 to decide upon a plan of sabotage on August 9th 1943. He learned also that these persons would meet in the accused house on 24.7.43. He took the Circle Inspector of Police, Bezwada and the S.B. Sub-Inspector Bezwada and some constables and reached Panamakur at 4.O.M. (25.7.43). One of the constables jumped over the compound wall and unbolted the door. The party entered the verandah, on which S. Ramaseshagiri Rao and some others were sleeping. Ramaseshagiri Rao was arrested. Then they woke up the accused who was sleeping inside the house with her mother, and entered the house, which is electrified. The Sub-Inspector, Kankipad then sent for 2 mediators, and in their presence the house was searched for prejudicial literature. A wooden almyrah was searched, and also a suit case (M.O.1) which was under the cot on which the accused was sleeping. The articles found are detailed in Ex. A.² There are some 40 publications, the majority of which contains what is undoubtedly prejudiced matter. The witness states that both the almyrah and the suit case were locked, and were opened with keys which the accused produced. P.W. 2 is the Circle Inspector of Police, Bezwada who accompanied P.W.1. He says that one of the constables jumped over the wall and opened the gate. Then the accused, who was sleeping inside the house with her mother, opened the house door. He then sent for the mediators and searched the house. In M.O.1 and a Wooden almyrah were found the papers detailed in Ex.A. He says that the accused unlocked M.O.1 and the almyrah. He then arrested the accused and brought her to Bezwada.

P.Ws. 3 and 4 are the mediators. P.W.3 now works, in the Electrical Department, Bezwada but in July 1943 he was Assistant fireman in Panamakur. He says that a constable came and called him at about 4.30 a.m. and took him to the house of the accused. He was called inside. He saw some papers taken from a suit case, but he cannot say where the suit case was, nor whether it was locked. He says there was a crowd there, which made observation difficult. He wrote Ex. A. (mediators report). He says that he did not see the accused give the key for opening M.O.1. This witness was treated as hostile and cross examined by the prosecution. He admitted writing in Ex.A. that accused gave the Keys to open M.O.1. Upon cross examination by the defence, this witness states, that some 25-30 people were in the house when he went there, some on the verandah, and some inside. He says that the papers were all collected and placed on the table, and some one gave out the names. He says that he cannot say whether the papers detailed in Ex. A. were those found in the house.

P.W.4 is the Branch Postmaster at Penamakur. He says that he was called to accused house at 4.O.A.M. There were several persons there. After the lights had been lit, he went inside. Accused was inside and she was asked to open an almyrah. She did so, but he did not see what she opened it with; nor did he notice the papers being removed from the suit case. He says the mediators report was written at the dictation of P.W.1 and he signed it without seeing what was written therein. This witness also was treated as hostile and cross examined by the before signed, and that he did not object to anything that was written therein. Upon cross examination by the defence, this witness states that accused lives either with her mother or in her paternal uncle's house, when she stays in the village. He states that P.W.2 was lying outside on a cot during the search. P.W.5 is the Village Munsiff Penamakur. He states that accused owns a house in the village and pays the Government Kist. She was President of the Panchayat Board some 4 years, ago, and was a Congress member of the District Board. She goes out of the village now and then. In cross examination this witness admits that the accused has no property of her own in the village, and that the house belongs to her mother.

The accused when examined, did not make any oral statement, but filed a fairly long written statement. In this she says that she has no house at Penamakur, but stays with her mother or her paternal uncle, or also in the Panchayat Office, when she comes to the Village. She says that she arrived there from Bezwada on 24.7.43. At 3 a.m. the next morning, the police knocked at the door. When she opened it, some 15 persons entered and began searching. There was no light, as the bulb had fused, and there was considerable confusion. Then the police sent for the Village officers, and then for P.Ws. 3 and 4. She denies giving any keys for opening the Almyrah, and says she has no knowledge of the prejudicial literature, or how it came there.

It is clear from the evidence of the Village munsiff and of P.Ws. 3 and 4 that the house in question does not belong to the accused, and that in fact she stays there only occasionally. Therefore the mere finding of prejudicial literature in that particular house would not be sufficient to commit the accused under 39 of the D.O.I. rules. P.Ws. 1 and 2 state that the accused had the keys which opened the almyrah and M.O.I. P.Ws.3 and 4 cannot speak definitely to this in court; both these witnesses also agree that P.W.2 was outside on the verandah on a cot while the search was going on. They both say also that people were coming and going, and their evidence suggest that there was considerable activity inside and confusion. P.W.3 in fact says there was a crowd.

It seems certain that the Police entered the house before the mediators came. P.W.2 says he sent for the Village officers but they were not available, so he called 2 other persons. Both these persons say that a large number of people were inside the house when they came; and P.W.4 says that he went in after the lights had been lit. This last remark agrees with the statement of the accused that the bulb had fused, and contradicts the evidence of P.W.1, which definitely suggests that the light was switched on before the police entered.

3. Points are noticed in the searching of this house. Firstly, no search warrant was taken. It may be of course, that there was no time there is no evidence on this point; secondly, the police were in the house before the mediators came, and if what P.W.4 says is true, without any lights. This of course makes the preparation and attestation of a search list, by mediators, as mere mockery. Thirdly, the Police say that the accused gave them the keys to open the suit case and almyrah they have not been produced.

In these circumstances, I do not feel certain that the accused is the possessor of the prejudicial literature; or that it was under her control within the meaning of 39(2) of the D.O.1. Rules. I therefore discharge her.

Pronounced in open court.

File No. 44/2/43 – Home Poll (I)

[NAI]

Secret.

D.O. No. 44/2/43 – Poll (I)

Government of India,
Home Department.

New Delhi, the 31st December 1943.

My dear Dalziel,

Will you please refer to your D.O. No. 3485C dated October 30th, 1943,¹ regarding the treatment of prisoners detained under Defence Rule 129.

2. While we are in general agreement with your views, we do not think that interrogation of the type referred in our letters No. 44/2/43 – Poll (I) dated 25th May² and 30th August,³ 1943, could ever be successfully undertaken in ordinary jails. It is a process that requires great patience and often a considerable period of time, during which the subject must be deprived of other contacts. Even a temporary remand to police custody – if the word ‘temporary’ means for a brief period’ – would very often fail to meet the case. Where expert interrogation is called for, we remain of the opinion that nothing short of the Special arrangements indicated in our letters still really prove satisfactory.

Yours sincerely,

R. Tottenham.

138: Official Notings regarding new ordinance (dt 1.1.1944) (extracts)

File No. 44/57/43 – Home Poll (I)

[NAI]

Replies to our letter of 3.12.43¹ have been received from all Provinces except N.W.F.P., Assam and Sind. In the case of the first-mentioned, we have a reply from the Governor's Secretary and shall very likely not receive an official reply. A summary has been prepared of the various points raised. These fall into two main categories, drafting points which have been referred individually to Leg. Dept. as they were received, and points of policy which have been retained for discussion at this stage.

2 The following are the drafting points raised:

(a) Clause 3 (1)

Suggestion that the second proviso should be omitted. We may agree with Leg. Dept. that no action is needed.²

(b) Clause 3 (2)

Suggestion that the wording is unintelligible and that the type of bond should be defined. Three proposals are made:

- (i) That the provision for bonds should be omitted entirely (Sir G. Spence)
- (ii) That the provision should instead be made for suspending detention on giving of bond (Mr Sundaram)
- (iii) That provision should be made for taking sureties for restrictions (Mr Wakely)

I would rule out No. (ii); such a provision would I think suffer from most of the defects which we have pointed out in the practice of taking voluntary undertaking before release.

Mr Wakely himself does not favour No. (iii) and I would agree with him.

There remains No. (i). Sir G. Spence's argument is based on the assumption that such a provision cannot be enforced and, granted this assumption, is irrefutable. That the assumption is true of sureties is certainly obvious; but I am not so sure in the case of bonds entered into by the prisoner himself. It seems to me arguable that, as this sub-clause stands at present, Government could order a prisoner to enter into a bond and that if the prisoner failed or refused to do so, he would be contravening an order made under the rule and thus liable to prosecution. On the practical aspect, however, I would agree with Sir G. Spence. I think that both types of bond are useless (even though we have recommended their use in certain cases of 'greys') and that this sub-clause should be removed.

(c) Clause 3 (4)

Suggestion that 'interviews and correspondence' should be added after word 'maintenance'. We may agree with Leg. Dept. that no action is needed.

(d) Clause 6 (2)

Suggestion that as drafted this sub-clause would cause hardship to a prisoner whose case was on the point of being reviewed at the time the Ordinance was promulgated. This point was previously I am afraid overlooked and has not been referred to Leg. Dept. I can see no ground for N.W.F.P's apprehension. There is apart from anything else nothing that I can see in the Ordinance laying down that an order shall not be reviewed within less than six months.[A] Leg. Dept.'s views should perhaps be obtained however.[B]

[Marginal Note: [B] Not necessary, I think [A] is clearly the answer – R.T.]

(e) Clause 7

Suggestion that as at present drafted the clause implies an obligation to indicate other particulars beyond the grounds of the order. Please see summary No. 4 (Orissa)⁴ and notes at pages 133-4 ante. We may agree with Leg. Dept. that no action is needed.

(f) Clause 8

Suggestion that after the word 'confirming' the words 'or modifying' should be added. Please see summary No. 5 and notes at pages 118-9 ante. We may agree with Leg. Dept. that no action is needed.

(g) Clause 9

Suggestion that intention to permit of more than two extensions of original order should be clarified. Please see summary No. 5A and notes at page 131 ante.⁴ Leg. Dept.'s comments are awaited.

(h) Clause 9

Suggestion that the phrase 'all the circumstances of the case' may be too wide. Please see summary No. 5A and notes at pages 120-1 ante. We may agree with Leg. Dept. that no action is needed.

[Marginal Note: I will not object to the omission of the word 'all' in this clause and clause 8 – R.T.]

(i) Clause 10 (3)

Suggestion that the sub-clause should be amplified to cover authentication by a Secretary to Govt. Please see summary No. 7 and notes at pages 122-5 ante. We may accept the omission proposed by Leg. Dept.

3. The following questions of policy have been raised:

(a) Clause 4 (2)

Suggestion that the punishment for contravention of an order under this clause should be raised to 1 year. The point is for orders. I should have thought six months should suffice (see summary No. 3A).

[Marginal Note: No change - R.T.]

(b) Clause 7

This clause has been the principal target of criticism and summary No. 4⁵ may be seen. The general line taken is that it will be impossible to communicate any but the most general grounds, and that this will not only give rise to great public dissatisfaction, but also to challenges in court on the basis that the authority has in fact failed to communicate the 'grounds of detention.' The amendment proposed by the C.P.⁶ may help to meet this latter point and should be referred to Leg. Dept. The general question is however one of policy. It seems clear that this clause could not be substantially modified without removing one of the main purposes of the Ordinance. It might also be as well to ask Leg-Dept. to confirm that grounds as conveyed in the enclosure to our letter would not be open to challenge.

(c) Clause 8

The U.P. object to the suggestion that the Governor will have to see all delegated orders at the time they are confirmed, which they presume cannot have been our intention. It was, on the contrary, precisely our intention. The point has I think been made clear in the letter which has doubtless issued by now from Def. Dept. about the procedure for issuing orders u/r 26. It should perhaps be made completely clear in any letter of ours which issues on the promulgation of this Ordinance (see summary No. 5).

(d) Clause 9

Both Bengal and U.P. dislike the six-monthly review and would like to see the period both of initial detention and of subsequent extension increased to 1 year (see summary No. 5A).

(e) Clause 10 (1)

Bengal wish orders purporting to be made under the ordinance also to be saved. This has already been discussed threadbare and is impossible.⁷ Their point might I think be to some extent met by the proposal for a moratorium, during which all orders should be remade and during which all existing orders, made or purporting to be made under D.R.26 should be saved. This proposal has admittedly already appeared on this file and been rejected. The Def. Dept. file referred to in (c) above has however shown that all Provincial Govt. orders not seen personally by the Governor — and these may be presumed to be the great majority — will have in any case to be remade; this appears to remove the principal argument against this course, the extra work involved; and this question seems to merit further consideration (see summary No. 7).⁸

(f) Clause 12

Bengal wish protection to be extended to officers purporting to act under the Ordinance. The same considerations apply as in (e) above.

(S.)L. Olver)
Under Secretary.
1.1.44.

As to the drafting points I have noted my opinion on the margin of U.S's note except as regards (b) and (g) As regards (b) I agree that clause 3 (2) might be omitted — since I understand that it shall be open to take bonds with sureties in suitable cases under clause 3(1) (b).

File No. 44/57/43 — Home Poll (I)

I agree generally with Additional Secy.'s views but I do not think it necessary to reopen the point referred to in his penultimate paragraph.¹

As regards the renewal of orders under Clause 9, it was certainly not our intention that an entirely fresh order should be made in every such case. What we contemplated was that a simple order should be passed declaring that the original order would remain in force. The drafting should, if necessary, be modified to make this point clear.

It was always anticipated that Clause 7 which requires the grounds of detention to be communicated to the person affected would give most difficulty, but we cannot accept the objections to this Clause. It is a matter of elementary justice that a Government ordering the detention of any person should be able to state in some intelligible way the grounds for their action and that the person affected should know those grounds. I doubt whether any better word than 'grounds' can be found, nor has this word apparently given any difficulty in England. We may, however, be able to give some further guidance as regards the nature of the grounds to be stated after the proposed consultation with Legislative Department.

We cannot, again, accept the view that orders should run for twelve months without renewal. In past Emergency powers ordinances the maximum period of detention without trial has been much less than this and it is not too much to require a Government to give specific consideration to their cases at half yearly intervals.

140: Official Notings regarding interrogation of prisoners (dt 7.1.1944-12.1.1944) (extracts)

File No. 44/2/43 - Home Poll (I)

I assume that the period of two months mentioned by Additional Secretary¹ refers to detention under the R.& D. Ordinance, after two months detention under Defence Rules 129 has already been completed; that is to say, that the total permissible period of detention in police custody for persons undergoing interrogation is four months.

2. Central Government prisoners are only interrogated at our request or at D.I.B.'s request. All that seems to be necessary, therefore, is that D.I.B. should see and be asked to note the procedure proposed in Additional Secretary's note, and to inform us on every occasion when a Central Government prisoner or person who is to be interrogated at our request is detained. We can then keep a record and ensure that his detention in police custody does not exceed the prescribed period.

Under Secretary

D.S.(I).

I have spoken to Additional Secretary.

The intention is that police custody which may be necessary for the purpose of interrogation, should not exceed two months in all without the express orders of Government.

In most cases, the detention for two months permissible under Rule 129 covers the two month limit proposed. If further police custody for the purpose of interrogation is desired, the Prov. Govt. concerned when passing an order under the new ordinance should expressly decide whether such custody will be allowed: If it is one of our prisoners (our detention orders have a provision for the determination of the conditions of detention by the Prov. Government in whose jurisdiction the prisoner is intended to be kept), we should be informed so that we may be able to keep watch on the period of such custody.

The main object is to enable us and the Prov. Government to keep a watch on such cases so that prolonged periods of police custody may be avoided, as far as possible.

I think all that need be done is to write to Prov. Governments & Chief 'Comms' when the new Ordinance is out explaining that they should expressly decide in the case of their detainees whether police custody for the purpose of interrogation should exceed two months in all including the period of such custody under Rule 129 and that, the case of our detainees, we should be informed if the period is to exceed two months in all, our general view being that police interrogations ought to be finished ordinarily in two months.

File No. 44/57/43 – Home Poll (1)

[NAI]

Letter No. 2 – DC(10)/43

Government of India, Defence Department

8th January, 1944.

Secret

To

All Provincial governments and Chief Commissioners, copy forwarded to Home Department

Please refer to this Departments' secret express letter No. 2 DC (6) 43 dated the 5th September, 1943¹ about the making of orders under rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules.

2. The practical effect of the majority decision of the Federal Court² must be taken to be that whether or not the individual judgement of the Governor is attracted, his antecedent personal satisfaction is a necessary requisite to the validity of an order made under clause (b) of sub rule (1) of rule 26, otherwise than in pursuance of a delegation under sub-section (5) of section 2 of the Defence of India Act, that a recital of the Governor's satisfaction in an order signed by a Secretary to Government is not conclusive and that the courts will set aside such order if it is shown that the Governor was not personally satisfied. The majority decision must also be taken to leave open a possibility that in certain circumstances the courts might place on the Crown the burden of proving affirmatively that the Governor was personally satisfied.

3. It follows of necessity that all orders hitherto made in the name of the Governor but without personal consideration by him before the order was made, must be replaced by new orders made either (1) by a Secretariat officer in pursuance of a delegation under sub-section (5) of section 2, or (2) in the name of the Governor after personal consideration by him, and that all future orders must be made in one or other of these makes.

4. In principle, the Government of India have never favoured the first of these alternatives, which they commended in paragraph 2 of their telegram to the Government of Bengal No. 4864 dated the 3rd September 1943³ on the purely practical footing that the majority judgment indicated it as an expedient, calculated to satisfy the courts. In view of the provision made in clauses 8 and 9 of the draft Ordinance forwarded with the Home Department letter No. 44/57/43 - Poll (I) dated the 3rd December 1943,⁴ this consideration will lose much of its force as soon as that Ordinance is promulgated and the Government of India have now no hesitation in preferring the second of the two alternatives set out in paragraph 3 of this letter and I am to express the hope that the same will be adopted in all Provinces.

5. In times of exceptional stress, resort to delegation to Secretariat officers may be necessary. In that event, however, the Government of India are of the opinion that the order made in the exercise of delegated powers should be reviewed by the Governor as soon as the circumstances allow and cancelled or replaced by orders made according to the second alternative.

6. It may be assumed that if orders, whether made in replacement of existing orders or otherwise, were signed by the Governor himself a recital therein of his satisfaction would be accepted by the courts as conclusive. If the Governor signs the order, the must necessarily be expressed in the first person (whereas I, A.B., Governor of . . . am satisfied. . . . Now therefore I, the said A.B., . . .) and the Government of India feel that the drawing of orders in this mode would be highly inappropriate, particularly in Ministerial Provinces. They conclude therefore that orders made in the name of the Governor should continue to be drawn in the third person and signed by the appropriate Secretary to the Provincial Government.

7. The Government of India observe that in some Provinces it has been the practice to combine in one order an order of detention under sub-rule (1) of rule 26, a direction under sub-rule (5) and further orders under rule 27. Since in their opinion only the order under sub-rule (1) need be approved by the Governor, and the others need not, they suggest that the order of detention under sub-rule (1) (b) should be a separate order.

8. The Government of India have noticed the form of orders made under rule 26 varies in different Provinces, and is in some cases open to objection. For example, orders continue to be made which recite indiscriminately all the purposes specified in rule 26 (1) with a view to which an order can be made which, having done so, incorporate the 'or' to which exception has often been taken in the Courts. Nor have order-making authorities always observed the principle that when the authority in whose name the order is made signs the order, the order should be expressed in the first person. The Government of India think that it is desirable to secure as great a degree of uniformity of use as possible, and I am therefore to enclose for the guidance of Provincial Government draft skeleton orders [see below] which the Government of India hope will be found suitable for general adoption:

- (1) An order to be made under rule 26 (1) (b) or under section 3 (1) (b) of the proposed Ordinance in pursuance of a delegation of powers:
- (2) Orders to be made under the same clauses in the name of the Governor;
- (3) Orders to be made under section 8 of the proposed Ordinance in the name of the Governor

If in the case of an order in category (2) or (3) the Crown is required to satisfy a court that the Governor was personally satisfied, or, as the case may be, that he personally considered all the circumstances of the case an affidavit should be filed by an officer in a position to certify from personal knowledge that the Governor was personally satisfied or had personally considered all the circumstances of the case.

9. The Government of India recognise that the doctrine of the majority judgment should logically be applied to orders made under any clause of sub-rule (1) of rule 26 or the corresponding sub-section of the proposed Ordinance and not merely to orders under clause (b) thereof and that a question might well arise as to the application of the doctrine to directions under sub-section (5) of section 2 of the Defence of India Act or the corresponding sub-section of the proposed Ordinance and to a large number of provisions contained in the general code of law in force in British India. They have however, reached the conclusion that unless and until Provincial Governments are confronted with a concrete judicial application of the doctrine outside the field of clause (b) of sub-rule (1) 26 or the corresponding sub-section of the proposed Ordinance, all cases outside that field should continue to be dealt with in accordance with the procedure established under the Rules of Business.

142: Kamla Kant Azad v. Emperor (Varma and Shearer J.J.) (10 Jan. 1944)

Criminal Misc. Cases Nos 57, 58, 59, 61, 62, 103, 122, 150, 151, 165, 186, 187, 188, 195, 241, 294, 295, 300, 302, 374 and 392 of 1943, Decided on 10th January 1944.

Shearer J. — These applications are made under S.401, Criminal P.C., by or on behalf of twenty-three persons, who are detained in jails in this province under orders made by the Governor of Bihar under R.26 (1) (b), Defence of India Rules. In response to the rules which were issued, the learned Advocate-General has appeared and has produced copies of the orders, under which the petitioners are detained. Except in one case, the original order, made by the Governor of Bihar, was not produced. None of the petitioners put in a copy of the order, under which he was detained, and, in most of the affidavits it was specifically stated that no copy of the order had been made over to the detinue and that he had merely been given to understand by the jailor of the prison, in which he was confined that an order had been made against him under R.26 (1) (b). It is, I think, essential that, when a person is ordered to be detained under this rule, a copy of the order made against him should be supplied to him immediately. Clearly, if this is not done, and if an application is made on his behalf to this Court under S.491, Criminal P.C., this Court will have no option but to issue a rule forthwith. Further, it is, I think, incumbent on the Crown, whenever a rule is issued, to exhibit on this Court the original order. Counsel for the petitioners did not, however, ask us to insist on the production of the original orders, and accepted the copies, which were produced as true copies, although, in many cases, they were not certified to be true copies by any responsible officer.

It is now well settled that Rule 26 (1) (b), Defence of India Rules is ultra vires, and also that it is not open to a Court of law, on an application made by a person detained under that rule for a writ of Habeas Corpus, or in a suit, to recover damages for false imprisonment, to enquire into and pronounce on the validity of the reasons, which led to the making of the order. The country is at war, and, for the purpose of safeguarding it against internal as well as external dangers the Legislature has delegated to his executive functionaries the power to order, on one or more of various grounds, the detention of individual persons for an indefinite period. In exercising that very grave responsibility, the officer, to whom it is entrusted must frequently act on information, which in the interest of the public safety, cannot and ought not to be disclosed. As the information, or most of the information, on the basis of which an order has been made, cannot in many cases, be disclosed, the Courts are, quite properly, debarred from considering the propriety of the order and setting it aside, merely on the ground that, in their opinion, it was not an order, which should have been made. It is, however, equally well settled that this Court may examine the correctness of the recital contained in any such order, and if it comes to the conclusion that the recital is incorrect, may declare the order to be invalid and the detention of the individual concerned illegal. The orders, which have been made in all these cases, are in one and the same form, and it will be convenient, at this stage to set out one of them in extension:

No. 346 C (P) Whereas the Governor of Bihar is satisfied with respect to the person known as Dr Ashok Kumar Bose, that with a view to preventing him from acting in a manner prejudicial to the public order, it is necessary to make the following order:

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by cl (b) of sub-rule (1) of Rule 26, Defence of India Rules, the Governor of Bihar is pleased to direct that the said Dr Ashok Kumar Bose be arrested by the police wherever found and detained until further orders of the Governor of Bihar.

The material portions of the recital in the order are, in the first place, that 'the Governor of Bihar is satisfied with respect to the person named', and, secondly, that his detention is necessary 'with a view to preventing him from acting in a manner, prejudicial to the public order.' The word satisfied in Rule 26 (1) (b) must be construed as meaning reasonably satisfied. In 1942 A.C. 206, at p. 271 Lord Wright said:

Satisfied must mean 'reasonably satisfied'. It cannot import an arbitrary or irrational state of being satisfied. I find the distinction between 'reasonably satisfied' and 'has reasonable cause to believe' too tenuous.

If, therefore, any of these petitioners can show that there existed no grounds, on which the Governor of Bihar could, as a reasonable man, have been satisfied that their detention was necessary, they are, in my opinion, entitled to be released. Similarly, if they can show that the Governor of Bihar acted under a misapprehension as to the extent of the powers entrusted to him and did not in fact, order their detention with a view 'to preventing them from acting in a manner prejudicial to the public order', but with some other ulterior object such as to regularize their illegal detention or to punish them for acts, which they had already done rather than to prevent them from doing or instigating the doing of similar acts again, they would, in my opinion, be entitled to be released. In such a case it could not be said that the Governor of Bihar, had, in law acted in good faith, and the order of detention would be, to use the expression of Pickford L.J., in (1918) 1 K.B.578 at p. 586, 'practically a sham order'. As I have already said the Crown merely produced copies of the orders, under which the petitioners are detained. No affidavits were put in, and it was contended by the learned Advocate-General and the learned Government Advocate that the Court was not entitled to go behind the orders of detention and pronounce on their validity. These orders, it was asserted, showed on their face that the petitioners were detained in legal custody. Much reliance was placed on the presumption 'omnia rite esse acta'. The power to order the detention of any person on the ground set out in the order had, it was argued, been delegated to the Governor of Bihar, and a presumption arose that, in exercising this power, the Governor of Bihar had acted regularly, that is that, before making any particular order, he had satisfied himself, on the materials placed before him, that it was necessary to detain the particular individual named in it with a view to preventing him from acting in a manner prejudicial to the public order. There can, of course, be no doubt but that this presumption does, in each case, arise. Viscount Maugham, in (1942) A.C. 206 at p. 225, said:

Just as the fact that the act of the Secretary of State acting in a public office is prima facie evidence that he has been duly appointed to his office, so his compliance with the provision of the statute or the order in council under which he purported to act must be presumed unless the contrary is proved.

The presumption, however, is and Viscount Maugham made this quite clear, a rebuttable presumption. It is, I think, important to bear in mind how the question as to the applicability of the presumption arose in (1942) A.C. 206.

[Omitted: Observations on Viscount Maugham's judgment in 'Liversidge vs. Sir John Anderson' and other related judgments in England — Ed.]

In some of these cases, as will appear presently, I am of opinion that the detention of the petitioners is unlawful, and that, in consequence, they must be released. The circumstances of each case are such, that the putting in of an affidavit in a stock form, or as one learned judge in England described it 'over the rubber stamp' would not, I think, have altered my decision. But even if it had been desirable to give the Crown an opportunity of putting in affidavits, it would have been quite useless to grant an adjournment for that purpose. The orders of detention were, in each such case, passed by the then Governor of Bihar, who was either His Excellency Sir Thomas Stewart or His Excellency Sir Thomas Rutherford, and Sir Thomas Stewart is no longer in this country and Sir Thomas Rutherford is no longer in this Province. An affidavit by some other officials that the material, on which, as against these petitioners, reliance was placed, was submitted to His Excellency before the orders of detention were made, would clearly be of no assistance to the Court, and indeed would be irrelevant. The question at issue is whether, in each of these cases, the Governor was satisfied as to the necessity of making an order of detention, and, clearly no one except the Governor himself is in a position to say what the state of his mind was at the time the orders were made. In this connection, I must refer to certain statements, which were made by Mr Baldeva Sahay, who appeared for one of these petitioners, in the course of his argument. Mr Baldeva Sahay suggested that in some cases at least, and, perhaps, in many, the orders of detention had not, in fact, been made by His Excellency the Governor at all, but had been made by some other official subordinate to him. He went on to insinuate that was the reason why no affidavit had been put in by the Crown.

It will be remembered that, in certain similar cases, which occurred in Bengal, affidavits were put in and these affidavits disclosed that the orders of detention had not in any case, been made by His Excellency the Governor of Bengal, but had been made by the Home Minister, and, in some cases, by an Additional Secretary to the Government of Bengal. A majority of the judges of the Federal Court took the view that the power to make an order of detention under Rule 26 (1) (b) was conferred on the Governor, and could not be delegated under any rule made under S.59 (3), Government of India Act, and that in consequence, the detention of these persons was illegal. When pressed to disclose the grounds, on which he had made the assertions he did, Mr Baldeva Sahay was unable to say anything except that, in the emergency which arose, His Excellency Sir Thomas Stewart must have been far too busy with other matters of the greatest importance to bestow his personal attention on these case. I have satisfied myself, by reference to the rules of executive business, of which, in my opinion, this Court is entitled to take judicial notice, that there was an obligation on the Chief Secretary to Government to submit cases of this kind to His Excellency and to obtain his orders. In the absence of anything in the affidavits, this Court is bound to presume that the Chief Secretary to Government did, in fact, place the materials before His Excellency the Governor, and that the orders of detention were, in fact, made by His Excellency.

I need scarcely, I think, point out that, if in a particular case, this was not done, and the order of detention, although on the face of it, it purports to be an order of the Governor of Bihar, it was in fact, an order of some other and subordinate official, the detention of the person, against whom the order is made, has been illegal.

[Omitted: Observation on whether in such cases a suit for damages would be, and some other minor points raised by counsel for the petitioners – Ed.]

I turn now to the individual cases, and shall deal, in the first place, with criminal miscellaneous case No. 186, in which the petitioner is Tarkeshwar Prasad, as it stands in a category by itself. The order, made against this petitioner, purports to be an order of the Governor of Bihar, but it is not signed, as the orders in the other cases are, by the Chief Secretary, but by one D. Pires 'for Chief secretary'. We have been given to understand that Mr Pires is the political Department, and it is conceded that he is not authorized to authenticate, by his signature, orders made by the Governor of Bihar. That being so, the order, under which Tarkeshwar Prasad is detained, is an invalid order, and his detention under it is unlawful: vide (1860) 30 L.J. O.B. 38.

It is conceded that, in law, the onus is on the petitioners to show that the orders, which have been made against them, although, on their face, they appear to be valid orders, are not in fact, what they purport to be, and in consequence, their detention is unlawful. Admittedly, onus is one which it is very difficult to discharge. Such being the position, the question that really arises, in each of these cases, is whether or not the petitioners have succeeded in shifting the onus of proof on to the Crown. If, in any case, this has been done, then in the absence of any affidavit or other evidence on behalf of the Crown, this Court must I think, make an order for their discharge. As I have already said, the word 'satisfied' in the rule means 'reasonably satisfied' and, if any of the petitioners can show that there existed no grounds, on which the Governor of Bihar could reasonably have come to the conclusion that their detention was necessary for the purpose stated in the orders, the orders will be deemed to be invalid. Unfortunately for the petitioners, the Governor of Bihar did not communicate to them the grounds on which he had made the order, and this Court is not entitled to compel their disclosure and examine into them. The utmost, therefore, that the petitioners could do was to give in their affidavits some account of their previous career and of the political opinions which they held, and suggest that their career having been, and their political opinions being such, the order made against them could not have been made on reasonable grounds. The majority of the petitioners may, perhaps, have thought that it was useless and hopeless to do this. At all events, with the exception of three, none of the affidavits contain matter of this kind. The affidavits, which do, are those which have been put in by the petitioners, Machkun Sharma, Maksudan Lal Sao and Parmanand Tribedi. Machkun Sharma, who is the petitioner in case No. 195, admitted that, prior to 1939, he had been an ordinary member of the Congress, and that, in that year, he had been the president of a Thana Congress Committee. He said that he had subsequently resigned and had joined the Kisan Sabha, of which he was the president in the district of Muzaffarpur from 1940 to 1942. He asserted that the objects of the Kisan Sabha were entirely different from the objects of the Congress. Maksudan Lal Sao, who is the petitioner in case No. 392, said that he had once been a member of the Congress, but that there had been acute difference between himself and the Congress office-bearers of the Lohardaga municipality, and that these had culminated in litigation in the criminal Courts. He asserted that he had ceased to be a member of the Congress sometime in 1941 and denied that he had taken any part whatever in any subversive movement. Parmanand Tribedi, who is the petitioner in case No. 302, said that he was a member of the central executive of the All India Radical Democratic Party and the Provincial Secretary of the Indian Federation of Labour. He went on to assert that the political aspirations of the All India Radical Democratic party were not at all the same as those of the Congress. I will assume that the statements made in these affidavits are correct in so far as both the Kisan Sabha and the All India Radical Democratic Party and the Indian Federation of Labour are concerned, and that these bodies had nothing to do with the disturbances which occurred last year. It does not, however, by any means, necessarily follow that individual members of any one of these bodies were not concerned in promoting them. It may no doubt be said that, if the leaders of these parties had disavowed any sympathy with the Congress and had called on their members to take no part at all in the civil disobedience movement, then before making any order of detention against an office bearer of one of these parties, the Governor of Bihar ought to have been very clear in his mind that the individual had, by some overt act or other, shown that he was not prepared to obey the instructions of his leaders. This Court can scarcely, however, assume that so obvious a consideration was not present to the mind of Sir Thomas Stewart, when he made the orders which he did against Parmanand Tribedi and Machkun Sharma. At first sight, there is, to my mind, more substance in the contention put forwarded by the other petitioner, Maksudan Lal Sao, that he had dissociated himself from the Congress some time in 1941 and had since then ceased to have anything to do with it or with any other political body. I find, however, that this very point was taken in a case, which occurred in England and was negatived.

[Omitted: Reference to the details of Stuart vs Anderson and Morrison – Ed.]

Rule 26 (1) (b) required the Governor of Bihar to be satisfied 'with respect to' the person named in the order, that is, it required him to consider the case of each person, against whom an order was sought individually. The main point, which has been taken by the various counsel who appeared on behalf of the petitioners, is that there are circumstances which go to show conclusively, or at least to raise a presumption which has not been rebutted, that the Governor did not in fact, consider each case separately before he made an order. One circumstance relied on is that each one of these orders is in the same form. The necessity for detaining each of these petitioners was, however, the same, namely, 'to prevent him from acting in a manner prejudicial to the public order.' The Governor was not required to give the petitioners any indication of the reasons which had led to the making of the order, still less to set them out in the order itself. The orders also had to be made in conformity with the language used in the rule. That being so, the circumstance, that each one of the orders contains the same recital is, to my mind, a matter of no consequence at all. Another circumstance relied on is that the orders or some of them appear to have been cyclostyled. This argument is based on the order made in the case of Mr Phulan Prasad Varma, who is the petitioner in case No. 59. That order, as I have already said, would seem to be the only original order, which has been produced. The intrinsic evidence afforded by it certainly suggests that a number of orders of detention were made on a cyclostyle, that some clerk was given a type-written list of the persons, against whom orders were to be made, that this clerk cut each of the names out of the list and pasted it into the blank space in the cyclostyled form and then submitted these to the Chief Secretary for signature. The act of making out the orders in the proper form and obtaining on each of them the signature of the Chief Secretary was, however, a purely ministerial act. That a procedure of this kind was adopted, in order, presumably to save time and labour does not, in my opinion, create any kind of presumption that the case of each person, against whom an order was made, was not separately and properly considered by the Governor.

[Omitted: Reference to the details of the same case and Rex V. Home Secretary. ex parte Budd. (1941) -- Ed.]

Then, it is said in some cases, the interval, which lapsed between the apprehension of some of the petitioners and the making of the order of detention against them, was so very brief that the Governor of Bihar could not possibly have applied his mind to their individual cases. The case, in which this particular argument has been most vehemently put forward, is miscellaneous case No. 59 in which the petitioner is Mr Phulan Prasad Varma, who is an Advocate of this Court. In an affidavit, which has been sworn by a near relation of Mr Varma it is stated that he was arrested in the morning of 9th August 1942 by the Additional Superintendent of Police, Patna. It is further stated that no reasons for his being apprehended were given to him at the time. The Additional Superintendent of Police had, it is there stated, a slip of paper with him and Mr Varma and his relations gathered that it contained the names of certain persons, of whom he himself was one, who were to be apprehended immediately. The order of detention, under which Mr Varma is now confined, was made on the day following, that is on 10th August 1942. We have been asked to infer from these various circumstances, that Mr B.A.P. Sinha, the Additional Superintendent of Police, acted on his own initiative in arresting Mr Varma, and that his action was regularized on the day following by the Governor of Bihar, without taking any steps to satisfy himself that Mr Varma's detention was in fact, necessary. It has been concerted that, on 8th August 1942, the working committee of the congress sanctioned 'the starting of a mass struggle on non-violent lines on the widest possible scale'. Reference has also been made to resolution of the Government of India, published immediately after the working committee of the Congress had taken this decision, in which it was stated that the Government of India had been aware for some days of dangerous preparations for the destruction of communications, the organization of strikes, sabotage and the like. The events which subsequently took place, certainly suggest that, in the Congress party, there were numerous persons who were not prepared to obey the injunctions of the working committee and confine themselves to what are ordinarily described as non-violent measures.

The learned Government Advocate has said that, when the executive authorities knew what was impending, they may be presumed to have taken steps to meet the danger, and in particular, to have considered whether in the interest of the public safety, it was necessary to apprehend and detain certain individuals. The inference, which he asks us to draw from the very brief interval which elapsed between Mr Varma's apprehension and the making of the order of detention against him, is that the Governor of Bihar had previously considered and decided that, in the interest of the public safety, it was necessary to arrest and detain him. This contention of Mr S.K. Mitra ought, in my judgment, to be accepted. The circumstance, that the Additional Superintendent of Police did not tell Mr Varma why he was arresting him, clearly suggests to my mind that, in arresting him and certain other individuals that day, Mr Sinha was acting not on his own initiative, but on instructions from some superior authority. If the order of detention, made against Mr Varma, was not actually made out and signed until after he had already been taken into custody, that can be explained on the assumption that number of such orders had to be made, and that it took rather more time to have them drawn up and signed then to communicate to the local Police the decision that had been taken to arrest the persons concerned. It is quite impossible to say that, in the emergency which was created by the decision of the working committee of the Congress, the executive was not entitled to take immediate action and to order the detention of persons who, they were satisfied, were likely to commit, encourage the commission of acts, 'prejudicial to the maintenance of public order.' The other cases, in which orders of detention were made prior to the commencement of the disturbances, are Miscellaneous case No. 57 in which the petitioners is one Kamala Kant Azad, Miscellaneous case No. 69 in which the petitioner is one Makhan Lal Mukherji, Miscellaneous case No. 150 in which the petitioner is one Sashan Gupta and Miscellaneous case No. 241, in which the petitioner is one Swami Viswanand. Another case, which stands on very much the same footing, is, in my opinion, Miscellaneous Case No. 151, in which the petitioner is one Anil Chandra Banerji. An order of detention was made against Anil Chandra Banerji on 21st August 1942, and he was apparently taken into custody on the same day. In the affidavits, which have been put in by or on behalf of these various persons, there is nothing to suggest that the Governor of Bihar, in making the orders which he did, did not act properly. The validity of all these orders has not, in my judgment, been successfully or indeed at all impugned.

In the remaining cases, the petitioners were arrested either during the continuance of the disturbances or, and this, I think, happened more often, after the disturbances had been brought under control or some considerable measure of control, in the local areas to which they belong. In each of those cases, recommendations were apparently made that they should be detained under R. 26 (1) (b), and, after a greater or shorter interval, an order of detention was, in each case, made against them. Under modern conditions, the existence of forces of internal disruption may be as great as or an even greater menace to a country, which is at war, than the presence of an external enemy on its frontiers. For that reason, the Legislature has been fit to delegate to executive the power to detain persons without trial, and to debar the judiciary from examining into the reasons for their detention and pronouncing on their propriety. There can be no doubt but that a very large number of persons were concerned in the promotion of the disturbances, which occurred last year, and it may well be, until some individual had by his overt act or acts disclosed his connection with the subversive elements at the back of these disturbances, the necessity for detaining him was not apparent to the executive, the Legislature has made the Governor of Bihar the sole judge as to the necessity for his exercising this very exceptional power. It is not for judicature to say, and indeed it is quite impossible for it to say that no emergency any longer exists in which this power cannot properly be exercised. It is not, in my opinion, possible for us to say that the Governor of Bihar, looking to the overt act or acts, which had been done by certain of these petitioners, and to their previous associations and the views, which they may have expressed, could not have been honestly satisfied that it was necessary to detain them on the ground set out in these orders. It was contended by counsel for petitioners, and, I think, most vehemently by Mr Avadeshnandan Sahay that, inasmuch as this Court had issued rules, the onus of proof was thereby shifted to the Crown, and it was for the Crown to justify the detention. In nearly every case, the ground, on which the rule was issued, was that Rule 26 was ultra vires, and, before the applications came on for hearing, this had ceased to be a valid ground. This is not, however, of an importance, as, in the great majority of cases, the Court would, in any event have had to issue a rule, as no copy of the order of detention, which had been made against each of the petitioners, had been served on them. Mr Avadesh Nandan Sahay was correct in saying that the issue of rule had put the onus on the Crown, but that onus was discharged when orders of detention, which on the face of them were valid orders, or rather copies of such orders, were produced. The onus then again shifted on to the petitioners to show that, in point of fact, the orders, made against them, were not valid orders, that is, that in exercising the power, which he had, the Governor of Bihar had not, in law, acted bona fide. Except in the cases, to which I shall now proceed to refer, no evidence was produced by any of the petitioners to show that this may have been the case.

Singheshwar Prasad, who is the petitioner in Misc. Case No. 61 was arrested on 15th August 1942. The order, under which he is at present detained, was not made until 22nd February 1943. Rajeshwari Prasad Singh, who is the petitioner in Misc. Case No. 374 was arrested on 22nd May 1943, and the order of detention was not made until 18th September 1943. Harinam Gurgutia, who is the petitioner in Misc. Case No. 187, was arrested on 2nd September 1942, and an order of detention was made against him on 17th November 1942. The learned Advocate, who appears on behalf of Singheshwar Prasad, has said that, some time after his arrest his relations applied to the Chief Secretary for information as to the jail, in which he was detained, and that, although enquiries were made, the Chief Secretary was unable to supply the information. It is said that, subsequently, an application under Section 491, Criminal P.C., was made to this Court, and, on a rule being issued, fresh enquiries were made, and it was then ascertained that Singheshwar Prasad, who belongs to Patna and had been arrested there, had been removed to the Hazaribagh Central Jail. It was only then, it is said, and the facts appear to bear out the assertion, that an order of detention was made against him. Even if each of these petitioners was taken into custody by some police officer, purporting to act under Rule 129, Defence of India Rules, and this is denied in one case, and is, by no means, clear in the other two, it is plain that, when the orders of detention were made, the petitioners had already been detained for a period of more than two months, that is, their detention had already, for some-time at least, and, in two cases, for a very appreciable length of time, been illegal.

Now, the power to arrest and detain, on mere suspicion, which has been conferred on the executive, is not intended to be exercised in this arbitrary and capricious manner. Sub-rule (1) of R.129, Defence of India Rules empowers a police officer to arrest on suspicion, and sub-rule (2) empowers him to commit any person he may so arrest to custody. Sub-rule (2), however, also require him to report the arrest forthwith to the Provincial Government, and sub-rule (4) requires the Provincial Government to consider the report and make an order either releasing the person detained or authorizing his further detention. The Provincial Government, for obvious reasons, is not required to come to a final decision immediately. It may think it necessary or desirable to have further enquiries made. It is, however, incumbent on it to see that such enquiries are completed and a final decision taken within two months. If the Superintendent of the Jail, in which the person arrested is detained, does not receive any order from the Provincial Government within 15 days or within two months as the case may be, he is bound to release him. These provisions in the rules are intended to protect the individual against the caprice or malice of the subordinate and the carelessness or neglect of the higher officials. Whenever a person is arrested and detained on suspicion, a number of officials at once or within a very short space of time owe a duty to him. What is to be said when each one of these officials neglects that duty, when a man is thrown into jail and remains there for months on end without any kind of valid warrant or order until, eventually and, perhaps, only when this Court demands to know why he is detained, an order under R.26 is made against him? Is it not that the order is a mere cloak or device to cover up something illegal that has already been done that the recital in it is a mere sham? In exercising this power to detain on suspicion, the executive must act reasonably and in good faith, in such a way, that is, that a Court of law cannot say that it was obviously not acting bona fide because it was acting so unreasonably that no honest man could say that it could possibly have so acted. That is a well-known proposition of law, if it does act so unreasonably, there is ground for saying that it has not acted bona fide ((1916) 85 L.J.K.B. 1669 at p. 1672). When the orders of detention against these three men were made, the Provincial Government must have or ought to have realized that they had already been unlawfully detained for very appreciable periods. Was it not the reasonable course to take to order their release and to ascertain and take suitable action against those who had been responsible for their unlawful detention? Was it not highly unreasonable, by a single stroke of the pen, at once to deprive them of any remedy for the injury they had undoubtedly suffered and to authorize their further detention for an indefinite period? Two of them are pleaders in active practice and can scarcely be very dangerous characters. But even if their being at large was a source of far greater danger to the State then it would conceivably appear to be, was it not worth while taking the risk? Against whatever risk had to be run, there would have been set as a more than adequate counterpoise this, that the ordinary citizen had in some degree been re-assured that if the executive had been given power to frame a multitude of regulations encroaching in a variety of ways on his ordinary rights, the executive at least recognized an obligation to obey the Code which it itself had framed.

I turn next to a number of cases, in which the petitioners were apparently taken into custody originally on certain specific charges, on which they were eventually not prosecuted. Nageshwar Prasad Singh who is the petitioner in case No. 252, and Jogendra Prasad Sinha, who is the petitioner in case No. 103, were both arrested on 12th December 1942, and were produced in the Court of the Subdivisional Magistrate at Begusarai to answer a charge under R.85 of the Defence of India Rules. The proceedings were apparently adjourned from time to time until on 20th March 1943, the Public Prosecutor withdrew from the prosecution under S.494, Criminal P.C. In the meantime, orders of detention had apparently been passed against each of them on 13th February 1943. Jagdish Prasad Santalia, who is the petitioner in case No. 295, was arrested with six other men on 19th March 1943 on a similar charge of having committed an offence under R. 88 of the Defence of India Rules. He was released on bail and remanded on bail until 11th May 1943, when he was again taken into custody. The order of detention was, in his case, made on 21st June 1943. Subsequently, on 17th July 1943, the Public Prosecutor intimated to the Court that he did not propose to adduce any evidence to substantiate the charge under R. 38, and Jagdish Prasad Santalia was, in consequence, discharged. Kumar Jha who is the petitioner in case No. 800, was the cashier of the Central Bank of India at Gaya. He was arrested on 10th August 1942, apparently for the part taken by him in a collision, which occurred on that day between the police and a crowd in the town of Gaya. In his affidavit, Kumar Jha has said that it was through a mere accident that he got mixed up in this fracas and sustained certain injuries. That may very possibly have been an incorrect statement. It appears, however, from his affidavit that the persons who were arrested along with him, were all tried, convicted and sentenced. He himself was not put on trial, the reason being that an order of detention was made against him on 21st August 1942. His affidavit contains a statement that he had 'never participated in any Congress activities'. Whatever his political sympathies may have been, his position as a cashier of well-known bank at Gaya, makes it I think, rather doubtful if he could have taken any very important part in promoting the disturbances. In each of these four cases there was, it is clear, an arbitrary interference on the part of the executive with ordinary course of justice.

Miscellaneous Case No. 58, in which the petitioner is, Jogeshwar Singh stands on a similar, but not precisely the same footing. Jogeshwar Singh was arrested on 16th September 1942, on suspicion of having taken part in the extensive looting, which occurred at the Mokameh railway station. He was, subsequently, tried on a charge of dacoity and was convicted, but on appeal, the conviction was set aside by the Special Judge. This was on 20th April 1943, and long before that, on 27th October 1942, an order of detention had been made against him. From what is contained in the Judgment of the learned Special Judge, it would seem that a judicial enquiry was held by a sub-Deputy Magistrate. This was not completed until 15th November 1942, so that the order of detention was made while it was still in progress. When a man is arrested and brought up before a Court on some definite and specific charge, it seems to me very undesirable and indeed quite wrong for an order of detention to be made against him before he has been tried on the charge and his guilt or innocence finally determined. If he is convicted and sentenced, the necessity for any order of detention ceases to exist, at least until he has served out his sentence, by which time conditions may have entirely altered. If, on the other hand, he is acquitted, and an order of detention is sought against him, surely, the official, on whom the responsibility of making such an order rests, should obtain and study a copy of the judgment. I do not say that, in no case, where a man has been acquitted, should or can an order of detention be made. Prosecutions may break down, and acts of the person against whom an order is sought, other than the act or acts which led to his being prosecuted, may quite properly, have to be taken into consideration. Clearly, however, in most of such cases, the act which led to man's prosecution, will also be the overt act, relied on or principally relied on to connect him with some subversive movement and justify the making of an order of detention; and, if the official on whom the duty of making the order is cast, neglects to send for and study a copy of the judgment, it may very well be said that he has failed to act with due care and attention in the discharge of that duty.

Until the last war, the practice in England, in times of emergency, had invariably been to suspend the Habeas Corpus Acts, and, when the emergency came to an end, to pass an Act of indemnity. It is important to remember that, during such periods, any person, unlawfully detained, or who believed himself to be unlawfully detained, or any one on his behalf could still apply for a writ of habeas corpus, and the power of the Judges to grant such a writ was not taken away except in a very limited class of cases. The Suspension Acts, as they were properly called, merely provided that, when persons were detained in prison by warrant of the Privy Council or of one of His Majesty's Secretaries of State 'for high treason, suspicion of high treason or treasonable practices', no Judge or Justice of the Peace should 'bail or try' them without order from His said Majesty's Privy Council signed by six of the said Privy Councilors' till some date mentioned in the enactments. In other words, a person, who had been taken into custody and was detained on a charge of having committed any crime other than high treason, was still entitled to a speedy trial. To adopt the language, used in the Petition of Right, such a man was detained with cause shown' to which he was entitled to 'make answer according to law.' In the last war, the constitutional lawyers of the twentieth century devised another expedient more effectual, perhaps, in safeguarding the body politic against dangers greater than had ever before menaced it, and yet better calculated to interfere as little as possible with the personal freedom of the subject. The Legislature conferred on the executive a power to make regulations, both punitive and preventive, to create new offences and provide punishments for them and to prevent individuals committing certain offences by ordering their detention. The position however, with regard to the particular matter we are now considering, remained the same. A person, once arrested and charged with some crime, whether what he had done or was alleged to have done was, in time of peace, a crime at common law or by statute, or whether it had been a crime by regulation, is entitled to be brought before and tried by the courts of the land. In this respect, His Majesty's subjects in India are in no worse a position than His Majesty's subjects in Great Britain. Neither there nor here is it open to the executive, once a man has been brought before a Court of law on some specific charge, to substitute for the warrant, under which he is detained in jail awaiting his trial, an order of detention under R. 26, and then to deprive him of his right of clear himself of the charge by entering a nolle prosequi or intimating to the Court that they do not propose to adduce evidence against him.

In order to enable this Court to vindicate the rights of the subject, it may be necessary for it to rest its decision on a narrow and technical ground, namely, that the recital in the orders of detention, made in these five cases, is incorrect. But, on many occasions in the past, questions of the greatest importance affecting the right to personal freedom have been and had to be decided on such grounds. The word 'satisfied' in R. 26 (1) (b) must, as I have already said, be constructed as meaning 'reasonably satisfied.' At the moment when the Governor of Bihar signed the orders of detention against these five men, he could not have been reasonably satisfied that any such orders were at all necessary, as each of them was already detained under valid warrants. It was not open to the Governor to anticipate or pre-judge the decision of the Courts, and, in so far as he did so, a suspicion must necessarily arise that he was using the power, which had been conferred on him not for the purpose of preventing some danger to the State, but for the purpose of punishing some act or perhaps crime, which, in his opinion, had already been committed and that he could not do. These five petitioners, namely, Nageshwar Prasad Singh, Jagendra Prasad Sinha, Jagdish Prasad Santalia, Kumar Jha and Jageshwar Singh must be released.

There remain two cases, which present some analogy to the cases which I have just discussed. The conclusion, to which, however, I have eventually come is that they do not stand on quite the same footing and that, in them this Court no power to intervene. Mathura Prasad Misra, who is the petitioner in Miscellaneous case No. 208, was convicted of an offence under R. 88 (5), Defence of India Rules, on 28th July 1942. Shortly before the expiry of this sentence, on 19th April 1943, an order of detention was made against him. The Governor of Bihar was the sole judge of the continuance of the emergency which was created in August of last year, and, if on 19th April 1943, he thought it necessary to continue the detention of Mathura Prasad Misra, it is impossible for this Courts to say that he was wrong. The fact that this man had previously been convicted and sentenced for an offence under R. 88 (5) rather suggests, to my mind, that there probably was, in fact, good reason for the making of the order. Sitaram Dukhania who is the petitioner in Miscellaneous case No. 291, is apparently a native of Monghyr. In his affidavit he says that he left Monghyr and went to Calcutta on business on 3rd October 1942. On 12th October 1942, he was arrested with two other men in a room in a dharamsala, and, in this room, there was found a revolver, some ammunition for it and some other less incriminating articles. The three men were put on trial under the Arms Act in the Court of the Chief President Magistrate and were eventually acquitted. A copy of the judgment has not been produced, but, from what is stated in the affidavit, it would seem that the Chief Presidency Magistrate was not completely satisfied that it was the petitioner or either of the other two men who had put the revolver and ammunition where they were found. The order of acquittal was passed on 17th February 1943, and the order, under which Sitaram Dukhanis, is detained, was made on 9th March 1943. This order was presumably under sub-rule (5) of R. 129 when Sitaram Dukhania was sent to this province by the government of Bengal. The circumstances are, I think, scarcely sufficient to raise such a presumption as arises, for instance, in the case of Jogeshwar Singh that the action taken was punitive rather than preventive.

In the result, then the rules will be made absolute in the following cases, viz., Nos 61, 371, 187, 129, 108, 246, 300, 156 and the petitioners in these case viz., Singheshwar Prasad, Rajeshwar Prasad Singh, Haniram Gurgutia, Nageshwar Prasad Singh, Jogendra Prasad Sinha, Jagdish Prasad Santalia, Kumar Jha, Tarkesawar Prasad and Jogeshwar Singh, will be ordered to be released. In the remaining case the rule will be discharged.

Varma J. – I agree with observations of my learned brother and the conclusions arrived at by him. As it is a matter of some importance, I should like to say a few words on the subject. The petitioners have been detained under orders made by the Government of Bihar under R. 26 (1) (b), Defence of India Rules, and they pray that they should be released by this Court under S. 491, Criminal P.C. The relevant rules that come up for consideration are R. 129 and 26 (1) (b), Defence of India Rules. Rule 129 deals with the powers of arrest and detention of certain persons under certain circumstances. The persons who can exercise there powers are.

‘Any Police officer or any officer of Government empowered in this behalf by General or special order of the Central Government or of the Provincial Government.’ Rule 26 (1) is as follows:

‘The Central Government or the Provincial Government if it is satisfied with respect to any particular person that with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of the public order, His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian states, the maintenance of peaceful conditions in the tribal areas, or the efficient prosecution of the war, it is necessary so to do, may make an order . . . (b) directing that he be detained.' We are not concerned here with the Central Government but with the Provincial Government. The question that arises for consideration is, chiefly, the meaning of the expression 'satisfied' and the circumstances under which this Court can pass orders under S.491, Criminal P.C., for it is now well settled that the amendment of Ordinance 14 of 1943 is not ultra vires. As to what is meant by the expression 'if it is satisfied, we have to refer to some of the cases on that point. In 1942 A.C. 206 at p. 271, Lord Wright said:

Satisfied must mean reasonably satisfied. 'It cannot import an arbitrary or irrational state of being satisfied. I find the distinction 'between reasonably satisfied' and 'has reason to believe' too tenuous.

But I certainly am not inclined to say that in no case a Court go behind an order which on the face of it is valid ordering detention or custody. If that order is, if I may say so, practically a sham, if the purpose behind it is such as to show that the order is not genuine or bona fide, it seems to me the Court can go behind it.

From these two decisions it is clear that an order under R.26 (1) (b) to be valid must be based upon a reasonable satisfaction of the authority entitled to pass that order, and this Court can go behind the order if under the circumstances it is in a position to say that the ordering authority was not reasonably satisfied or that the order was not a bona fide order or that it was a sham order. This being the position, I should like to refer to some of the cases before us. I am referring to them in the order in which they have been referred to by my learned brother.

The first case that I would take up is Miscellaneous Case No. 186 of 1943. Tarkeshwar Prasad was arrested by the police under S.151, Criminal P.C., and lodged in the Gaya Central Jail. In September 1942, he was informed by the jailor verbally that he was detained under R.26 (1) (b), Defence of India Rules. The Crown has produced the order in this case. From the order it appears that one Mr D. Pires has signed the order for the Chief Secretary. The course of the argument, it transpired that Mr D. Pires is a Head Assistant, but nothing has been shown from which it can be gathered that he was authorized to sign this order. In these circumstances the detention is clearly illegal, and the authority to which my learned brother has referred clearly applies to this case.

The next case is the case of Singheshwar Prasad, Criminal Miscellaneous case No. 61 of 1943. Singheshwar Prasad was arrested on 15th August 1942. On the date the affidavit was sworn he was in the Central Jail at Hazaribagh. The order under which he is being detained was not passed till 22nd February 1943 a little more than six months after arrest. This order was passed during the pendency of a petition on his behalf for setting aside that order. The affidavit goes on to say that Singheshwar Prasad, who is an advocate, was arrested without warrant and without any accusation of having committed any offence under the Penal Code or any other enactment. It is not very clear under what section he was arrested by the Police. If it was an arrest under R.129, Defence of India Rules, the provisions of that rule have been clearly ignored. Clause (1) of this rule provides that, 'Any police officer or any other officer of Government empowered in this behalf by General or special order of the Central Government or of the Provincial Government may arrest without warrant any person whom he reasonably suspects of having acted, of acting, or being about to act . . . in a manner prejudicial to the public safety or to the efficient prosecution of war . . . '

But after the arrest a duty is cast upon the officer who makes the arrest to forthwith report the fact of such arrest to the Provincial Government and pending the receipt of the orders of the Provincial Government may, subject to the provisions of sub-rule (3) which deals with the question of furnishing security by order in writing commit the person so arrested to such custody as the Provincial Government may by general or special order specify. To this sub-rule there are two important provisions, (1) that no person shall be detained in custody under this sub-rule for a period exceeding fifteen days without the order of the Provincial Government, and (2) that no person shall be detained in custody under this sub-rule for a period exceeding two months. The judgment of my learned brother has dealt with this aspect of the case. On the facts presented before us, it is clear that the two provisions have been ignored. Before the expiry of the two months, which is the longest period of detention allowed under this sub-rule, some step ought to have been taken for continuing the detention of the petitioner. The order of detention passed on 22nd February 1943 comes long after the period of two months expired, and one cannot help feeling that the order was passed to give his detention a semblance of legality. I am not satisfied that the order was passed bona fide (as defined in some of the decisions that have been quoted). I am therefore of opinion that his detention should be put an end to and he should be released.

In Criminal Misc. Case No. 374 Rajeshwari Prasad Singh is the petitioner. He was arrested on 22nd May 1943. The order under which he has been detained was passed on 18th September 1943. The petitioner in the Criminal Misc. Case No. 187 of 1943, Hari Ram Gutgutia, was arrested on 2nd September 1942 and the order of the detention was passed on 17th November 1942. In these two cases also it will appear that the order of detention was passed more than two months after the arrest, making their detention in jail at the time of the order illegal. In their cases also one cannot help feeling that the orders were made really to give a semblance of legality. Before I take up some of the other cases, I should like to observe that the powers of the Court are not to know the materials on which the orders were made. We cannot compel the Crown to disclose them and, therefore, we cannot pronounce on their validity or otherwise. But the power to order the detention of a man under R. 26, Defence of India Rules, is not an arbitrary power. There are limitations on it and this Court may and is bound to satisfy itself that these limitations have not been exceeded. If the executive have gone beyond them and have used the rule in a way not intended, the order is not a bona fide order but a 'sham' order, and this Court may interfere. In the case, which I have just referred to, I am not satisfied that the orders were orders passed bona fide under R.26, Defence of India Rules.

In Criminal Misc. Case. No. 122 of 1943, the petitioner Nageshwar Prasad Singh was arrested on 12th December 1942 on a charge under R.38, Defence of India Rules. On 20th March 1943 a petition was filed by the Court Sub-Inspector praying that he be permitted to withdraw the case, and the Magistrate ordered the case to be withdrawn under S.494, Criminal P.C., and discharged the accused persons. On that very date petition was filed by the Court Sub-Inspector praying that the petitioner be detained under R.129, Defence of India Rules. That prayer was allowed. But it appears that on 13th February 1943 an order under R.26 (1) (b), Defence of India Rules, was passed against the petitioner. In Criminal Misc. Case No. 295 of 1943, Jagdish Prasad Santalia, was arrested on 19th March 1943 on a charge of having committed an offence under Rule 38. While on bail, he was taken in custody again on 11th May 1943 and the order of detention under R.26 (1) (b) was passed on 21st June 1943. Later, on 17th July 1943 when no evidence was led by the Public Prosecutor to substantiate the charge, the petitioner was discharged. In Misc. Case No. 300, the petitioner Kumar Jha (cashier of the Central Bank of Gaya) was arrested on 10th August 1942 and the order of detention was passed on 21st August 1942. The affidavit in this case shows that in a clash between a crowd and some constable he got mixed up in the crowd, although his presence there was accidental and he had gone there to fetch some medicine. The affidavit further says that the injuries on his person were caused by the brick bats thrown by the crowd. Now he was not the only person who was arrested on that date, but curiously enough, although a number of persons were sent up for trial and were ultimately convicted and sentenced, the petitioner was not put upon his trial. He was informed that his detention was under Rule 26 (1) (b). His prayer for bail was rejected on 20th August 1942. The petitioner further asserts that he is a bank employee and has nothing do with the Congress activities, nor has he taken any part in any movement. In these cases also there were materials upon which the Court could proceed against each of these petitioners, and when the specific facts alleged against them were not substantiated, it is difficult to hold that their detention was ordered after the authorities were reasonably satisfied that they were likely to commit prejudicial acts. When there was evidence available which was either not relied upon or produced in Court against the petitioners, how can one feel satisfied that the evidence which remains unknown could be the basis of an order passed upon reasonable satisfaction. These petitioners should therefore be released from custody.

In Criminal Misc. Case No. 58 of 1943, the petitioner Jugeshwar Singh was arrested on 16th September 1942 in connection with certain disturbances at Mokameh railway station. On 20th April 1943 the conviction against the petitioner was set aside by the Special Judge. But several months before this order of acquittal an order under R.26 (1) (b) for detaining him was passed on 17th October 1942. As a matter of fact, it appears that an inquiry by a Special Magistrate was not completed till 15th November 1942. The position that we are reduced to is this, that he was arrested on a specific charge and while the inquiry was still proceeding the order for his detention under R.26 (1) (b) was passed, and the charge for which he was originally arrested failed. In these circumstances, although it cannot be said as a general proposition that simply because the man has been acquitted of a particular charge, no order under R.26 (1) (b) could be passed against him, in this particular case it is difficult to hold that the order for his detention was passed on the authorities being reasonably satisfied under the circumstances. In the result I agree with my learned brother that in Criminal Misc. Cases Nos 186, 61, 374, 187, 122, 103, 295, 300 and 58 of 1943 the persons detained should be released from custody. I have not referred to the other cases because on the materials on the record, I am not satisfied that any case for interference, in the present state of the law, has been made out, and I agree with the conclusions of my learned brother.

Detention under Rule 26 of D.R.
Habeas Corpus Application in High Court.
Release of Nine Prisoners Ordered.

Patna, Jan. 10. — Mr Justice Varma and Mr Justice Shearer delivered this afternoon their separate but concurrent judgments in twenty-three 'Habeas Corpus applications preferred for the release of Mr Phulan Prasad Varma, Advocate, and Singheshwar Prasad, Advocate and Others who are being Detained Under Rule 26 (1) (b) of the Defence of India Rules.

Their Lordships ordered the release of Mr Singheswar Prasad and other 8 persons, namely, Rajeshwari Prasad Singh, Hari Ram Gutgutia, Nageshwar Prasad Singh, Joginder Prasad Singh, Jagdish Prasad Santhalia, Kumar Jha, Jogeshwar Singh and Tarkeshwar Prasad, observing that their Lordships were not satisfied that the orders for their detention were passed 'bona fide.'

Their Lordships dismissed the applications of Mr Phulan Prasad Varma and 13 others holding that on the materials on record I am not satisfied that any case of interference in the present state of law has been made out.

The main question that arose for consideration in these applications was chiefly the meaning of the expression 'satisfied' and the circumstances under which the court could pass orders under: Section 491 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

The Advocate-General, in response to the rules, produced orders under which the petitioners were detained. None of the petitioners put in a copy of the orders under which he was detained as no copy was made available to any of them. They were merely given to understand by the Jailor of the prison in which each of them was detained that an order had been made against them under rule 26 (1) (b) by His Excellency. The High Court issued rule forthwith in view of the fact that no copy of the order was supplied to any of the petitioners. Although it was incumbent on the Crown to produce the original orders, in many cases only true copies were exhibited and some of them were not certified as true copies by any responsible officer. The orders in question were passed for the purpose of safeguarding the country, which is at war, against internal as well as external dangers. The orders were in one and the same form and cyclostyled and were signed by the Chief Secretary to Government. Their Lordships observed that Rule 26 (1) (b) of the Defence of India Rules was 'intra vires', and it was not open to a court of law, on an application for a writ of 'habeas', to enquire into and pronounce on the validity of reasons which led to the making of the order. It was further observed that the High Court might examine the correctness of the recitals contained in these orders and declare the particular order to be invalid and the detention illegal, provided the court was satisfied that it was so. The material portion of the recital in the order was whereas the Governor of Bihar was satisfied. According to the authority of the English decision 'satisfied in Rule 26 (1) (b) must mean reasonably satisfied.' If in these petitions it could be shown that no grounds existed on which the Governor could, as a reasonable man, have been satisfied that the detention was necessary, then in their Lordships' opinion they were entitled to be released. Their Lordships were of the opinion that it lay with the Governor and the Governor only to decide if the emergency created by the Congress movement continued and to take action as he deemed necessary for the safety of the public and British India.

Applying this principle Their Lordships examined individual cases minutely and passed their orders, maintaining their detention or directing their release as they thought fit. At the same time, it was observed in some cases that the action was not fully justifiable and it seemed like a cloak to cover up something already done.

Their Lordships further observed that they could not compel the Crown to disclose the grounds on which the orders were made. But in law the power to order the detention of a man under Rule 26 was not an arbitrary power. There were limitations imposed on the ordering authority in the matter of passing such an order and the High Court was bound to satisfy itself whether these limitations had not been exceeded.

Dismissing the application of Mr Phular Prasad Varma, their Lordships observed that the Governor was satisfied that he should be detained. The Governor was aware from before that persons like Mr Varma were likely to assist the Congress movement and hence his arrest and detention was ordered as soon as the Congress Working Committee passed the civil disobedience resolution.

To the Chief Secy. Govt. of Bihar.

The Government of India have seen reports in the Press of a judgment dated the 10th January 1944 in which the Patna High Court have ordered the release of nine persons on the ground that the High Court was 'not satisfied that the orders for their detention were passed bona fide.' The Government of India would be grateful if a copy of the judgment could be forwarded to them as soon as possible.

2. In a recent case before a High Court, the Hon'ble judges commented unfavourably on the fact that a person detained by order under Defence of India Rule 26 (1) (b) had not at once been given a copy of the order under which he was detained. The Government of India consider it most desirable that copies of detention orders should be supplied immediately to persons detained thereunder, and I am to ask that, if the Provincial Government see no objection, they will issue instructions to that effect.

File No. 44/57/43 - Home Poll (I)

[NAI]

Press Note

In the debate in the Council of State on Pandit Kunzru's resolution on November 24th, 1943, the Home Member explained that the Government had been considering for some time certain amendments to Defence Rule 26. The result of that consideration is given in the Restriction and Detention Ordinance (No. III of 1944) which is promulgated today.¹ The Ordinance reproduces in the form of a self-contained enactment, the provisions of Defence Rule 26, but incorporates certain new provisions to bring the law into closer conformity with the corresponding U.K. Regulation in the light of certain observations made last year by the Calcutta High Court. The brief effect of these new provisions is that no detention order will remain in force in future for more than six months unless reviewed and specifically extended from time to time; that all persons detained will be informed of the grounds for their detention to such extent as may be necessary to enable them to make representations against the order; and that each detained person will be given a specific right to make such representations and will be accorded every facility to do so. A further important provision of the Ordinance relates to the delegation of powers. As in England certain subordinate authorities may be empowered to detain or restrict the movements of persons subject to confirmation by a Secretary of State, so in India an order of detention or restriction passed under delegated powers will require the confirmation of the Government that delegated the powers. This new provision takes account of the remarks made by the Federal Court in the case of *K. Talpade V. King Emperor*² regarding the wide range of authorities by whom the power of detention might be exercised.

With the promulgation of this Ordinance, Defence Rule 26 will remain in abeyance. Orders passed under that rule are validated; but they will be deemed to have been passed on the date of the promulgation of the new Ordinance so that the persons detained thereunder will have the benefit of the new provisions referred to above. Certain of these provisions might have been given effect to by amending Defence Rule 26 instead of by promulgating an Ordinance, but those which regulate the use of delegated powers would have entailed an amendment of Section 2 (4) and (5) of the Defence of India Act itself. It was considered more convenient therefore, to promulgate a self-contained Ordinance, thus obviating any doubts as to the legal validity of the provisions in the form of a rule made under the Defence of India Act.

The new Ordinance, it may be pointed out, will involve a review of all detention orders during the course of the next six months and that review will be carried out in the light, amongst other things, of any representations that the detained persons may wish to make under the new provisions. The essentially executive character of the action taken under the Ordinance is emphasized by the provisions which prohibit the disclosure, either in a court of law or otherwise, of the grounds of detention communicated to a detained person or of the representations that he may make to the detaining authority.

A separate Ordinance called the Military Safety (Powers of Detention) Ordinance, 1944, is being issued today.³ This gives power for the detention in the interests of Military safety of suspected persons entering India from enemy occupied territory and in no way affects the provisions of the Ordinance which will govern the detention or restriction of other classes of persons.

- (a) Make a report in writing of the fact to a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class having jurisdiction in the place where the said person ordinarily resides; and thereupon the provisions of sections 87, 88 and 89 of the Code of Criminal Procedure,

(7) The Central Government or the Provincial Government may, by general or special order made with the consent of the Crown Representative, provide for the removal of any person detained by it under sub-section (1) to, and for the detention of such person in, any area administered by the Crown Representative.

(8) If any person contravenes any order made under this section, other than an order of the nature referred to in clause (b) of sub-section (6), he shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both, and if such person has entered into a bond in pursuance of the provisions of sub-section (2), his bond shall be forfeited, and any person bound thereby shall pay the penalty thereof, or show cause to the satisfaction of the convicting Court why such penalty should not be paid.

(9) Any order made under the powers given by this section shall have effect notwithstanding anything inconsistent therewith contained in any Act, Ordinance or Regulation other than this Ordinance, or in any instrument having effect by virtue of any such Act, Ordinance or Regulation.

6. Validation of orders made under rule 26, Defence of India Rules – (1) No order made before the commencement of this Ordinance under rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules shall after such commencement be deemed to be invalid or be called in question on ground merely that the said rule purported to confer powers in excess of the powers that might at the time the said order was made be legally conferred by a rule made under section 2 of the Defence of India Ordinance, 1939 (V of 1939) or under section 2 of the Defence of India Act, 1939 (XXXV of 1939).

(2) Every such order shall on the commencement of this Ordinance be deemed to have been, and shall have effect as if it had been, made under this Ordinance, and as if this Ordinance had been in force at the time the order was made:

Provided that section 7 and section 9 of this Ordinance shall apply in relation to any order made under clause (b) of sub-rule (1) of rule 26 of the Defence of India rules as if that order had been made on the date of the commencement of this Ordinance, and section 8 of this Ordinance shall not apply to any such order.

(3) Nothing in the foregoing provisions of this section shall apply to any such order which has already been cancelled by or in consequence of an order of a competent Court:

Provided that any such cancellation shall not prevent the making under this Ordinance of a fresh order to the same effect as the order cancelled.

7. Grounds of order of detention to be disclosed to person affected by the order – Where an order is made in respect of any person under clause (b) of sub-section (1) of section 3, as soon as may be after the order is made, and where before the commencement of this Ordinance an order has been made in respect of any person under clause (b) of sub-rule (1) of rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules, as soon as may be after the commencement of this Ordinance, the authority making or which made the order shall communicate to the person affected thereby so far as such communication can be made without disclosing facts which the said authority considers it would be against the public interest to disclose, the grounds on which the order has been made against him and such other particulars as are in the opinion of such authority sufficient to enable him to make if he wishes a representation against the order, and such person may at any time thereafter make a representation in writing to such authority against the order, and it shall be the duty of such authority to inform such person of his right of making such representation and to afford him the earliest practical opportunity of doing so.

8. Order of detention made in pursuance of delegation under section 5 to be reported to Government for confirmation – When any order is made in respect of any person under clause (b) of sub-section (1) of section 3 by an officer or authority empowered in pursuance of section 5, that officer or authority shall forthwith report the fact to the Government to which he or it is subordinate, and that Government shall, after considering all the circumstances of the case including any representation made by the person affected by the order, make an order confirming or cancelling the order.

9. Duration of orders of detention made under section 3 – No order made or deemed under the provisions of section 6 to have been made under clause (b) of sub-section (1) of section 3 shall be in force for more than six months from the date on which it is made:

Provided that the Government which made the order, or where the order was made by an officer or authority empowered in pursuance of section 5 of this Ordinance or sub-section

(4) or sub-section (5) of section 2 of the Defence of India Ordinance, 1939 (V of 1939), or the Defence of India Act, 1939 (XXXV of 1939), the Government to which such officer or authority is subordinate, may after a further consideration of all the circumstances of the case direct that the order shall continue in force notwithstanding that the said period of six months has expired, and the order as so extended shall continue in force for a further period of six months and thereafter if and so often as it is again extended by a further similar direction made in the same manner.

10. Saving as to orders — (1) No order made under this Ordinance, and no order having effect by virtue of section 6 as if it had been made under this Ordinance, shall be called in question in any Court, and no Court shall have power to make any order under section 491 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 (V of 1898) in respect of any order made under or having effect under this Ordinance, or in respect of any person the subject of such an order.

(2) If at the commencement of this Ordinance there is pending in any Court any proceeding by which the validity of an order having effect by virtue of section 6 as if it had been made under this Ordinance is called in question, that proceeding is hereby discharged.

(3) Where an order purports to have been made by any authority in exercise of any power conferred by or under this Ordinance, the Court shall, within the meaning of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872 (I of 1872), presume that such order was so made by that authority.

11. Disclosure of grounds of detention, etc., communicated or of contents of written representation made under section 7 — (1) No Court shall allow any statement to be made or any evidence to be given before it of the substance of any communication made under section 7 of the grounds on which an order under clause (b) of sub-section (1) of section 3 has been made against any person, or of any particulars disclosed in connection therewith under section 7, or of any representation made under that section against any order, and, notwithstanding anything contained in the Indian Evidence Act, 1872 (I of 1872), no Court shall be entitled to require any public officer to produce before it, or to disclose the substance of, any such communication of grounds, particulars disclosed, or representation made.

(2) It shall be an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both, for any person to disclose or publish without the previous authorization of the Central Government or the Provincial Government any contents of any such communication of grounds, particulars disclosed, or representation made:

Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall apply to a disclosure made by a person the subject of an order under this Ordinance to his legal adviser.

12. Protection of action taken under this Ordinance — No suit, prosecution or other legal proceeding shall lie against any person for anything in good faith done or intended to be done in pursuance of this Ordinance.

13. Application of other laws not barred — The provisions of this Ordinance shall be in addition to, and not in derogation of, the provisions of any other Act, Ordinance or Regulation for the time being in force.

Unlawful Detention

In disposing of a batch of habeas corpus' applications recently in the Patna High Court, Mr Justice Shearer,¹ sitting with Mr Justice Varma, made some trenchant criticisms of the very improper and undesirable method followed by Government in several cases of making orders under Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules after more than two months of arrests of persons detained under Rule 129 D.I.R. No person under this Rule 129 can be detained in custody for a period exceeding 15 days without the order of the Provincial Government and no person can be detained in custody for a period exceeding two months. In other words, a police officer arresting a person under Rule 129 has got to obtain the sanction of the Provincial Government within 15 days and the Provincial Government can make an order of detention under this rule for not more than two months. But there have been cases not one or two but a good number of them and we will not be surprised if there are some more cases yet unnoticed in which no orders were passed at all, although the prisoners concerned were arrested under Rule 129 and continued to be detained under that Rule for longer than two months. His Lordship, in the course of the judgment, very justly points out that if the Superintendent of the jail, in which the person arrested is detained, does not receive any order from the Provincial Government within 15 days or within two months as the case may be, he is bound to release him. These provisions in the rule are intended to protect the individual against the caprice or malice of the subordinates and the higher officials.' But as a matter of fact, what has actually happened is that men have been thrown into jail and have remained there for months on without any kind of valid warrant or order until eventually and perhaps only when the matter has been brought to court and the latter has demanded as to why they were so detained that orders under Rule 26 are made against them. His Lordship very justly characterizes such an order 'as a mere cloak or device to cover up something illegal that has already been done that the recital (in the Order under Rule 26) is a mere sham.' His Lordship regards it as highly unreasonable to pass such an order and thereby deprive the prisoners concerned of any remedy for the injury done to them. The Provincial Government must realise that these prisoners have already been unlawfully detained for appreciably long periods and therefore, in the opinion of His Lordship, it is but reasonable to order their release and to ascertain and to take suitable action against those who have been responsible for their unlawful detention. We do not know if the Government of Bihar have seen this judgment of their Lordships Varma and Shearer J.J. If not, they should at once procure a copy of it, study it carefully and act up to the very just observations and sound suggestions made therein. If there are any more such prisoners left, who are being unlawfully detained without and valid warrant or order, they should be released at once, instead of making an order against them under Rule 26.

Mr G.B. Sett said: Mr Mayor, I want to mention a matter of urgent public importance. We believe that it is an inalienable right of the Indian people as of any other people, to have freedom and enjoy the fruits of their toil and have the necessities of life so that they may have full opportunities of growth . . .

The Mayor: What are you reading out?

Mr G.B. Sett: I am reading out the Congress Independence pledge.

Continuing Mr Sett said: We believe also that if any Government deprives a people of these rights and oppresses them, the people have a further right to alter it or to abolish it. The British Government in India has not only deprived the Indian people of their freedom but has based itself on exploitation of the masses and has ruined India economically politically, culturally and spiritually we believe therefore that India must sever the British connection and attain Purna Swaraj' or complete independence.

We recognize that the most effective way of gaining our freedom is not through violence.

India has gained strength and self-reliance and marched a long way to Swaraj, following peaceful and legitimate methods and it is by adhering to those methods that our country will attain independence.

We pledge ourselves anew to the independence of India and solemnly resolve to carry out non-violently the struggle for freedom till Purna Swaraj is attained.

We believe that non-violent action in general and preparation for nonviolent direct action in particular require successful working of the constructive programme of Khadi, communal harmony and removal of untouchability. We shall seek every opportunity of spreading goodwill among fellow men without distinction of caste or creed. We shall endeavour to raise from ignorance and poverty those who have been neglected and to advance in every way the interests of those who are considered to be backward and suppressed.

We know that though we are out to destroy the imperialistic system, we have no quarrel with Englishmen whether official or non-official. We know that distinction between caste Hindus and Harijans must be abolished and Hindus have to forget these distinctions in their daily conduct. Such distinctions are a bar to non-violent conduct. Though our religious faith may be different in our mutual relations we will act as children of Mother India, bound by common nationality and common political and economic interest.

Charka and Khadi are integral part of our constructive programme for the resuscitation of the seven hundred thousand villages of India and for the removal of the grinding poverty of the masses. We shall, therefore, spin regularly, use for our personal requirements nothing but Khadi and so far as possible products of village handicrafts only and endeavour to make others do likewise.

We pledge ourselves to the disciplines observance of Congress Principles and Policies and to keep in readiness to respond to the call of the Congress whenever it may come for carrying on the struggle for the independence of India.

Bande Mataram!

I move that the House do stand adjourned on account of the Independence Day.

Mr I.B. Beed seconded.

Mr J.H. Method: I object to adjournment and I want my objection to be recorded.

The Mayor: What day will you adjourn the meeting to? As there are some urgent items especially in Agenda B why not make it Friday next?

The House agreed.

The motion for adjournment was carried

Resolved

That the House do stand adjourned to Friday next at 5 p.m., on account of the Independence Day.

Home Department.

Shillong, the 28th January 1944.

Reference: Home Department Express Letter No. 3/61/43 – Poll (I) of the 15th December 1943.¹

Sir,

I am directed to state below the present position with regard to the cases of those convicted of rioting at Dhakiajuli.²

2. The situation has of course been altered by the finding that trials under the Special Courts Ordinance were illegal, and this Government were advised that it would be fruitless to apply to the High Court of Calcutta for enhancement of sentence. The matter could therefore only be pursued in the course of re-hearing of the cases under the direction of the High Court. Of the 27 persons sent up for trial by the Special Magistrate, 12 had been discharged under section 494 Criminal Procedure Code as the prosecutions against them were withdrawn, 8 were discharged under section 253 (1) Criminal Procedure Code as there was no prima facie evidence against them, 4 were acquitted under Section 258 (1) Cr. P.C. and 3 were convicted. Two of the convicted accused have been released on expiry of their sentences and only one is still serving his sentence. The accused who is undergoing imprisonment has declined to prefer an appeal against his conviction. The sessions Judge, Assam Valley Districts, who had been moved to set aside the orders passed in this case and to direct the accused to be retried or acquitted as the case might be (since all trials under the Ordinance had been declared illegal), declined to move in the matter because the accused has not appealed to the Lower Appellate Court, as intended by the High Court. The High Court has, therefore, been moved to pass the necessary orders, and the case is set down for hearing on the 24th January 1944. The question of expunging certain passages from the judgment will be urged at the hearing, and there result will be communicated in due course.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient servant,

H.G. Dennehy
Chief Secretary to the Government of Assam

We observe that the Calcutta edition of Amrita Bazar Patrika of January 26th displayed the so called National Flag prominently on the front page and carried on the second page a bowdlenized version of the Independence pledge, from which the more obviously seditious portions had been omitted, asterisks being left to mark the omissions.²

We presume that you will have consulted legal opinion as to whether the reproduction of the pledge in this form provides grounds for action against the paper and we should be glad to be informed urgently of the result of this consultation and to know what action, if any, you propose to take.

File No. 44/2/43 – Home Poll (I)

[NAI]

From

F.C. Bourne, Esquire, C.S.I., C.I.E., I.C.S.,
Chief Secretary to Government, Punjab.

To

The Additional Secretary to the Government of India,
Home Department, New Delhi.

Dated Lahore, the 28 January, 1944.

Memorandum

Reference your express letter No. 44/2/43 – Poll (I), dated January the 17th, 1944.¹

2. For the reasons stated in my express letter No. S-701-BDSB, dated June the 14th, 1943,² D.O. letter No. S-3143-BSB, dated September the 18th/21st, 1943,³ and in the last paragraph of my D.O. letter No. Sec-1793-SB, dated December the 23rd, 1943,⁴ the Punjab Government consider it unwise to impose any arbitrary time limit on interrogations in police custody. In addition to the reasons already stated against establishing a convention that the total period of special custody for interrogation should not ordinarily exceed two months, there is the consideration, which the Punjab Government consider as most important, that any attempt, to 'force the pace' may lead to malpractices and consequently to the extraction of misleading statements which would not only be dangerous to Intelligence but would also discredit the whole system of interrogation. Moreover, experience has shown that one of the most important factors in overcoming the natural reluctance of prisoners to incriminate themselves and their associates is the realization that their period of detention is not restricted to any prescribed length. Once prisoners realise that the normal period is two months their resistance to telling the truth will be greatly strengthened.

3. Extensions of the period of detention in police custody for purposes of interrogation beyond two months are always carefully considered by the Punjab Government before they are sanctioned, the conditions of detention being determined in accordance with the Punjab Security Prisoners Rules. In the cases of Central Government prisoners sent to the Punjab for interrogation the Punjab Government feel that they are in a better position than the Central Government to determine whether detention for more than two months in police custody is necessary, and regret that unless the Government of India are prepared to allow them to determine the period of detention necessary for interrogation they will not be able to accept Central Government prisoners for interrogation in future.

Official Notings

The first sentence of para 3 of the Punjab letter¹ really meets our point about Punjab's own 'interrogators', the object is to see that prolonged detention in police custody does not go unconsidered by Government.

The Punjab are, however being unreasonable (their touchiness on the subject of interrogation methods is probably the explanation) in demanding that they and they alone should be the final judges of the period in the case of Central Governments 'interrogators'. Since their methods have produced results and we have been assured that malpractices are not resorted to, we had better yield a bit and ask merely that we should be kept informed, whenever the period of two months is proposed to be exceeded. That will prevent the sort of thing that has happened - police custody for months on end without our knowing anything about it - and in practice in the unlikely event of detention being reasonably extended, we could I suppose bring some sort of pressure on them to curtail the period without necessarily making them wash their hands all altogether off interrogation on our behalf.

153: Official Notings reg. C.L.A. questions about Forward Block prisoners (dt 2.2.1944) (extracts)

File No. 22/18/44 - Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

Notes in the Home Department

... Put up. There are altogether six questions, four of which are down for the 11th and two for the 17th instant. As they relate to the same persons they have been brought on to the same file.

We have received no representations either from Shankar Lal, Dwijen and Aurobindo Bose or any other person regarding their maltreatment in the Punjab. As regards Sardar Sardul Singh it appears that he made a representation to the Punjab Government in 1942 about his maltreatment but it was not forwarded to the Government of India, though the Punjab Government said that the facts of the matter were reported. These papers are not traceable in office. Office is not aware of any representations made by the Sardar to the Hon'ble Member. His file is N.G.O.¹ Attention is however invited to questions and answers relating to him in the legislative Assembly in F. 22/20/42 and 22/4/43 – Poll (I). It appears from these papers that certain special amenities over and above those allowed by the Security prisoners Rules were originally granted to the Sardar but were subsequently withdrawn owing to the prisoner's unsatisfactory behaviour.

As regards interrogation of persons in police custody detained under the Defence of India Rule 26 in the Punjab we have already impressed on the Punjab Government the desirability of keeping the period as short as possible, and the matter is still the subject of correspondence with that Government. So far as office is aware the non-Punjabi detenus sent to the Lahore fort were Lala Shankar Lal Basal, Dwijen Bose, Aurobindo Bose and lately Jai Prakash Narain. D.I.B. will no doubt have the full information.

I have removed No. 20, which concerns General policy rather than specific matters regarding these prisoners, and can most suitably be dealt with separately.²

2. This is an awkward batch of questions. The first thing is, I think, to have a decision of policy as to how far we are prepared to answer. Since the prisoners concerned are all Central Government prisoners, I am afraid we can hardly refuse to answer most of the questions, even though in many cases our answer may be merely a denial of the allegations made. If this is agreed, then we should I think at once forward the whole batch to the Punjab and ask them urgently for material for reply; for although we can from our own and D.I.B.'s records give answers to a good many of the points raised, all the questions affect the Punjab and it will be as well in each case to have a clear indication of how far the Punjab Government would wish us to go.

These questions are extremely long and they contain a great deal of repetition and argument or insinuation. They may be shortened in their admitted form. It would be possible to answer some parts of some question by reference to previous answers, and other parts from such information as we possess. But a complete reply to all of them could hardly be given without a request for material from the Punjab Government.

I would be inclined to give a simple answer to the first four questions which are due for answer on the 11th February some what on the following lines.

The Government of India are not in possession of all the detailed information required to give a complete answer to all the different parts of those questions. The main object of the Hon. Member appears to be, however to suggest that Sardar Sardul Singh Caveesher and certain other persons, who have been detained in the Lahore Fort have been subjected to illegal and inhuman treatment and that the Punjab Government have suppressed petitions from them to the Government of India. I can assure the Hon. Member and the House that there is no truth in these suggestions. The Government of India are kept fully informed of the condition of the detention in the Lahore Fort and the manner in which persons detained there are treated. I should like to repudiate once and for all and in the strongest terms the allegation that this treatment involves torture of any kind, physical or mental, neither the Government of India nor the Government of the Punjab would tolerate such practices for a moment, nor incidentally would they be of any use. The health of the prisoners is well looked after, their accommodation is suitable, and their complaints if any receive due consideration.

If this is not considered sufficient, H.M. might add that detail information had been called for and a further reply would be laid on the table of the House in due course.

The two last question due for answer on 17th might be answered in the same way. It might be worth while asking the Punjab Government of the whole of the question not sent to them, whether they would allow Sant Singh or any other M.L.A. to inspect conditions in the Fort, though not of course to interview any prisoner detained there. If this could be done and the offer could be announced, it would have a good effect.

It will be noted that these question all relate to rather ancient history. We may expect similar allegations about the treatment of Jai Prakash Narayan and Ramanandan Mishra (whose cases has also been before the Lahore High Court) and it seems to me that some clear pronouncement on the main point at issue is called for.

D.O. No. 44/2/43 - Poll (I).

Government of India,
Home Department.

New Delhi, the 2nd February 1944.

My dear Bourne,

Will you please refer to your express letter No. 663 BDSB dated 28th January, regarding interrogation in police custody.¹ I think there has been some misunderstanding. It was not our intention to impose any 'arbitrary time limit' on the duration of police custody for interrogation and I am sorry if our letter of January 17th² gave that impression. Nor did we intend that it should become generally known, either to the prisoners themselves or to the public, that a special order would be required in the event of the period of police custody being extended beyond two months. What we are concerned to ensure, for our own satisfaction in respect of our own prisoners, is that any extension of police custody beyond two months is only ordered after full consideration – in fact precisely the practice that you have prescribed for your prisoners as stated in the third paragraph of your letter. We shall naturally do our best to accept any recommendations as to the duration of police custody required, but since it is we who have to answer questions on this subject in the Legislature, we do need -

- (a) To prescribe some sort of a general standard for the duration of police custody;
- (b) To be kept informed if the normal period is to be exceeded; and
- (c) To have some idea of the reasons for extensions.

2. We trust that you will agree, that there is really no great difference between the procedure proposed by us and that already practised by you, and that you will have no objection to adopting this procedure in the case of any Central Government prisoners whom you may interrogate in future.

Yours sincerely,

(R. Tottenham)

The only point in this question which needs real consideration is part (d),¹ since we know that petitions addressed to the Central Government have on occasions been withheld by the Punjab Government without apparently informing us (cf. the case of Sardul Singh Caveeshar). The Punjab Security Prisoners Rules, a copy of which is placed at flag 'U',² are not of much help to us. Paragraphs 27 and 31 are the relevant paragraphs, from which it is clear that D.I.G., C.I.D., Punjab has discretion to withhold and destroy any communication including one addressed to the Central Government. We should, I think, write to the Punjab asking specifically that any Central Government security prisoner's communication to the Government of India be forwarded without delay, and I have drafted the reply to part (d) on this assumption.

D.S/(I) also the draft answer to (a) needs further consideration.

The second sentence of the draft letter evades the point which is not about the rule framed by Government, Central or Provincial, but about their breach in particular cases. I don't know that H.M. should commit himself to non-interference in complaints of ill treatment of Central Government's detenus. I have attempted some modification.

As regards the withholding of petitions to the Government of India I agree with U.S. It is unwise to have the discretion to withhold so completely in the hands of the D.I.G., C.I.D. – surely Government may be trusted not to interfere unreasonably.

158: Official Comments of the Defence Department on Patna High Court judgement releasing some detenus – (dt 7.2.1944)

File No. 25/11/44 – Home Poll (I)

[NAI]

Copy of the Patna judgment releasing nine detenus on habeas corpus applications has arrived.¹ Home Department who have been enquiring for this reference may just see and pass the file on to legislative Department.

In these judgments, the High Court, acting under section 491, Criminal Procedure Code directed the release of nine persons detained under rule 26 (1) (b), as follows:

(i) Singheshwar Prasad, Rajeshwari Prasad Singh and Hariram Gurgutia. Pages 19 to 21 of Mr Justice Shearer's judgment and pages 4 to 5 of Mr Justice Varma's judgment refer. These men had all been arrested originally under rule 129 and a considerable time after the expiry of two months from their arrest, orders of detention under rule 26 were made. The men had apparently been kept in custody throughout the period from their arrest to the making of the order of detention. The learned judges observing that the executive had not complied with its obligations under rule 129, took the view (Mr Justice Shearer does not explicitly say so, but Mr Justice Varma does) that the orders had been passed to give previous detention a semblance of legality, and were not therefore bona fide.

(2) Tarkeshwar Prasad. Pages 9 to 10 of Mr Justice Shearer's judgment, and pages 3 to 4 of Mr Justice Varma's judgment refer. In this case, the order of detention was not signed by an authorized officer, and the Court therefore held the order was invalid.

(3) Nageshwar Prasad Singh, Jogendra Prasad Sinha, Jagdish Prasad Santalia, Kumar Jha and Jogeshwar Singh. Pages 21 to 25 Varma's Mr Justice Shearer's judgment, and pages 6 to 7 of Mr Justice Varma's judgment, refer. All these persons were apparently under-trial prisoners at the time the order of detention was made. For the reasons expressed most forcibly on page 25 of Mr Justice Shearer's judgment, the Court came to the conclusion that the Governor could not have been reasonably satisfied that the orders of detention were necessary, as each of the persons concerned was already detained under a valid warrant.

2. It does not appear whether a certificate under section 205 of the Constitution Act was asked for or given. Nor have the Government of Bihar indicated whether they wish to appeal, or what their view of the judgment is.

3. It seems to me somewhat daring of the court to have asserted that, although they did not know and could not enquire into the reasons for which the Governor might have made an order, they could nevertheless reach the conclusion that he had no reasonable grounds for making one. This seems to be the main point of principle involved in the case, and its consideration by the Federal Court might be desirable. On the other hand, it is difficult not to feel that there has been an abuse of procedure in Bihar.

4. Whether there is any question of an appeal or not, it would be desirable to find out what Bihar have to say, how they would justify the procedure stated in the judgment to have been followed and what rectifications if any they would propose to make in future.

5. Home and Legislative Departments should see for comments.

Political interest during the fortnight was centred mainly in the proceedings of the Central Legislature. The Press devoted considerable space to the issues arising out of the restriction order served on Mrs Sarojini Naidu, her defence of the congress, and the debates in the Assembly on adjournment motions relating to the 'Misapplication in the provinces of the Defence of India Rules.' It was argued that the speeches of elected members demonstrated the universal feeling which prevail amongst all political parties about Government's attitude to the Congress and the use of Defence of India Rules to suppress lawful activities and override the civil liberties of the people. Mrs Naidu's statements were regarded as completely absolving the Congress working Committee of Government's charges against it, and demands were again raised for the release of Congress leaders, and the initiation of negotiations for ending the 'political deadlock'. A good deal of this agitation was, however, artificial and laboured and evolved little public interest or enthusiasm. The Press is more actively interested in the practical business of securing the release of more Congress detenus, and at the moment, a strong press campaign is in progress for the release, on medical grounds, of Pandit Ravi Shankar Shukla,* the ex-Congress Prime Minister of the province, and one or two other prominent Congressmen.

Serial No. 60 (Issued)³

As desired by U.S. (I) the Security Prisoners Rules of the various provinces have been examined and relevant portions have been sidlined in red pencil. Whereas Bombay, Bengal, Punjab, Assam, Orissa and Sind have laid down that only such petitions as contain objectionable and insulting language may be withheld, Madras, U.P., Bihar and C.P. have provided for the forwarding of all petitions with remarks if any to the Government i.e. the Provincial Government. The Bombay, Bengal, Assam, Orissa and Sind Rules provide for withholding and/or destruction, the security prisoners concerned to be informed when a representation is so treated. The Punjab provide only for withholding and not destruction, and there is no stipulation that the security prisoner should be informed of his petition having been withheld. The N.W.F.P. rules are silent on this point though there is a provision for the forwarding of telegrams. No separate rules have been laid down by any province dealing with the petitions of Central Government Security Prisoners addressed to the Central Government and the rules as they stand do not render it obligatory for the Provincial Governments to forward all such petitions or to inform the Central Government of the fact of with-holding. (The rules do in some cases provide that the Provincial Government shall be the intermediary between the Central Government and the security prisoner).

2. There are no Central Government security prisoners detained under Ordinance III in Assam, N.W.F.P. or Orissa and if we address Provincial Governments in the sense of our letter to the Punjab, we should perhaps only endorse copies of the letter to these three provinces.

The Punjab reply has just come in and has been added to the file. The answers are on the whole fairly good, I think, and it seems definitely preferable to answer the questions in detail with the material provided than to give a general answer of the nature suggested by Additional Secretary, which would leave a number of points in the air. I have placed draft replies² on the file based on the replies given by the Punjab though with some amendments and additions. It is for consideration whether we should not at some suitable place – perhaps in the answer to question No. 103³ – emphatically deny the imputation that prisoners in the Lahore Fort are maltreated.

2. I would invite attention to the following points in the replies themselves:

- (1) Part (d) of the reply to question No. 100¹ says that the prisoners concerned were detained in the Fort for interrogation at the instance of the Government of India. I do not think this is strictly correct. So far as I know, no request of this nature was made by the Home Department, though doubtless the arrangements were made at the instance of the Intelligence Bureau. However, this may stand I think.
- (2) In the reply to (c) of question No. 100 and (b) to question No. 103, the Punjab admit by implication that representations to the Government of India were withheld. In their proposed reply to question No. 5 for 17.2.44, they admit this openly. I rather doubt the advisability of doing this and have attempted a re-draft of this reply on general lines which is I think justified and which should avoid further inquisition into the question of how and when this petition was reported to us.
- (3) In their reply to (a) of question No. 6 for 17.2.44,⁵ the Punjab have hedged over the first part of the question whether Caveeshar made any reference to the Home Member asking to be supplied with a copy of the order. It is to be inferred that he did and that it was withheld. I have revised the reply, to part (a), since the reply proposed by the Punjab will, I think, invite awkward supplementaries.

2. I have linked below our file No. IV/3/43–M.S. regarding Sardul Singh Caveeshar. Apart from the papers on this file, office appears to have received no petitions or references to petitions from Sardul Singh Caveeshar from the Punjab Government. The only petition on the linked file is that at Serial No. 1 addressed to Justice Sir Mohd. Munir, while in serial No. 12, reference is made to a petition to H.E. the Viceroy, but none to any petition addressed to H.M. We are separately addressing the Punjab Government on this subject of the withholding of petitions addressed to the Central Government.

I think it would be better to avoid detailed answers. There are two weaknesses which that course would expose, one detention of petitions (we have still not been told the reason) and second the non-supply of the detention orders to Caveeshar.

(2) Reply to part (e) of qn. No. 6 (p. 10) if Sharma was detained by order of the Provincial Government. I am not sure that we ought to reply. The Punjab Government have not given us any details of the 'subversive activities' for which he was detained. We do however know from them that the reason is not as stated in the question. We might perhaps say 'Pandit R.R. Sharma was not detained by order of the Government of India. I understand however that his detention had no connection with S.S. Caveeshar's case.

Dated 10th February 1944

To

My dear Bourne,

You will have noticed from the questions by Sardar Sant Singh regarding the treatment of Sardul Singh Caveeshar and other Central Government prisoners detained in the Lahore Fort, sent to you for material for reply under our letter No. 22/18/44 dated 3.2.44.¹ that one of the points with which great play is made is the withholding of petitions addressed by Sardul Singh and other prisoners to the Home Member and the Central Government. It appears from your draft replies² that such petitions from Sardul Singh and Dwijin /Sic/ Bose were in fact withheld by the Punjab Government since the allegations of ill-treatment that they contained were baseless; we do not appear have been informed of it at the time.

2. We see from clause 41 of the Punjab Security Prisoners Rules that applications or representations from security prisoners to Government are to be forwarded to Government unless couched in disrespectful or discourteous language. We think that in future all applications and representations from Central Government security prisoners detained in the Punjab should, unless withheld under clause 41 (2) of your Rules, be forwarded without delay to the Home Department of India with such comments on their contents as you may think necessary or appropriate. Even in cases of communications withheld clause 41 (2), we should be glad to be informed of the fact at the time.

Subject: Detention certain Personnel of 1/15 Punjab Regt Order Ordinance III of 1944.

1. It is requested that the Government of India in the Home Department be asked to issue Detention Orders in respect of the undernoted personnel of 1/15 Punjab Regt who are now in military custody in Madras pending discharge:

1. Subedar KERTAR SINGH, Sikh, s/o ACHILAR SINGH of Hoshiarpur Dist.
2. No. 9979 Have. UJAGAR SINGH, Sikh, s/o SUCHIT SINGH of Lyallpur Dist.
3. No 10116 L/NK PIARA SINGH, Sikh s/o HARNAM SINGH of Lahore Dist.
4. No. 11164 Sep. NAZAR SINGH, Sikh s/o SANTA SINGH of Hoshiarpur.

2. The G.O.C. in C., Southern Army has expressed the opinion that the detention of these men is desirable in order to prevent them from acting in a manner prejudicial to the War effort. He considers that, having regard to the mens' behaviour in their unit, they are likely, unless restrained, to indulge in anti-recruiting and anti-Government propaganda. I agree with this opinion and consider that their detention under Ordinance III of 1944 is justified. Their history and contacts justify the conclusion that they are likely to indulge in subversive activities.

3. It was from this Battalion, the 1/15 Punjab Regt, that a platoon of 24 Sikhs deserted to the enemy on the Arakan Front in February 1943. Investigations showed that subversive and disgruntled elements existed within the unit, that there had been contact between one of the deserters and SUBHAS CHANDRA BOSE in Calcutta in 1939 and that at that time several men of the battalion were interested in subversive politics, that certain men of the unit had contact with Congress propagandists in Chittagong at the end of 1942, and that the tone and spirit of the Regimental Centre at Ambala, to which several men of the battalion had returned, was bad. The Battalion moved to Madras in July 1943, and in October the Officer commanding reported that the Sikhs had 'retired within themselves to an extent unusual for Sikhs.' Investigations following the attempted murder of a Sikh Havildar led to disclosure of evidence of anti-British, pro-Japanese and pro-Congress sentiments among men of the unit, Sikhs and Jats. It was unfortunately impossible to secure sufficient evidence on which to bring anyone to trial for the attempted murder but strong enough grounds were shown for the discharges from the Army of fifteen men, in respect of four of whom detention order are now requested.

4. A statement of the case against each of the four men is attached hereto, marked 'A', 'B', 'C', and 'D'. [Not printed - Ed.]

5. It is requested that, should detention be decided on, the Civil Authorities in Madras be asked to make the necessary arrangements with the local Army Authorities, to serve the detention orders on the men concerned as soon as they are formally discharged from the Army, and to arrange for their detention in such a place as the Home Department may consider suitable.

6. The decision concerning the disposal of the four men may please be communicated to me in due course.

War Department

This case has been seen by A.D. S.I. who mentioned it to Secretary.

War Department would be grateful if the Home Department would kindly take necessary action as suggested by Gen. Cawthorn against the four people mentioned in the preceding note, Home Department (Mr Olver).

The P.U.C. is for orders. If detention orders are to be issued, the case will have to be submitted to H.M. for orders.

2. The case against Hav. Ujagar Singh is clear and there can be no doubt, I think, that he is a fit subject for detention. The cases against L/NK' Piara Singh and Sep. Nazar Singh are less clear, but still, I think, sufficient to satisfy us that detention is necessary. The case against Achhar Singh seems to rest entirely on Paras 4 and 5 of the statement² against him, it is in my opinion weak and insufficient; and I think we should ask for a more precise and detailed statement of the case against him before agreeing to issue orders.

D.S./(I).

Except against Ujagar Singh, who I agree should be detained, the material does not indicate that a less severe form of preventive action eg. restriction to the village will not suffice. That would enable them to be watched, and if they spread disaffection, doubtless detention could be speedily and certainly arranged.

V. Sahay

Additional Secretary.

The opinion formed of these four men is no doubt the result of the impression they created under examination on interrogation; and even if the 'material' against them may not in all cases seem very convincing. We cannot lightly reject the advice of the responsible military authorities. I note that a copy of D.M.I.'s memo of February 12th was sent to D.I.B. and I think his views should be invited. If they are to be detained I suppose they can go to Indore.

This may go on to D.I.B. As regards the last point, I do not know how much room there still is at Indore but we could doubtless make room there by transferring some of the Bengal & Assam detenus who are there to Lucknow camp Jail.

H.D. u/o 1292/44 - Poll (I) dated 28.2.44.

Notes in the Intelligence Bureau.

On the cases put forward the action suggested is on the drastic side but extreme measures are necessary in the case of the 1st/15th Punjab Regiment which has occasioned grave anxiety for some considerable time and must be cleaned up thoroughly if it is to be of further use as a fighting unit. This cleaning up process involves not ridding the Regiment of those who are the cause of its unsatisfactory state, but also bringing home to all concerned that those in authority intend to stand no nonsense. In these days it may be a disgrace to a Punjab cultivator to be dismissed from the Army, but it is not a vast punishment when land is paying so well. This is some argument in favour of the action suggested. Others are as stated in D.M.I.'s note and a further one is that it would be as well to deprive the country of the presence at liberty of what is essentially potential enemy agent material and also to prevent the return of such persons to the central (and almost always dangerous) Punjab districts. Taking all the circumstances into consideration the Bureau, therefore, supports the recommendation for action which D.M.I. has made.

2 There is no objection to put forward to Indore being the place of detention.

D.I.B. u/o No. Sa/516-IV dated 14.3.44.

I was not objecting to dismissal or to bringing home to all concerned that those in authority intended to stand no nonsense. We are merely concerned with whether detention should be ordered.

As regards the place of detention, we should send them to Indore, I think that the better course would be to send them to a Punjab Jail - the usual course with persons suspected of being in with the enemy is to send them to the jail of the province of origin.

Additional Secretary.

There would I think be a case for asking the War Department to deal with this case. They can of course issue orders under Ordinance III. It has however been generally agreed that Home Department should operate Ordinance III & War Department Ordinance IV.⁴ I think the grounds for this action proposed are sufficient.

R. Tottenham.
15/3.

I have no copy of Ordinance IV. Is it Additional Secretary's proposal that action should be taken under that Ordinance and not under Ordinance III?

Maxwell.

Additional Secretary.

Action cannot to taken under Ordinance IV which only applies to people who have entered India from occupied territory after a particular date. What I meant was that this was largely a military case and therefore W.D.⁴ could themselves take action under Ordinance III. I thought however that it would be better for H.D.⁵ to do so.

168: Baldev Mitter Bijli and others (petitioners) v. Emperor [Harries C.J., Blacker and Munir J.J. Full Bench (16 Feb. 1944)]

AIR, Vol. 31, 1944, Lahore, p. 142

Criminal Misc. Petitioners Nos 796, 797 of 1943, Decided on 16th February 1944, referred by Munir J., D 16th December 1943.

Veda Vyasa and S.M. Sikri – for petitioners.
R.C. Soni for Advocate General – for the Crown.

Harries C.J. – These are three petitions under S.491, Cr. P.C., preferred by persons detained under the Defence of India Rules. Criminal Miscellaneous No. 796 of 1943 is the petition of Baldev Mitter Bijli of District Hoshiarpur, who was arrested at Lahore on 21st August 1942 under R.129, Defence of India Rules, and was subsequently detained under an order made under R.26 of those rules.

[Omitted: Summary of points made by the petitioner – Ed.]

Criminal Miscellaneous No. 797 of 1943 is the petition preferred by Feroze Chand of Lahore who was arrested on 14th August 1942 at Lahore and subsequently detained in Jail under an order made under R.26, Defence of India Rules.

[Omitted: Summary of points made by the petitioner – Ed.]

Both these detenus have also filed affidavits in support of their petitions and in these affidavits the detenus complain that there could have been no justification for their arrest and detention. They also complain that they have not been treated in the jail in a proper manner. In their affidavits both also complain that they delivered habeas corpus petitions to the Superintendent of the Jail concerned on 18th and 19th June 1943, and that these petitions had been retained by Government until the month of October 1943, when they were forwarded to this Court.

Mr F.C. Bourne, Chief Secretary to Government, Punjab, has filed affidavits in reply to the affidavits of these two petitioners in which he deals with the various complaints of the detenus as to their treatment. Mr Bourne admits that the habeas corpus applications of these two detenus were withheld from this Court by the Government until the month of October 1943. In reply to the allegation in the affidavit of Baldev Mitter Bijli, Mr Bourne, says that at the time the habeas corpus petition was forwarded by the Jail authorities to Government, the latter were advised that under S.17, Defence of India Act, the detention of security prisoners could not be questioned in a Court. Subsequently he says that the Government realized that the law was not as they had imagined but as this Court had already referred another habeas corpus petition for decision by a bench in October, this petition together with others was held up until the decision of that case. Mr Bourne says that it was expected that in view of some judgment of the Federal Court¹ and judgments of the Calcutta High Court² and this Court, there would be a large number of habeas corpus applications and that there was no point in forwarding single applications as they came in and that it would be more convenient to forward a number together. In answer to the allegation made by Feroze Chand, Mr Bourne says that his application was withheld from this Court by Government until this Court had delivered judgment in a similar application which had been referred to a Division Bench in the month of October 1943

The third petition is by L. Thakar Das Kapur on behalf of his wife, Smt. Puran Devi who was arrested on 9th August 1943 at Lahore and subsequently detained in Jail under R.26, Defence of India Rules. It is alleged that at the time of her arrest Smt Puran Devi was not engaged in any unlawful activity and that her detention is illegal and improper. It is further stated that the detainee was ill and that her continued detention in prison would very seriously affect her health.

[Omitted: Text of the orders of detention – Ed.]

It is contended on behalf of the three petitioners that these orders are illegal and afford no justification for the detention of the petitioners. On the other hand, Mr R.C. Soni has taken a preliminary objection that this Court has now no jurisdiction to consider these petitions and he relies upon a very recent Ordinance, Ordinance No. 3 of 1944,⁴ which was promulgated by His Excellency the Governor-General, on 15th January 1944.

[Omitted: A brief summary of section 3, 5, 6 and 10 of the Ordinance No. III of 1944 – Ed.]

Mr R.C. Soni has contended that by reason of Ss.6 and 10 of Ordinance No. 3 of 1944 this Court has no longer jurisdiction to hear these applications though they were pending before the Court when the Ordinance was promulgated. He has contended that by reason of s.10, sub-s.(2) of the Ordinance the proceedings pending before this Court were discharged the moment this Ordinance came into force.

To take away the powers of the Ordinary criminal and civil Courts of the land the plainest terms are necessary. There can be no doubt, however, that the Ordinance clearly purports to deprive this Court of jurisdiction in cases of detention under the Defence of India Rules. Sub section (1) of S.10 in terms state that no order made under the Ordinance shall be called in question in any Court and that no Court can make an order under S. 491, Criminal P.C., in respect of any person detained under the Ordinance, and further by sub-section (2) all such proceedings under S.491 as were pending when the Ordinance came into force are discharged. In other words, the jurisdiction of this Court is taken away even in the case of pending proceedings.

Mr S.M. Sikri, who argued this case for the detenus very ably and forcibly, has conceded that if this Ordinance is valid, then this Court has no longer jurisdiction to consider the petitions. He, however, urged that the Ordinance cannot apply to the petitions now under consideration and I shall deal with his contentions seriatim.

[Omitted: Detailed rebuttal of Mr Sikri's arguments, with reference to the clauses and sections of Ordinance III of 1944 and beginning with an account of the Ordinance making efforts of the Government of India ever since Federal Court declared Rule 26 of D.I.R. ultra vires. (Keshav Talpade vs. Emperor) – Ed.]⁴

For the reasons which I have given, I am satisfied that the orders of detention in this case could only be questioned on one ground and one ground only, merely, that they are issued under R.26, Defence of India Rules, which was declared ultra vires. That objection however cannot affect the validity of the rules by reason of S.6, sub-section (1) of the new Ordinance, Ordinance 3 of 1944. These orders therefore come within sub-section (2) of S.6, and must be deemed to have been made and shall have effect as if they had been made under the new Ordinance and as if the ordinance had been in force at the time when they were made. That being so, sub-section (2) of S.10 of the new Ordinance applies, and all proceedings in this Court, though pending before the Ordinance came into force, are discharged.

[Omitted: Rebuttal of Sikri's argument that sub-section (2) of section 10 of Ordinance III was ultra vires — Ed.]

For the reasons which I have given I am satisfied that the preliminary objection taken on behalf of the Crown that this Court has no jurisdiction to hear and determine these petitions is well founded and that being so, they must be dismissed.

Before concluding this judgment, I feel it my duty to refer to a matter raised by Baldev Mitter Bijli and Feroze Chand. These two detenus forwarded petitions in the nature of habeas corpus petitions to this Court through the Superintendent of the Sialkot jail in June 1943. These petitions did not reach this Court until October 1943 and Mr Bourne, the Chief Secretary to Government, admits that they were retained by the Provincial Government for about four months. Mr Bourne in his affidavit has explained why these petitions were retained by the Government. He says that at one time it was thought that such petitions did not lie to this Court and later when it was realized that they did the Government withheld them pending the decision of another case by a Bench of this Court. The explanations offered by Mr Bourne afford no grounds whatsoever for withholding these applications. The applications were addressed to this Court and this Court and this Court only can adjudicate on a question whether an application lies to it or not. Further, it is this Court and this Court only that can decide whether the hearing of an application should wait the decision of some other application. Whether a point is common to a number of applications, is a matter which only this Court can decide and in my view the withholding of these applications for a period of three to four months cannot be justified on any ground whatsoever. Officers of the Government were arrogating to themselves the functions of this Court and that they had no right whatsoever to do. I wish to make it clear that withholding any petition addressed to this Court — no matter on what ground — cannot be justified. The petition may appear to be frivolous or may appear to afford no ground whatsoever for the release of the detained person, but it is this Court and this Court only which can decide such matters. Unreasonably withholding petitions addressed to this Court appears to me to be interfering with the due course of justice, and I feel it my duty to say that if any petitions are withheld in future, the person withholding them will be rendering himself liable to proceedings for interfering with the due course of justice.

I sincerely hope that in future all petitions addressed to this Court will be forwarded for disposal without delay. That this Court may be flooded with such petitions is no ground for not forwarding them. Even after this case in which it is held that ordinance 3 of 1944 ousts the jurisdiction of this Court, petitions must be forwarded as it will be for this Court in every case to decide whether it has or has not jurisdiction in the matter. I would grant the petitioners a certificate under S.205, Government of India Act.

S.M. Bose Advocate-General and B. Das for the Crown.

Derbyshire C.J. – On 7th September 1943, a Bench of this Court issued a rule under S. 491, Criminal P.C., calling upon the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal and the Superintendent of the Dacca Central Jail to show cause why the petitioners, alleged to be illegally and improperly detained in custody, should not be brought up before the Court and dealt with according to law or set at liberty. The number of persons concerned in this rule was 176. The applicants made a joint application for the rule. They were apparently all confined in jail at Dacca. They are represented before us by Mr P.K. Bose who agrees that the cases all stand on the same footing. There, however, is one exception, namely, that of petitioner 21, Piyush Kiron Rauth, whose papers have not been available, and his case is not, therefore taken in the present proceedings. The Advocate General has appeared on behalf of the Government of Bengal to show cause against the rule. We are informed, and it is not disputed, that with the exception of four person orders for the detention of the applications were made by the Governor of Bengal. In the cases of the others, they were made by the District Magistrate of Chittagong to whom authority to make the orders had been delegated. The orders were originally made under R.26(1) (b), Defence of India Rules. Rule 26 was, in April 1943, by the Federal Court, declared ultra vires of S.2, Defence of India Act. In May 1943, an ordinance was promulgated by the Governor General validating the orders that had been made under R.26. The validating of the ordinance was questioned in this Court in May 1943 and in September 1943 by the Federal Court. In the meantime applications had been made by persons including the present applications, to this Court for orders under S. 491, Criminal P.C. It was as a result of those applications that the rule in question was granted. On 15th January 1944, another ordinance, Ordinance 3 of 1944, was promulgated by the Governor General which recites.

[Omitted: Text of preamble to Ordinance 3 of 1944, and summary of its clauses – Ed.]

It has been contended on behalf of the Government of Bengal that this Court has no jurisdiction to deal with this rule by reason of the provisions of cl. 10. Mr P.K. Bose on the other hand, has contended that the provisions of cl. 10 which in effect ousts the jurisdiction of the Court to deal with this matter are themselves invalid as being beyond the powers of the Governor-General. If cl. 10 (2) is valid then there is an end of these proceedings because they have under the Ordinance been discharged, that is, put an end to, as from 15th January 1944, and we have no further powers to deal with them.

Mr P.K. Bose for the applicants has further contended that the Governor-General in ousting the jurisdiction of the Courts has acted contrary to the provisions of S. 110, Government of India Act, 1935.

[Omitted: The Chief Justice considers this argument and rejects it — Ed.]

The result is that we have no further powers to deal with these applications. For that reason we formally make the order that this rule is discharged. Certificate under S. 205, Government of India Act, is granted in this case.

Rule discharged.

Validity of Detention Ordinance

Bengal Detenus' Habeas Corpus Petition Dismissed. AIR, 31, 1944 Calcutta (284–287)

The rules obtained by 351 security prisoners from different parts of Bengal and Assam in the nature of habeas corpus under section 491 Cr. P.C. against the orders of detention passed under Rules 26 of the Defence of India Rules have been discharged by the Chief justice and Mr Justice Lodge at the Calcutta High Court, as in their opinion, Clause 10 (2) of Ordinance III of 1944 (Restriction and Detention Ordinance), which ousted the jurisdiction of the Court to give relief, was not invalid.

The effect of the clause in the new Ordinance, said their Lordships, was that the rules obtained in these matters were deemed to be discharged on January 15, 1944, when the new ordinance was promulgated, and the Court had no power to deal with these applications. For that reason, their Lordships formally ordered the discharge of the rules.

A certificate for leave to appeal under Section 205 of the Government of India Act to the Federal Court was granted in these matters.

Barring some three or four cases, this disposed of all the cases of security prisoners pending in this Court.

The decision that Clause 10 (2) of the new Ordinance was not invalid was given by their Lordships while delivering judgment in the rule obtained in the nature of habeas corpus under section 491 Cr. P.C. by 175 security prisoners from Dacca Jail, where the point was taken on behalf of the prisoners that Clause 18 was ultra vires. — A.P.I.

On Government Charge-sheets to Detenus.

Comrade,

Under the new Ordinance, the cases of detenus are being reviewed. For this purpose, a charge-sheet will be sent to each detenu, specifying the charge of suspicion against him.

Form of Answer

Since the charge-sheet will not be of a general nature, it would be difficult to send a general form of answer. But the answer should be as follows:

- (1) Denying the specific charge of sabotage or anti-war activity.
- (2) Adding 'that as a member or sympathizer of the C.P.I., I support its policy and on principle am opposed to sabotages and stand for National Defence against the Fascists. I stand for National Unity to strengthen our National Defence.'

Nothing more need be said.

What You Must Do

Inform our Comrades in jail that —

- (1) They should immediately reply to such charge-sheets,
- (2) In particular see that Congress detenus whom our Comrades have succeeded in convincing against sabotage and for Unity, are reached and they be induced to adopt this procedure.

This is very important.

Government's Notice on detenus and what our answer should be

Dear Comrade,

We have received a specimen of the notice sent by the Bombay Government to the detenus. It is as follows:

'In pursuance of section 7 of Ordinance No. III of 1944, you . . . are informed that the grounds for your detention were that you were . . . a prominent and active member of the Congress and there was reason to suppose that if not detained, you would take an active part in the mass movement sanctioned by All-India Congress Committee on the 8th August 1942 and thereby impede the successful prosecution of the war.

2. You are informed that you have a right to make a representation in writing against the order under which you are detained. If you wish to make such a representation, you should address it to the undersigned and forward it through the Superintendent of the jail as soon as possible.

Signed. For Secretary to the Government of Bombay, Home Department.

31st January 1944.

Draft Reply

I am a member of the . . . Congress Committee. In respect of the charge against me, I state.

- (1) That while it was true that the A.I.C.C. at Bombay had decided to start a movement under Gandhiji's leadership, it was categorically stated by Mahatma Gandhi that no movement would start till —
 - (a) Mahatma Gandhi had met the Viceroy and explored the avenues of settlement.
 - (b) Mahatma Gandhi gave a call for a movement.
- (2) There was thus no movement started by the Congress since the leaders were arrested before any of the two things mentioned above could be achieved.
- (3) I believe that this war against Fascist Powers must be won. I am opposed to sabotage as I believe it hits us and helps only the aggressor at the door.
- (4) I believe that a National Government composed of all major parties can alone organise effectively the defence of our country, and enthuse the people to fight the invading enemy.

Holding these views, I maintain that my detention is unjustified and I should be released unconditionally.

P.U.C.

The file regarding amendment of our security prisoners order to admit of interviews with legal advisers has already under submission. I have obtained from Legislative Department and placed below our File No. 44/57/43 – Poll (I) regarding promulgation of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance in case this is needed, though it is not, I think, directly relevant.

2. The relevant portion of section 11(10) of our Security prisoners order reads:

A Security prisoner may, with the permission of the authority under whose orders he is detained, be allowed . . . to interview his legal adviser in connection with a legal proceeding to which the security prisoner is or will be a party.

It seems to me clear enough that the framing of a representation in answer to a communication under section 7 of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance can in no sense be termed a legal proceeding and that legal advisers should not, therefore, be consulted for this purpose. This view is supported by the attitude which we adopted during the previous review of cases (Dam committee¹ file will be put up if desired) in which it was definitely laid down that legal assistance could not be had in framing the replies to our notices.

3. As verbally directed by Additional Secretary, I put up a draft telegram to provinces and draft ad interim reply to Bombay. It is for consideration, however, whether we should not take a definite line ourselves without consulting provinces.

This could, I should have thought, legitimately be held to be a matter of principle to be decided by the Central Government.

25.2.44.

D.S. (I).

Strictly speaking, I think it is possible to include the making of a representation under 57 of Ordinance III of 1943 in the term 'legal proceedings' but it was not the intention of S-11 (10) of our security prisoners order to permit lawyers to come in on this kind of proceedings.

Bombay are not concerned however with a security prisoners order — they are referring to the proviso to s.11 (2) of ordinance III as indirectly permitting consultation with legal adviser in respect of representations.

I think the correct interpretation of this proviso to s.11 (2) is that the option to permit consultation with a legal adviser remains with Government and if Government permits it a defence may make the relevant disclosures to his lawyer with impunity.

If this is correct, we would be entitled to say that legally there being no obligation to allow lawyers, 'legal proceedings' in our security prisoners order should be interpreted as equivalent to proceedings in a court of law and in connection with representations under 37, lawyers should not be allowed.

We may however obtain the views of provincial Government first as in the draft.

25/2

Additional Secretary.

HM definitely wishes to ascertain Provincial Govts views and practice without giving them a lead. There was some discussion, however, about the necessity for, and effect of, the proviso to s.11(2). This might be looked up and while we are awaiting replies, we may perhaps consult Lg. Department further.

Legislative Assembly

The Question, is down for meeting

On the 26.2.1944.

Mr Akhil Chandra Datta:

- (a) With reference to the statement made by the Honourable Sir Reginald Maxwell in this Assembly on the 7th February, 1944, viz., 'Government have been advised legally that the pledge (Congress pledge) is a seditious document', will the Honourable the Home Member be pleased to state when that pledge was first placed before the country and when Government came to know of it?
- (b) Was any exception taken to it by Government at the time on the ground that it is seditious document and that it was proscribed?
- (c) When have Government been advised that it was a seditious document?
- (d) What was the occasion for Government's seeking and obtaining legal opinion whether it was seditious or not?
- (e) When was that opinion given; and by whom?
- (f) Has there been any prosecution of any Congress member for sedition on the basis that the Congress pledge was a seditious document?
- (g) Have Government obtained the verdict of any competent court in support of their contention that the Congress pledge was a seditious document?
- (h) Was that ground put forward anywhere in support of the order banning Independence Day celebrations?

Legislative Assembly.

(To be answered on the 26th February 1944.)

Reply to Mr Akhil Chandra Datta's starred question No. 255 regarding the Congress (Independence) Pledge.

The Honourable Sir Reginald Maxwell:

- (a) The pledge first came to notice in January 1930. But different versions have been current at different times.
- (b) It was not then formally proscribed. But that does not mean that Government regarded its wordings as legitimate.
- (c) In 1934 and again in 1937.
- (d) Government had information in 1937 that it was intended to revive the pledge in its original form.

- (e) By the legal advisers of Government.
- (f) I have been unable to make the researches necessary to answer these parts of the question
- (g) since the information would have to be obtained from the Provincial Governments.
- (h) Independence Day celebrations have been prevented only on the grounds that the pledge contained seditious language or that they were calculated to assist the operations of an unlawful association.

Supplementaries to question No. 255 replied on 26-2-44.

Mr Akhil Chindra Datta: May I know whether the pledge taken as a whole is seditious or any particular portion of it?

The Honourable Sir Reginald Maxwell: Part of the language used is seditious.

Mr T. T. Krishnamachari: With reference to part (d) of his answer, am I right in understanding the Honourable Member to say that the last occasion when legal opinion was obtained was in 1937 and whether he is aware that in 1938 the pledge was redrafted?

The Honourable Sir Reginald Maxwell: I have said that different versions were current at different times.

Pundit Lakshmi Kanta Maitra: Where did the Government get the official version of the Congress pledge did they seek for it?

The Honourable Sir Reginald Maxwell: Government have their own ways of getting information.

Pandit Lakshmi Kanta Maitra: I want to know whether the Honourable Member's Department relied solely on press reports or they cared to ascertain from the Congress what the independence pledge was.

Supplementaries to Question No. 293 in the Legislative Assembly dated the 2nd March 1944

Mr K. C. Neogy: I do not know whether the Honourable Member has meant his statement to cover the second part of part (a) of my question; that is to say, when this legal advice was taken by Government and who were the legal authorities who gave the opinion?

The Hon'ble Sir Reginald Maxwell: I answered the question of when, in answer to part (c) of Mr Datta's question on the 26th February.

Mr K. C. Neogy: Who are the legal authorities?

The Hon'ble Sir Reginald Maxwell: It is not the practice of Government to disclose the legal authorities from whom they receive advice or to make public the advice which they receive.

Mr K. C. Neogy: When was this advice obtained and first acted upon by way of prosecution or anything like that?

The Hon'ble Sir Reginald Maxwell: I answered that question in reply to supplementaries on the last occasion.

Sardar Sant Singh: May I know if this Congress pledge being a seditious document was a discovery or an invention?

Ouster of Jurisdiction of High Court
Ordinance III of 1944.

Validity of Saving Provisions Questioned

Calcutta, February 15 – The validity of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance (Ordinance III of 1944) relating to ouster of the jurisdiction of the High Courts challenged before the Calcutta High Court in connection with a rule obtained by 176 security prisoners from the Dacca Central Jail in the nature of habeas corpus against orders of detention passed under Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules.¹

Before the Chief Justice and Mr Justice Lodge, counsel for the detenus questioned the validity of the provisions of Section 10 (1) and (2) of the Ordinance which 'Inter alia' stated that orders passed under the Ordinance could not be called in question by any court and no court should grant any relief under section 491, Cr. P.C., and that all pending rule under Section 491, should be discharged. He argued that Section 10 of the Ordinance was a total ouster of the superior Court of records and this could only be effected by express language and the language must be the language of an Act of parliament. Under the purported exercise of granting certain executive powers to certain authority, the Ordinance in Section 10 (1) and (2) had attempted to deprive, amongst other objects, the chartered High Courts of certain powers vested in them and in the judges by Royal Charter, letters patent and Imperial Statutes.

Hearing of the rules has not concluded. – A.P.I.

Official Comments

The following is the text of section 10 (1) and (2) of the Ordinance No. III promulgated on January 15, 1944, empowering the Central Government and the Provincial Governments and any officer or authority to whom the Central Government or the Provincial Government may delegate its powers in this behalf to restrict the movements and actions of and to place in detention and detain certain persons, to regulate the exercise of these powers and the duration of orders made in such exercise and to confirm the validity of the past exercise of such powers under Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules.

Saving as to orders. – (1) No order made under this Ordinance, and no order having effect by virtue of section 6 as if it had been made under this Ordinance, shall be called in question in any Court, and no Court shall have power to make any order under Section 491 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1893 (V of 1898), in respect of any order made under of having effect under this Ordinance, or in respect of any person the subject of such an order.

(2) If at the commencement of this Ordinance there is pending in any Court any proceeding by which the validity of an order having effect by virtue of Section 6 as if it had been made under this Ordinance is called in question that proceeding is hereby discharged.

Defence Department

Legislative Department may see as suggested by D.S. It may, however, be mentioned that H.D. No. 44/57/43 - Poll (I) dated 3.12.43. Letter circulating the draft of the Detention and Restriction Ordinance to Provinces recognised that Section 10 of this Ordinance is not likely to be any more effective than Section 16 Sec. 491 of C of Cr. Procedure (This letter was, perhaps, seen by leg. Deptt.) such being the position, it seems we have only to wait and see what the High Court say about it.

On inquiry in the Federal Court I understand that appeal relating to Ordinance III of 1944 from the decision of the Patna High Court is received today by the Federal Court Office. There is no other case in the Federal Court relating to this Ordinance. Mr Mitra had in mind an appeal relating to another Ordinance – No. XXIX of 1943–which is coming on for hearing on the 14th inst.

In connection with the appeal re: Ordinance III of 1944, of which we expect to receive notice in due course, we shall be obliged if the Defence Department will supply us with three spare copies of the judgment of the Calcutta High Court which will be required for the use of our Counsel in the case.

181: Official Notings regarding legal advice to security prisoners (dt 28.2.1944-2.3.1944) (extracts)

[NAI]

Discussion about the point whether security prisoners should be allowed legal advice for preparing their representation and the drafting of Clause 11 of Ordinance III as recorded on our F. 44/57/43 - Poll (I) may be seen.¹ Mr Bartley's note of 22-10-43² answers 'A' of Additional Secy.'s note dated 25-2-44.³

28.2.44.

From the wording of the proviso to section 11 (2) of the Ordinance, and from the terms of Mr Bartley's note of 22.10.43, I am inclined to think that Mr Bartley himself had in mind the permitting of consultation by security prisoners with legal advisers before making their representations under section 7. That this conflicts with the clear view to the contrary expressed in Additional Secretary's note of 25.8.43¹ appears subsequently to have passed unnoticed. Subject to what provinces may have to say in reply to our telegram at serial No. 3. I think there is little doubt that we must abide by the views expressed by Additional Secretary and H M at page 1 ante. We may have some difficulty in doing so, since the obvious inference from the proviso as at present worded is that it was the intention for such interviews to be allowed. An arguable alternative application of the proviso, which is needed if it is to have any meaning at all, seems to me to exist in that in any legitimate legal proceedings e.g. habeas corpus proceedings, where an interview with a legal adviser had been granted in accordance with our rules, the proviso would serve to allow him to show to his legal adviser the grounds of detention communicated and his representation in reply -- matters which might legitimately be used by the counsel for appreciating and preparing the case, though subsequent reference to them in Court would be prohibited.

I see no conflict between Mr Bartley's view and the Additional Secretary's view on p. 1.³ Do Leg. Department agree that the effect of the proviso merely is to permit a detenu to make disclosures to his Lawyer when Government permitted such consultation and not otherwise, and that its effect is not to confer a right on detenus to consult lawyers in respect of representations.

Forms of communication of reason for detention as suggested by Government of India in letter No. 44/57/43 – Poll (I) dated 3rd December 1943 are simply bald statements unsupported by evidence and replies where given are likely to be equally bald denials requiring no legal assistance. This Government are arranging interviews with each DETENU by the Divisional Commissioner and Deputy Inspector-General of Police and consider this will be best method of recognising at fair assessment prisoner's case and of hearing what he has to say. This Government deprecate non-official Committee lest they be subjected to pressure.

Your Circular telegrams Nos 2196¹ and 2197¹ regarding Security prisoners.

1. Governor strongly opposes suggestion for interview with legal advisers which are not at present allowed. Whatever might be precautions taken or undertakings given such interviews would establish dangerous contact between Detenus and outside sympathisers and would give excellent material for anti – Government publicity. Further in Governor's view interviews unnecessary from point of view of Detenus as no questions of law arise and replies will deal solely with questions of fact.

2. Governor is equally opposed to appointment of Advisory Committees either official or non official. Official Committee would carry no weight and since all cases are now considered by Home Secretary, Adviser and Governor himself official Committee would provide no better machinery than exists at present.

3. Appointment of non-official Committee Governor considers quite out of the question. Any non-official Committee which would examine these cases dispassionately would be regarded as packed and would not carry slightest weight virtually while much of material on which detention of prisoners is justified could not be placed before non-officials. Governor has already indicated his reasons for opposing placing of Bajinath case before even a selected High Court Judge. Those reasons apply a fortiori to present proposal.

4. As a matter of administration the work involved in examining replies of over 1200 security prisoners is already very heavy indeed and would be greatly increased by adding any Committee to present machinery.

5. The grounds and justification for (group corrupt-detention?) and continued detention are most carefully examined under present system. A very large number of Detenus have been released and position of those in detention is constantly under review. None will remain in the detention save those whose detention is not merely desirable but necessary and Governor deprecates entertainment of suggestions such as these designed to make task of executive in maintaining good Government in critical stage of war more difficult.

Government of India,
Home Department.

New Delhi, the 4th March 1944.

My dear Priestley/etc.

We have recently experienced some difficulty in dealing with questions in the Legislature which referred to certain petitions from Central Government security prisoners detained in a Provincial Jail which, although addressed to the Central Government, were – in accordance with the Provincial Security Prisoners Rules on the subject – withheld by the Provincial Government concerned.¹ Provincial Governments Security Prisoners Rules vary in their provisions regarding the forwarding of petitions from security prisoners; in most cases, it is laid down that petitions should be forwarded to Government unless couched in objectionable terms, when they may be withheld or destroyed, the security prisoner concerned being informed. We have no wish to interfere in the practice already obtaining as far as Provincial security prisoners are concerned. We consider it essential, however, in the case of any Central Government security prisoners that may be detained in the Province, that any petition addressed to the Central Government or to a Member of the Government of India should be forwarded without delay to this Department regardless of its contents; you will doubtless at the same time add such comments as you may consider necessary or appropriate.

2. We are not aware what your practice is in respect of petitions addressed by your security prisoners to the High Court. In view of the recent judgment of the Lahore High Court in the case Criminal Miscellaneous No. 796 of 1943, which has doubtless come to your notice, we would suggest that it would be desirable for any petition addressed by a security prisoner in the Province to the High Court to be forwarded without delay to the Court, again regardless of its contents. We should, in any case, be glad if this course could be adopted in the case of any Central Government security prisoners detained in the Province, copies of any such petitions being at the same time forwarded to us for information.

Yours sincerely,
(R. Tottenham).

Your telegram No. 2196 dated February 26th¹ Legal interviews. Provincial Government is advised that proviso to section 11 (2) ordinance III by implication permits (gr omitted) Detenu's legal adviser. Even otherwise Provincial Government considers that interviews with legal advisers should be permitted on the analogy of practice adopted in respect of Habeas corpus applications.

2. Madras Government have taken the view that the proviso to section 11 (2) of the Ordinance raised the presumption that it was our intention that interviews should be permitted for the purpose of preparing representations and have proceeded accordingly.¹ I understand from Mr Mellor that C.C., Delhi, has taken the same view and allowed interviews in one or two cases; I have asked that orders in applications for interview pending with C.C., Delhi, should be held up until our policy decision is communicated to them. The remaining Provincial replies received are unanimous in opposing the grant of such interviews as a matter of principle. We did not in our telegram at serial No. 3² refer specifically to the proviso to section 11(2) of the Ordinance and I am doubtful whether the majority of Provinces in replying have considered this proviso and its implications.³ However, we are concerned at present with policy and the legal aspect need not concern us further in view of Legislative Department's note of 12-3-44.⁴ I think we can at this stage safely say that Provincial Governments are predominantly opposed to interviews being given in these circumstances; we may accept this view and communicate it to Provincial Governments.

3. I have separately reminded the outstanding Provinces.

I think it would be advisable to send an interim reply to Madras saying that all replies so far received to our telegram (except theirs) are opposed to the grant of interviews with legal advisers for the purpose of preparing representations and pointing out that we are advised that 11 (2) of the ordinance confers no kind of right to such interviews for that purpose.

[NAI]

In connection with notices served on detenus under section 7 of Ordinance III of 1944, two papers in Nagpur, namely, the 'Hitavada' and the 'Nagpur Times' published summaries of the grounds of detention served on detenus in Jubbulpore Jail. Written warnings on this subject had been conveyed about a week earlier to all editors in Nagpur, and, through District press Advisers, to the rest of the provincial Press. The provisions of section II of the Ordinance were also explained to the Provincial Press Advisory Committee at the end of last month. Prosecutions were, therefore, immediately launched against the Editors of the two papers and others who were concerned in publishing or disclosing the contents of the notices. The leakage was probably through a detenu who was released from the Jubalpure Jail. Evidence, on which a prosecution could be based against him was not, however, forthcoming. A number of representations have already been received in response to the notices. The tenor of several of them is that the grounds stated are not sufficiently precise, the August 1942 disturbance were the result of arrest of Congress leaders, and as Congress leaders and the detenus themselves were arrested almost immediately after the passing of the resolution no mass movement could have been initiated by them. One 'die-hard' refused to accept notice and replied that he is not interested in the grounds of this detention. Another said that as he cannot express himself properly in writing he should be heard in person. It is hoped to pass orders on the representations early next month by which time all those who wish to reply would have done so and orders would also have been passed on preliminary points which have been raised by some of the detenus.

Dated the 8th March, 1944

Subject: Question of allowing security prisoners to interview legal advisers for framing representations in reply to communications under section 7 of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance, Reference: Government of India, Home Department telegram No. 2196–Circular dated 26.2.44.'

The proposal under reference appears to be open to serious objection on grounds of principle and expedience.

2. The question of legal advice can only arise in cases where a remedy at law is available. In view of section 10 of the Ordinance which expressly removes orders made thereunder from the purview of Courts of law, no claim for legal advice in framing representations against such orders should in our view be recognised. The acceptance of such a claim would make it impossible to resist demands for legal advice in framing any other kind of representations or petitions in respect of any supposed grievance, claim or request which security prisoners may wish to address to Government.

3. The forms adopted by the Government of India and Provincial Governments (including Bengal) for the communication of the grounds of detention under section 7 of the Ordinance necessarily state the grounds in general terms without mentioning details of the information on which the allegations are based. A prisoner making a representation against such a communication can only admit or deny the allegations or make an attempt to explain them away. In no case can legal advice be considered necessary for the drafting. To make special arrangements for legal interviews for such purposes would, in view of the large numbers we have found it necessary to detain, merely add enormously to the strain of our already overstrained security organisation.

4. Though we shall continue, as hitherto, to give to security prisoners facilities for interviews with legal advisers for all reasonable purposes, we do not propose to make a specific rule to allow interviews with legal advisers for the purpose of framing representations under section 7 of the Ordinance.

[NAI]

The sense of Provincial Governments' replies is clearly opposed to the granting of interviews for the purpose of framing representations under section 7 of Ordinance III and indeed the only ground on which it seems possible to defend such interviews at all is on the view, taken by Madras, C.P. (and Delhi) – but controverted by Legislative Department – that the proviso to section 11 (2) of the Ordinance conveys or implies a right to such interviews. Neither Assam nor Onssa, who express themselves mildly in favour of such interviews show any signs of having considered the question at all deeply or advanced any reasons for their views.

2. Our view, based both on the advice of Legislative Department (page 7 ante) and on the objection in principle pointed out by Provincial Governments of which the chief are

- (a) The opportunity for illicit communication and the danger of relaxation in security afforded by such interviews and
- (b) The fact that proceedings under section 7 of the Ordinance cannot be called legal proceedings in the full sense of the word and that the representation being framed regard to matters of fact and not of law, legal advice is not necessary, must clearly be opposed to the granting of such interviews. It is for orders, however, whether we are to treat this as a matter of principle in which we ask Provinces to follow our lead, or whether we should leave it to their discretion, pointing out what we conceive to be the correct legal position and stating the reasons of policy for the view we propose to adopt. If the former course were adopted, we should not I think meet any considerable opposition from any Provincial Government, once the legal issue were cleared.

3. A further point arises from the two letters from security prisoners Arobindo and Dwijendra Bose submitted for orders on the linked files No. 44/8/44 – Poll (I) and 44/51/44 Poll (I).¹ In these letters, the security prisoners in question contend that Satish Chandra Bose, their father/uncle, is their legal adviser; they propose, therefore communicating to him by letter the grounds of their detention and seeking his advice. It seems clear enough that such an action attracts the proviso to section 11 (2) of the Ordinance and is not therefore legally barred. Since it is correspondence between a security prisoner and a near relative on what must, I think, be held to be a family matter, it is also permissible under the Security Prisoners Order. It seems to me that if our decision is against allowing interviews with legal advisers, we should equally oppose any such correspondence with legal advisers, but it is not very clear what formal grounds we can advance for this decision. Rule 13 (4) of the Central Government Security Prisoners Order gives discretion to withhold any communication likely to be detrimental to the public interest or safety and might be held to justify refusal to deliver these letters. As far as the principle is concerned, the objection at (a) above does not of course apply, but that at (b) does. This point also is for orders.

14.3.44

If one Province permits interviews with legal advisers, the position of those who don't wish become invidious & we should I think consider it a matter of principle and ask for uniformity.

2. Para 3 Mr Olvers' note, I think communicating with the lawyer, even though he may be the uncle or father should logically be disallowed – Rule 13 (4) will cover the case.

Will H.M. please see the noting extracted at page 1 of the notes on this file and the Flag 'B' Summary of replies received to our p. 3/cor. telegram of February 25th.

I think we should decide not to allow interviews with legal advisers for the purpose of preparing representations under Ordinance No. III, so far as our own security prisoners are concerned. I think we should also inform Provincial Governments accordingly and ask those who have started the practice of allowing such interviews to discontinue it if possible. I have no doubt myself that the correct interpretation of the proviso to section 11 of Ordinance No. III is that given at 'A' in Under Secretary's note of the 29th of February.² This might be explained to Provincial Governments. I do not think that disclosure to near relatives by means of correspondence would be protected by the Security prisoners Order. The representation is a matter between the person detained and the executive authority that detained him. We have already urged Provincial Governments to enforce section 11 and, as H.M. is aware, the C.P. Government is already prosecuting the Hitavada for a breach of that section. I agree that the main object is to prevent publicity for these representations, but even if near relatives were allowed to see them, but not allowed to publish them, there would be the beginning of the trouble.

Applications from individual Central Security Prisoners which raise this point will be settled in the light of H.M.'s orders.

Additional Secretary.

I agree generally with Additional Secretary. I think we should explain the legal position and dismiss the idea that the proviso was intended to create a right to interviews for purpose of these representations or to override the Security Prisoners order. But we cannot forbid provinces to allow such interviews since it rests with them to determine the manner in which representations shall be dealt with and considered. On the whole however it would be better if procedure everywhere follow the majority practice.

The Bihar procedures for interviews seems good and might be brought to notice.

Sir,
Security prisoners - Representation against grounds of detention - legal assistance - Home Department Serial No. 21. Telegram No. 3175, dated 22-3-1944.¹

In the telegram cited above the Government of India-

- (a) Point out that the proviso to section 11(2) of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance, 1944, was only intended to allow security prisoners to show any communication made to them under section 7 to their legal advisers for preparation of cases, for instance in Habeas Corpus proceedings,
- (b) Interpret the proviso as clearly creating no right to legal advice for framing representations and as not overriding the provisions of Security Prisoners Order regarding legal interviews,
- (c) Consider that following the practice adopted by the majority of Provinces interviews between the security prisoners and legal advisers should be prohibited, and
- (d) That correspondence between security prisoners and legal advisers should be prohibited.

2. It is observed that paragraph 11 (10) (b) of the Central Government Security Prisoners Order, 1944, allows a security prisoner to interview his legal adviser in connection with a legal proceeding to which he is, or will be, a party. The Government of Madras find it difficult to confine the meaning of the expression 'legal proceeding' to a proceeding taken in a regular court of law. Section 7 of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance, 1944, specifically gives a detenu the right to make a representation against the grounds of his detention and the authorities concerned are bound to afford him the earliest practical opportunity of doing so. The various proceedings under the Ordinance, which involve the liberties of the subject are evidently not purely of an administrative character. In the opinion of the Government of Madras, it would be a very narrow interpretation of the language to regard these as not being legal proceedings merely for the reason that the authorities by or before whom such proceedings are taken are not regular courts.

3. The proviso to section 11 (2) of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance, 1944 definitely contemplates and authorizes the disclosure by the person detained of the contents of the communication of grounds to his legal adviser. There is necessarily presupposes the availability of a legal adviser for advising on a matter in regard to which the grounds of detention are relevant. If the preparation of the representation is excluded from this category, it is difficult to imagine any proceedings to which the grounds of detention can be relevant, for an order of detention cannot be called in question in any court and all pending proceedings in which such an order is called in question are automatically discharged under section 10 (1) and (2) of the Ordinance.

4. The Government of India point out that the proviso refers to the preparation of a case in Habeas Corpus proceedings. The only such proceedings recognised by the law in this country are those under section 491 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and section 10 (1) of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance, 1944 specifically lays down that courts have no power to make any order under section 491 Criminal Procedure Code in respect of an order made, or having effect, under the Ordinance. The preparation of a case in Habeas Corpus proceedings in respect of an order of detention is thus rendered entirely futile by section 10 (1) of the Ordinance and it is difficult to believe anyone would take the trouble of preparing such a case. The Government of India's reference to the proviso to section 11 (2) as intended for Habeas Corpus proceedings appears therefore to be based on an erroneous interpretation.

5. In the circumstances stated in the foregoing paragraphs I am directed to say that the Government of Madras would prefer, so far at least as their own security prisoners are concerned, to adhere to the existing practice according to which under a formal order issued on the 10th February 1944 those prisoners are given all reasonable facilities of correspondence to obtain legal advice in making their representations and are allowed one interview with their legal advisers for the purpose.

Your obedient servant,

Chief Secretary.

No. 44/90/43 - Poll (I)

New Delhi, the 3rd April 1944.

Our attention has been drawn to the judgment of the Sessions judge, Gorakhpur, United Provinces, in the case Shibban Lal vs. King Emperor holding that the United Provinces Government was not competent to make an order under Defence Rule 26 (1) (c) forbidding the appellant to 'enter or reside in any district of the Gorakhpur and Benares Divisions.'

2. Without entering into detail, the decision of the Court may be described as based on the proposition that clause (c) of sub-rule (1) of Defence Rule 26, the wording of which must be strictly interpreted, provided power to prohibit a person from being in a certain or place but not from entering it.

3. Defence Rule 26 being in abeyance, all orders of externment will now be made under the corresponding clause (c) of sub-section (1) of section 3 of the Restriction and detention Ordinance (Ordinance III of 1944), while any existing orders under Defence Rule 26 (1) (c) remain valid by virtue of section 6 of the Ordinance. Clause (c) of sub-section (1) section 3 of the Ordinance repeats the exact wording of Defence Rule 26 (1) (c), however, and the argument reproduced above applies equally to externment orders made or validated under the Ordinance. We consider it important, therefore, that future orders of externment should follow closely the exact wording of the clause, that is to say, that they should prohibit the person concerned from 'being' in the area of place in question. Such an order will, of course, be equally effective in preventing him from entering the area or place, since immediately he has entered it, he is in it and has, therefore, contravened the order. We consider further that the wording of any existing externment orders should be reviewed and that any orders vitiated, on the view taken in the judgment referred to above, should be replaced by fresh orders in the terms recommended.

A draft reply is enclosed. Action is being taken to verify the classification ordered on the third conviction of the prisoner in question, and this information will be furnished as soon as it is obtained.

The prisoner has been transferred in the ordinary course to serve his sentences in a jail in the Punjab, but no information is available here to show in what particular jail he is at present detained or in which category he is actually being treated.

I will consider the question of classification further as soon as the full facts have been collected, but in the meantime the reply proposed to part (d) of the question appears appropriate.

(If it is correct that the second conviction has been set aside in the High Court, then the proper classification for the prisoner now would seem prima facie to be 'Civil Disobedience 1942' and it is probable that the jail authorities in the Punjab have already acted accordingly).

dismissed by the Sessions judge, Delhi, on the 3rd September 1943; appeal to the High Court at Lahore dismissed in March 1944.

Classified, at the time of this conviction, as a 'Civil Disobedience 1942' prisoner.

- (ii) On the 27th January 1943, by the same magistrate, on charges under sections 148/436 I.P.C. and Defence Rule 35. Sentenced to two years rigorous imprisonment. Appeal rejected by the Sessions judge on the 7th September 1943. A report has appeared in the press to the effect that an appeal against this conviction was accepted in the High Court at Lahore on the 11th March 1944, but no intimation to this effect has yet been received by the Courts in Delhi.

The offence being one involving violence, the convicted person was not given the 'Civil Disobedience 1942' classification but was ordered to be treated as a prisoner in the ordinary 'C' class.

- (iii) Convicted again on the 22nd April 1943 on a charge under section 52 of the Prisoners Act 1894 and sentenced to five years rigorous imprisonment.

It has not been possible, at short notice, to verify the classification made on this occasion, but it was probably 'C'.

- (c) Yes.
- (d) If the prisoner seeks to have his classification changed the relevant rules allow him to submit a revision application through the Superintendent of the jail in which he is confined to the local Administration.

File No. 22/61/44 – Home Poll (I)

I spoke to Mr Mellor about this (Krishna Nair's) case yesterday. He said that they had not received our letter of 27-3-44 and a copy was therefore sent yesterday evening by hand to which he has promised us a reply today.

2. Meanwhile, I put up a draft reply based on the information given in serial No. 1 of file No. 3/32/43 – Poll (I) below, supplemented by what I was able to gather about the case from Mr Mellor on the telephone.

3. I understand that Krishna Nair was in fact convicted in the Gheora case (number (ii) of Mr Askwith's letter referred to above) in the lower court but finally acquitted on appeal or revision in the High Court. He is now apparently serving a sentence for contravention of one of the provisions of a restriction order to which he was subjected. In accordance with the Punjab orders an extract of which is at appendix to notes he is believed to be placed in the Special class reserved for persons convicted or detained in connection with the Congress movement.¹

4. An alternative reply to parts (a) and (b) would be 'No' and 'Does not arise' but this would doubtless give rise to supplementaries and it may be desirable to give rather fuller reply drafted.

The reply is for approval. We have to accept the principle that Delhi prisoners confined in Punjab jails are governed by Punjab Jail rules.

Further information has been received from C.C., Delhi,² regarding the question for tomorrow about Krishna Nair. It appears that persons convicted of crimes of violence in connection with the Congress Rebellion (as Krishna Nair was in the railway station case) are placed in Class 'C'. Krishna Nair has recently, according to Press reports, been acquitted by the Lahore High Court on appeal in that case; but he is still serving a sentence for contravention or restriction order or something of that kind.

2. For such an offence he would apparently be entitled to Special class of treatment and has the right to appeal for such treatment. We have no information that he has been re classified, but that the Delhi authorities assume that this will be done if it has not already been done.

3. The answer to the different parts of the question I think (a), (b) and (d) might be —

'In accordance with the practice under the Punjab rules, Mr Krishna Nair, who was convicted of a crime of violence in connection with the August disturbances, was placed in Class "C". His conviction in that case is reported to have been upset on appeal, quite recently, but he is still serving a sentence for a less serious offence in respect of which he would be entitled to special class treatment. The question of his re-classification will certainly be considered, if it has not been revised already.'

4. The portion referring to his classification on a previous occasion will also require alteration. The information is that on that occasion he was placed in Class 'B'.

The Question, is down for meeting on the 5.4.1944.

811. Sardar Mangal Singh: Will the Honourable the Home Member please state.

- (a) Whether it is a fact that Mr Krishna Nair, a civil disobedience prisoner of 1942 from Delhi, is being treated as a non-political 'C' Class prisoner in the Lyallpur District Jail;
- (b) By whom his classification as a non-political 'C' Class prisoner was made; Whether it is a fact that during the last Satyagraha movement he was placed in the 'B' Class; and
- (d) Whether Government will reconsider his case and put him in a better class as a political prisoner?

Legislative Assembly

On. No. 811.

(To be answered on the 5th April 1944)

Reply to Sardar Mangal Singh's starred question No. 811 regarding Mr Krishna Nair.

The Honourable Sir John Thorne:

(a), (b) and (d). In accordance with the practice under the Punjab rules, Mr Krishnan Nair, who was convicted of a crime of violence in connection with the August disturbances, was placed in Class 'C'. His conviction in that case is reported to have been upset on appeal quite recently, but he is still serving a sentence for a less serious offence in respect of which he would under the Punjab rules be treated as 'special class.' The question of his re-classification will certainly be considered, if this has not already been effected.

(c). I believe this is correct.

The Japanese broadcasts have of course been making much of the invasion, and particularly Subhas Chandra Bose, who appeals to India for another rising like that of August 1942. The news of the invasion is reported to have been welcome among some of those detained in the jails of the province and among a section of the students. The calls for a repetition of the sabotage and arson of 1942 unfortunately coincide with a spate of acquittals and reduction of sentences in cases connected with the 1942 disturbances, which has had an encouraging effect on the subversive elements and a somewhat depressing effect on the police.

Government's defeat in the Central Assembly¹ in regard to Pandit Laxmikant Maitra's cut motion to censure the abuse of powers under the Defence of India Act and Rules was noticed by a few papers which adversely commented upon the official policy in the matter. The Bombay Chronicle wrote:

The Home Member failed miserably in his attempts to explain or condone them (i.e., instances of misuse). . . . The reviewing of cases by practically the very persons who had before approved of detention without trial is a worthless substitute for an examination by Independent advisory bodies. . . . But it is no use arguing with people who are constitutionally irresponsible.

The Nutan Gujarat observed:

The agony of the people has been expressed in the resolution and it has echoed the resentment not of the one or the other section of the people but of the whole of India. The enforcement of the Act has virtually set up an outright police-raj in the country. If Government fails to pay heed to the underlying meaning of the protest, then the present feeling of bitterness between the people and the Government will, without doubt, develop into a feeling of acute animosity.

Political: The work of reviewing detention orders under the Restriction and Detention Ordinance is now in progress. Sufficient time has elapsed for all those who wanted to reply to do so. The upper strata of Congress leaders who were arrested in the first few days of the movement as a preventive measure have so far maintained disdainful silence and it seems clear that they do not propose to make any representations. The very few who have bothered to reply have taken the familiar line that the All India Congress Committee resolution did not itself originate a movement, that a civil disobedience campaign was contingent on the failure of Mr Gandhi's approaches to the Viceroy and that it is a perversion of truth to say that the resolution tended to impede the successful prosecution of the war. Those security prisoners who are charged with having assisted underground organisations or taken part in sabotage activities have protested that the notices are very vague and have asked for particulars of offences which they are supposed to have committed; in the meanwhile they hotly deny the official charges. Experience upto now has unfortunately revealed that the Ordinance has achieved nothing which could not have been done just as well by merely executive instructions, and it is in fact clear that by raising hopes which have not been fulfilled the Ordinance has given rise to a feeling, among security prisoners and their friends, that it is something of a fraud dressed up in liberal language.

Sir,

With reference to paragraph 2 of the above telegram, I am directed to say it is considered that the adoption of the Bihar practice in Assam would be unprofitable and extremely laborious, in present transport condition especially as there is only one Commissioner and one D.I.G. 217: Summary of replies from the provinces

File No. 44/32/44 – Home Poll (I)

Summary of replies to our telegram of 25-2-44.¹

Madras – Proviso to Section 11 (2) of Ordinance III implies that legal advice is permissible and is already being allowed, to those who desire it.

Bengal – Are opposed to permitting legal advice on grounds of principle and expediency and if legal advice arises only when a remedy at law is available (Section 10 of Ordinance III) and permission in such cases would set up a precedent for similar demands for legal advice in framing all sorts of representations. Communications may state the grounds of detention in general terms and a prisoner is only to admit, deny or explain them away and no legal advice is necessary. Number of prisoners being large such interviews would add to strain on security organisation.

U.P. – Opposed to any such interviews from security point of view and because replies would deal with questions of fact and no points of law are involved.

Punjab – Strongly opposed to granting interviews as legal advice in matter of fact is not necessary.

Bihar – Reasons for detention communicated are bald statements unsupported by evidence and replies are likely to be bald denials for which legal advice is not required. Divisional Commissioner and D.I.G. Police will be interviewing prisoners to hear their cases.

C.P. & Berar – Provincial Government are advised that proviso to section 11 (2) implies such interviews which may be allowed. Even otherwise Provincial Government considers interviews should be permitted on analogy of practice adopted in respect of habeas corpus application subjected to precautions.

Assam – No objection,

N.W.F.P. – No request for such interviews received nor do Provincial Government consider the concession necessary.

Orissa – Provincial Government see no objection to allowing one such interview in each case.

Sind – Have not permitted legal advice for this purpose and are opposed to such permission being granted.

218: Official Notings (extracts) (6.4.44–14.4.44) (legal advice question)

... I am still inclined to the view expressed in my note of 29-2-44¹ that the proviso to section 11 (2) of the Ordinance as drafted by Mr Bartley does represent a certain divergence from the views expressed by Additional Secretary and H.M. in their notes of 25/26-8-43². Although the explanation of the proviso given in our telegram of 21-3-44³ is not quite so stupid as Madras make out in para 4 of their letter,⁴ since they have failed to take into account the fact that habeas corpus proceedings can still be taken in respect of an order which the Court considers was not made in good faith under the Ordinance, it is nevertheless I think a somewhat strained interpretation. While agreeing that the proviso confers no right to any interview, I would suggest that it does raise a distinct presumption that Government's intention was to grant such interviews.

2. The only way that I can see of making the position absolutely clear would be to delete the proviso altogether. In view of the provision in sub-section (2) enabling the Central or provincial Government to authorize disclosure where necessary, I am doubtful whether the proviso serves any really useful purpose. The number of cases in which the proviso would be likely to operate is clearly very small and there would be no difficulty in the Government concerned giving ad hoc permission for disclosure in such cases. I would be inclined to recommend therefore that, along with the amendments under consideration in the linked file No. 44/23/44 – Poll (I), we should delete the proviso to section 11 (2) of the Ordinance

I disagree with the conclusions in para 1 of Mr Olver's note but agree that would be better to delete the proviso in question.

6.4.44.

I think we should certainly disabuse the Madras Government of this idea — which seems to me to be clearly incorrect — that proceedings under Ordinance III are ‘Legal Proceedings’ without the meaning of that term as used in the security prisoners orders.

2. I also think that we should disabuse them of the idea that the specific intention of 491 CPC in 10 precludes habeas Corpus applications altogether — pointing out that old DR 26 read with Rule 16 of the D-Act had practically the same effect as Rule 10 and that nothing can prevent habeas Corpus applications in respect of orders alleged not to have been made, but only to have been made, under the ordinance.

3. Whether the proviso to Rule 11 is really necessary is a moot point — on which we should like to have the opinion of the Legal Department. I think we could get on without it — but I must say my inclination is to leave it as it stands.

7.4.44.

I have no doubt that the consideration by Government under section 8 or section 9 of the Ordinance of any representation that may be made by a security prisoner against his detention is not a legal proceeding within the meaning of clause 11 (10) (b) (quoted at A in FR. of the Central Government Security Prisoners Order. The expression ‘legal proceeding’ usually means a proceeding regulated or prescribed by law in which a judicial decision may or must be given; in other words, a proceeding in a court of justice where a party pursues a remedy which the law affords him — Vide the Law Lexicon of British India under ‘Legal Proceeding.’

2. I agree generally with the second paragraph of Sir R. Tottenham’s note. Since the Home Department consider that interviews with legal advisers should not be permitted for the purpose of preparing representations under the Ordinance and so far as other purposes are concerned disclosures to a legal adviser could be specially authorized by Government under section 11 (2) the proviso is not essential. It certainly gives a layman the erroneous impression that Government will permit the employment of a legal adviser for the purpose of preparing representations to Government and its deletion will no doubt be criticised on the ground that a valuable privilege conferred on the detenus in January last has subsequently been withdrawn. I think therefore that it will be expedient to leave it in for what it is worth.

K. Sundaram
Dy. Secy.
11.4.44.

On the ‘legal proceeding’ point the Madras Government are, in my judgment, clearly wrong, but I see no prospect of convincing them. If, therefore, Home Department desire to preclude the possibility of the relevant paragraph under the Security Prisoners Order being applied on the footing that action in accordance with sections 7–9 of the Ordinance involves a legal proceeding, they might, I suggest, amend the relevant paragraph by substituting e.g., ‘a proceeding in a court of law’ for ‘a legal proceeding.’

2. I cannot myself see any rational foundation for the impression referred to at A in Mr Sundaram’s note, though the correspondence shows that a number of ostensibly intelligent people have in fact derived that impression.

3. With reference to paragraph 2 of Sir Richard Tottenham’s note, Press reports of sundry cases decided since the commencement of Ordinance III indicate that High Court have in fact regarded section 10 of the Ordinance as effective to applications under section 491 of the Code in a manner in which section 10 of the Defence of India Rules was not so effective, and the point made by Sir Richard Tottenham should not, I suggest, be stressed. For the purposes of the present controversy nothing turns on the appositeness of the Home Department reference to habeas corpus applications, which was in term purely illustrative.

4. I think that the omission of the proviso to sub-section (2) of section 11 is to be deprecated not only on publicity grounds but also on the merits. It is inherently right that sub-section (2) of section 11 should not hit disclosures by a detenu to his legal adviser and the detenu should not be placed under the necessity of obtaining a previous authorization to make such disclosures.

12.4.44.

I think it might be worth making the amendment suggested by Sir George Spence in our Security Prisoners Order and if agreed I will take this up separately. I put up a draft reply to Madras based on this assumption.

Express Letter

From Home, New Delhi.

To
The Chief Secretary to the Government of Madras, Madras.

No. 44/32/44 – Poll (I):

New Delhi, the 15th April 1944.

Your letter No. S/143–4/44, dated 1st April, 1944, regarding legal assistance for security prisoners in the preparation of representations under section 7 of Ordinance No. III of 1944.¹

2. We do not accept your view that proceedings under section 7 of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance constitute 'Legal proceeding.' It seems to us sufficiently clear that this term must be held to refer to a proceeding regulated or prescribed by law in which a judicial decision may or must be given, and, of course no question of a judicial decision arises under section 7. In order to set the matter beyond doubt, we propose amending the relevant provision of the Central Government Security Prisoners Order, 1944, and to substitute for the term 'legal proceeding' in paragraph 11 (10) (b) of the Order the phrase 'proceeding in a court of law.'

3. Our object in drafting the proviso to section 11 (2) of the Ordinance was to provide that, in any legal proceedings of the nature described in the proceeding paragraph where security prisoner took legal advice, discussion between the security prisoner and his legal adviser of any communication received or representation made by him under section 7 of the Ordinance should not be precluded. An illustration of the possible nature of such proceedings was given in the reference in our telegram of March 22nd to 'habeas corpus' proceedings, and we would observe that despite the provisions of section 10 of the Ordinance to which you draw attention the courts may still hold that they are competent to entertain habeas corpus proceedings in certain circumstances, for example, when it is alleged that the order of detention only purported to have been made under the Ordinance and was not in fact so made.

4. As already stated in our telegram of March 22nd this is not a question on which we can insist on absolute uniformity in all Provinces. We still consider however that such uniformity would be desirable.

224: Keshav Gokhale v. Emperor [Stone C.J., Kania, Wadia, Divatia and Chagla J.J. Full Bench (21 April 1944)]

AIR, Vol. 32, 1945, Bombay, p. 212

Criminal application No. 585 of 1943, decided on 21st April 1944.

R.A. Jahagirdar, K.J. Kale and D.M. Atharale – for Application. N.P. Engineer, Advocate General and B.G. Rao, Government pleader – for the Crown.

Stone C.J. – We are unanimous in our opinions on the various judgment, I am about to deliver is the judgment of this full bench. We have before us two petitions under S.491, Criminal P.C., 1898 of Mr Keshav Govind Gokhale, who has been brought up from Belgaum Central prison where he is under detention. From these petitions which are duly affirmed it appears that Mr Gokhale is a pleader practising in the Courts of the District of Belgaum and is also a Member of the Bombay Legislative Assembly. The following further facts, some of which appear in Mr Gokhale's petitions, are not in dispute: (1) That the arrest was made under R. 129, Defence of India Rules, by a Sub-Inspector of Police at Nippani which is 11 miles from Belgaum at 3 o'clock in the afternoon of 9th August 1942. (2) That Mr Gokhale was on the day following conveyed to Belgaum Central Prison, where he was detained until the middle of March 1943, being then transferred to Naik Road Central Prison, and subsequently, retransferred to Belgaum Central prison, from when he has been produced before us pursuant to an order of this Court. (3) That the document, by virtue of which Mr Gokhale is detained, was signed by Mr C.N. Millard, District Magistrate of Belgaum, on 9th August 1942, in point of time before the actual arrest. (4) That on the same day as Mr Gokhale was arrested Mr Millard issued a document or documents which led to the detention of about thirty other persons. (5) That as a result of reading an account in the newspapers of a decision of the Federal Court, Mr Gokhale applied on 2nd September 1943, to the District Magistrate at Belgaum for a copy of the order under which he was detained. That he was not supplied with any copy until 7th November 1943.

Before parting with facts, we desire to state that every person under detention has a right to know the terms of the order under which he is detained, and that the delay in complying with Mr Gokhale's request remains unexplained and is regrettable.

By sub-rule (1) of Rule 129, Defence of India Rules, 1939, any police officer, or any other officer of Government empowered in that behalf by general or special order of the Central Government, or of the Provincial Government, may arrest without warrant any person whom he reasonably suspects of having acted, of acting, or of being about to act in amongst other ways 'with intent to assist any state at War with His Majesty, or in a manner prejudicial to the public safety or to the efficient prosecution of War'. By sub-rule (2) of R.129 it is provided that officer who makes an arrest under sub-rule (1) shall forthwith report the fact of such arrest to the Provincial Government and may commit the person so arrested to custody: Provided that no person shall be detained in custody under this sub-rule for a period exceeding fifteen days without the order of the Provincial Government, and that no person shall be detained in custody under this sub-rule for a period exceeding two months.

The relevant portions of R.26, as it stood on 9th August 1942, were as follows:

(1) The Central Government or the Provincial Government, if it is satisfied with respect to any particular person that with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the defence of British India the public safety, the maintenance of public order, His Majesty's relations with foreign prisoners or Indian States, the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas or the efficient prosecution of the war it is necessary so to do, may make an order

(b) Directing that he be detained.

Sub-rule (5) provides that so long as there is in force in respect of any person such an order directing detention, the person detained shall be liable to be detained in such place and under such conditions as the Central Government or the Provincial Government may from time to time determine.

Under section 2 (5), Defence of India Act, 1939, the Provincial Government has the power to delegate its powers and duties. And on 19th December 1941, the Government of Bombay by a Notification in the Bombay Government Gazette made the following order:

No. S.D./W.3401 – In exercise of the powers conferred by sub-section (5) of S.2, Defence of India Act, 1939 (25 of 1939), the Government of Bombay is pleased to direct that the powers or duties conferred or imposed on it by such of the rules of the Defence of India Rules as are mentioned the schedule annexed hereto shall also be exercisable or dischargeable by all District Magistrates within the hand of their respective jurisdiction.

The schedule contains amongst other rules, R.26 and R.129.

On 7th August 1942, that is to say, two days before Mr Gokhale's arrest, by a further Notification being No. S.D.V./30 in the Bombay Government Gazette in similar terms to the format it was provided that the powers conferred by Rule 26 (5) of the Defence of India Rules 'shall also be exercised by all District Magistrates within the Province of Bombay.' In fact R. 26 was subsequently held by the Federal Court in A.I.R. 1943 F.C.1 to be ultra vires; and two Ordinances, to which we will presently refer, were issued by the Governor – General for the purpose of curing by retrospective operation validity. The document, under which Mr Gokhale has been detained since his arrest on 9th August 1942, is in the following terms:

No. M.C. 62.

Order

Whereas the Government of Bombay has, by Notification in the Home Department (Political), No. S.D./W. 3401, dated 19th December 1941, and No. S.D.V/30, dated 7th August 1942, directed that the powers conferred on it by R. 26 of the Defence of India Rules shall also be exercisable by the District Magistrates;

And whereas I, C.N. Millard, District Magistrate of Belgaum, am satisfied with respect of the persons named in the first-column of the Schedule hereto annexed that with a view to presenting them from acting in a manner prejudicial to the Defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order and the efficient prosecution of the war, it is necessary to make the following order;

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by R. 26 of the said Rules, I do hereby direct that the said persons be detained until further orders in the Belgaum Central prison.

I do hereby further direct that the said persons shall, for purpose of the security prisoners detention Conditions order, 1941, be classified as indicated against their name in the second column of the said schedule.

Classification.

Signed illegible,
District Magistrate,
Belgaum

Name of person,
K.G. Gokhale of Belgaum.
Initials.
(Illegible)
Dated at Belgaum, this 9th day of August 1942.
(Impress of rubber stamp)
District Magistrate, Belgaum.

An examination of the original of this document shows that it consists of a form, produced by cyclostyled process, on which has been typed in the left hand column of the Schedule 'K.G. Gokhale of Belgaum', and in the right hand column the figure '1'. The date has been filled in by typing '9th' and the word 'August.' The signature in ink, which though illegible, is admitted to be that of Mr Millard. The only other alterations to the original form are the impress of a rubber stamp of the District Magistrate, Belgaum, and the initials, which are in ink of a clerk under the signature and against the words 'District Magistrate, Belgaum.' It is obvious that the document, as signed, is inappropriate to the case of a single person, since it reads that Mr Millard is satisfied with respect to 'the persons named in the first column of the Schedule', and it continues at four other different places as if it was dealing with a plurality of persons. The reasons contained in the body of it, except those relating to Native states and tribal areas, are copied from 26 (1) of the Defence of India Rules as that sub-rule stood on 9th August 1942.

Although the form was cyclostyled by the morning of 9th August it refers to the Notification of the Government of Bombay dated 7th August. That Notification confers powers on officers under Rule 26 (5) to detain persons arrested beyond the limits of their territorial jurisdiction. A reference to that Notification and such powers was not necessary in this document, as it is not suggested that Mr Gokhale was to be detained beyond the jurisdiction of Mr Millard although arrested under Mr Millard's order within the Belgaum District. Ex facie, in our judgment, this document raises the inference that it was signed as a matter of mechanical routine. If it is to be assumed, and we do in fact assume, that Mr Millard is a responsible and conscientious officer, it is not possible to believe that he appreciated the necessity for applying his mind to this document: Since he had done so, he could not have failed to correct its manifest inappropriateness. In our judgment, it is impossible to believe that in signing this document he appreciated the nature, the extent and the implications of the grave and onerous powers and duties delegated to him by Government for the purpose of curtailing by preventive detention the liberty of His Majesty's subjects without trial or process of the Courts. The fact that there may have been serious disturbances at the time or that such disturbances may have been anticipated and that Mr Millard signed many such documents on the same day can hardly be craved in aid as an explanation, since R. 129 itself demonstratively foresaw such a state of affairs when it provided a period of fifteen days in which orders for detention under R. 26 could have been considered and made in respect of persons arrested under it. The greater the emergencies and the disturbances of the moment, the more the reason to take advantage of the latitude given by the regulations unless the signing of a document such as the one before us was regarded as a mere formality. Contrast, as appears from his affidavit, the careful and meticulous investigations of Sir John Anderson as Home Secretary before authorizing the detention of one Benjamin Greene under similar Regulations in England of whom the Home Secretary had reasonable cause to believe to be of hostile origin or association or to have been recently concerned with acts prejudicial to the public safety or the defence of the realm. . . .

In our opinion, all the circumstances in the case before us show that Mr Millard did not exercise any executive discretion or make a quasi-judicial consideration of the facts pertinent to Mr Gokhale's case. The Advocate-General was constrained to admit that, if one of the cyclostyled forms had been filled up with a wrong name by a dishonest clerk, and signed by the District Magistrate without noticing the defect, it would be no order. On the view we take of the matter, namely, that Mr Millard never applied his mind when he signed this document to any consideration of the matters which the powers conferred and the duties imposed upon him compelled him to consider; it has no more efficacious result.

In A.I.R. 1943 F.C. 1 — the learned Chief Justice of India, Sir Maurice Gwyer,¹ in considering whether the order was protected from examination by S. 16 (1), Defence of India Act, which provides; 'no order made in exercise of any power conferred by or under this Act shall be called in question in any Court', said as follows (p. 9).

We are clearly of opinion that there the order is made under or by virtue of a rule which is in valid and therefore of no force or effect. The order is a nullity and S 16 (1) has no application.

The document in the case before us is in no better position for, in our judgment, it is no order at all since the obligation to consider reasons or grounds for making the order and to be satisfied upon material laid before the officer or authority making it or within his cognizance is a condition precedent to the making of an order. In (1942) I.K.P. 87 Mackinnon L.J. said this (p. 108).

The power of the Home secretary to issue a valid order depends on the fulfillment of a condition. The nature of that condition is very material. It is not the existence of an objective fact, for example, that the person concerned is an alien. It is the existence, of a subjective state of mind in the Home Secretary, that is, that he has reasonable grounds for believing certain facts, to exist, and, by implication, that he honestly entertains that belief. If an order asserting the existence of that state of mind and belief, in valid from, has been made, the onus on the application of disproving its existence is obviously more difficult than would be the disproof on an objective fact, for example, that the man is an alien. Evidence of the applican that he does not know that there are any reasons for the Home Secretary's belief, or denial that there are or can be any reasons for it, is not a sufficient discharge of the onus so as to call on the Home Secretary to explain and justify the assertion of his order. In the present case the appellant does rather more than make those general assertions or denials, and an affidavit in reply has been filed by the Home Secretary.

¹This passage was referred to with approval by Lord Wright in the House of Lords: (See (1942) A.C. 206 at p. 262) Mr Jahagirdar has further contended that the order made by Mr Millard is ultra vires and invalid because on the true construction of the relevant section it should be the Central Government or the Provincial Government, and not the District Magistrate, who has to be satisfied on the points mentioned in Rule 26 (1): but having regard to our conclusion already stated it is not necessary to go into this question. As a result of the case in A.I.R. 1943 F.C.1 there was issued Ordinance 14 of 1943, which, in effect, is aimed at curing the effect arising from the divergence of language between R. 26 and S. 2 (2) (x), Defence of India Act, 1939. This was followed by Ordinance 3 of 1944, which came into operation on 15th January 1944, and it is upon its terms that the Advocate-General relies. Section 3 of the 1944 Ordinance gives power to make orders restricting the movements or actions of detaining certain persons as therein mentioned. Section 5 provides for the delegation of the powers and duties of the Central and Provincial Governments to other authorities and to officers: But it is Ss. 6 and 10 upon which the Advocate-General relies: They are as follows.

6 (1) Validation of orders made under Rule 26, Defence of India Rules. (1) No order made before the commencement of this Ordinance under Rule 26, Defence of India Rules shall after such commencement, be deemed to be invalid or be called in question on the ground merely that the said rule purported to confer in excess of the powers that might at the time the said order was made be legally conferred by a rule made under section 2, Defence of India Ordinance, 1939 (5 of 1939), or under Section 2, Defence of India Act, 1939 (35 of 1939).

'(2)' Every such order shall on the commencement of this Ordinance be deemed to have been, and shall have effect as if it had been, made under this Ordinance, and as if this Ordinance had been in force at the time the order was made.'

The rest of the section is not material . . .

Whilst, therefore, we proceed on the assumption that the 1944 Ordinance is valid, we desire to make it plain that we are deciding nothing with regard to its validity or its invalidity. The argument of the Advocate-General amounts to this: That the document signed by Mr Millard on 9th August 1942, is an order, and as it purports to have been made under R. 26, it follows that by virtue of S. 6 (2) of the 1944 Ordinance, it is valid, whatever its defects may be. In our opinion, this submission is fallacious. The effect of S. 6 (1) is to validate orders made under R.26 which would otherwise have been invalid on the ground merely that the said powers that might at the time the said order was made be legally conferred by a rule made under the Defence of India Ordinance, 1939, or under S. 2, Defence of India Act, 1939. That is to say, it cured the defect in the divergence of language between the rule on the one hand and the Ordinance and the Act on the other. It is every such order which under section 6 (2) is to be deemed to have been, and which shall have effect as if had been, made under the 1944 Ordinance, and as if such Ordinance had been in force at the relevant date.

In our judgment, section 6 (2) of the 1944 Ordinance does not validate a document which is not order at all, even though it bears the signature of a duly authorized officer, if it can be shown that the officer never applied his mind when he affixed his signature to it. And be it observed that it is only orders made valid by section 6 (1) to which section 6 (2) applies and is limited. It was contended that section 6 (1) of the 1944 Ordinance was separately framed to continue the operation of S. 3 of ordinance 14 of 1943 which had been held valid by the Federal Court. That, however, does not mean that by section 6 (2) of the 1944 Ordinance all orders purported to be made under R. 26 were validated. It is significant to note the word 'such' used in section 6 (2) in this connection. In our opinion, if it could be shown that an order is invalid on a ground other than the invalidity of R.26, section 6 (1) of the 1944 Ordinance does not apply and cannot validate such an order. Only orders valid except for the defect mentioned in section 6 (1) are covered by section 6 (2). We find that this line of reasoning was advocated in A.I.R. 1944 Lah. 142.² The Court held that the case fell under S. 6 (1), and, therefore, it was covered by section 6 (2). The Court did not, however, reject the contention advocated and seems to have impliedly approved of it.

The first part of section 10 (1), which suspends the jurisdiction of the Court to call in question orders to which it applies, does not help the Advocate-General. There was a similar provision in S.16, Defence of India Act, and the Federal Court has enquired into and decided questions of validity of orders passed under R.26 on the ground of the same being ultra vires. The second part of section 10 (1), which suspends the operation of S. 491, Criminal P.C., to such orders, applies to two classes of orders. That is to say, orders made under S. 3 of the Ordinance itself and orders 'having effect under this Ordinance or in respect of any person the subject of such an order.' In our judgment for the reasons already stated, the document we have to consider does not fall within any of these categories.

Section 10 (2) does not assist the matter: Since, though these habeas corpus proceedings were pending at the time of the commencement of the 1944 Ordinance, they are not proceedings by which the validity of an order having effect by virtue of S. 6, as if it had been made under the Ordinance, is called in question. In the result, no order under R. 26 of the Defence of India Rules has ever been made in the case of Mr Gokhale; and at any rate, from the expiration of the period mentioned in R. 129 his detention has been unlawful. In these circumstances, it is our clear duty to order his immediate release from custody; and that order we now make.

Per Curiam. — It is necessary to add that an application has been made to us by the learned Advocate-General for a certificate under S. 205 Government of India Act. We have carefully considered the matter and withhold the granting of any such certificate. We are helped in coming to the conclusion by a reference to the case in 43 Bom. L.R. 496, which is a decision of a full Bench of this Court. In case of an appeal to the Privy Council, we direct that the original order of detention issued on 9th August 1942, by Mr Millard, which should be marked 'Exhibit 1', should be forwarded to the Privy Council in Original.

Order accordingly.

225: Report in The Hindustan Times on Gokhale's case and Official Note on it — (dt 22.4.1944)

File No. 25/10/44 – Home Poll (I)

A full Bench of the Bombay High Court has held in the case of political detenu. Mr Gokhale, that the District Magistrate who passed the order did not exercise any executive discretion or make a quasi-judicial consideration of the facts pertinent to the case.¹ Mr Gokhale, who is a pleader and a member of the Bombay Assembly, was suddenly arrested in August, 1942, and detained under the Defence of India Rules. Thanks to the intervention of the High Court, which heard and accepted a habeas corpus petition filed on his behalf, Mr Gokhale has now been ordered to be released. His release may or may not be effected, but the observations made by the High Court in the course of its judgment holding the detention order invalid are important now from more than one point of view. For one thing, they call attention again to a sinister aspect of the Government's detention policy which despite the strictures of High Courts and the Federal Court appears to continue unchanged. In this case the Chief justice observed that every person under detention had to know the terms of the order under which he was detained and that the delay in furnishing the petitioner with a copy thereof remained 'unexplained and was regrettable.' It has further been disclosed in this case that the order as furnished consisted merely of a cyclostyled form in which the name of the petitioner alone was typed though the body of the order referred to several other persons. The Chief Justice rightly came to the conclusion that it was signed as a matter of mechanical routine and that it was not possible to believe that in signing this document the District Magistrate 'appreciated the nature, the extent and the implications of the grave and onerous powers and duties delegated to him by Government for the purpose of curtailing by preventive detention the liberty of His Majesty's subjects without trial or process of the courts.' It is only in rare cases that High Courts are in a position to interfere, but one would like to know from the Government of India what they are doing to ascertain similar lapses elsewhere and save innocent persons from unjustified detention.

We had better obtain information about the case quoted in the cutting above from the Hindustan Times of 22/4.

2. We have I believe told one Government (the Punjab) that a copy of the order of detention must be supplied to detenus. Have we done so in respect of all our detenus - Sarat C Bose' in his recent representation said he had never been supplied a copy, though he had asked for it. In replying to his representation, we might supply him a copy of the order, if his statement that one was not given to him is correct.

226: Report in The Hindustan Times on the Lahore High Court Judgement

File No. 25/9/44 - Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

The Hindustan Times, Wednesday, April 26, 1944.

Habeas Corpus* Petition Dismissed

Lahore, April 25. - Sir Trevor Harries, Chief Justice of the Lahore High Court, dismissed

today the habeas corpus petition against the detention of Prof. Inder Prakash, Assistant Secretary of the Marwari Chamber of Commerce, Calcutta.

The Assistant Advocate-General produced an affidavit by the Chief Secretary to the Government to the effect that the detention was under Ordinance III of 1944 and, therefore, it could not be challenged. — A.P.I.

227. Official Notings regarding four appeals to the Federal Court (dt 25.4.1944–26.4.1944)

[NAI]

These are four notices served by the Federal Court on the Advocate-General of India under 036 R.1 of the Federal Court Rules.¹ The notices relate to four appeals from decisions of the Patna High Court which involve the validity of Ordinance III of 1944 (the Restriction and Detention Ordinance 1944). The notices, petitions of appeal, judgments of the High Court and connected documents are placed on the file.²

2. As the validity of Ordinance III of 1944 is challenged on various grounds it appears advisable that the Advocate General of India should be instructed to appear in the case on behalf of the Central Government.

3. Instructions of the Department are sought on this point. It may be stated that if the Department decides in favour of the course suggested above they will have to pay the fees of the Junior Counsel which will come to, about Rs 400 per day, the services of the Advocate General of India being available to the Department free.

4. If it is decided that the Central Government should be represented at the hearing, observations to be submitted to the Advocate General will be prepared in this office and sent to the Department for their comments.

5. The appeals are fixed for hearing on the 15th May 1944. In the first of the cases, however the appellant (Basant Chandra Ghose)³ has made an application (copy is placed on the file)⁴ asking the Court to permit him to appear in person and conduct his case personally. In the third paragraph of the notice of the Federal Court in this case (i.e. F.C. Case No. III of 1944) it is stated that the Federal Court proposes to allow the application and that if it is intended to raise objection to the appellant's going to Delhi to appear in person such objection should be intimated to the Court by the 30th April 1944.

6. It is understood that a similar notice is issued to the Provincial Government. It is not known what attitude the Bihar Government is taking on the point. Instructions of the Department are urgently sought as to whether the application is to be opposed and if so on what grounds. The Home Department will probably have to be consulted on this point. A form of Power of attorney in this case is placed on the file for the signature of the Secretary, Defence Department. The will be necessary if the Central Government approve in these cases.

7. In view of the urgency of the case the file is marked 'Immediate.'

228: Opinion of Advocate General (Bengal) about reading of the Independence Day Pledge¹

Govt. of Bengal (Home) File No. 6/44
[Bengal State Archives]

Action for reading out the independence pledge can be taken either:

- (a) Under the General criminal law or under the Calcutta Municipal Act.
- (b) It seems that the Government has been advised that the Independence pledge is seditious. I only desire to draw the attention of the Government to the observations in Niharendu's case in 1942 F.C.R. at page 48 as follows:

Hence many judicial decisions in particular cases which were no doubt correct at the time when they were given may well be inapplicable to the circumstances of today

The present state of political movement, in other words, the circumstances of today would appear from the Oxford University Press publication 'Indian politics 1936-42' by Coupland at pages 273-5. The court in coming to a conclusion would have to consider the circumstances of today.

- (c) The Councillor in reading out the Independence pledge is not disowning allegiance but hopes that in the course of time India will sever the British connection. He suggests that end should be achieved by non-violent constitutional method thus bringing himself within the protection of the explanation of that section. In view of the present state of political movement as indicated by Sir Stafford Cripps and the explanation, I do not think there has been a violation of the oath of allegiance taken in terms of S.38.

Assuming however that the reading of the independence pledge did amount to a violation of the oath taken then the only action the Government could take would be to unseat the mover under S. 41. Presumably the oath was taken sometime in 1941 when the Corporation was constituted. Violation of the oath was on the 29th January, 1944. Sometime in March 1944 the Corporation was dissolved and the seat automatically became vacant. Action under S. 41 therefore cannot be taken. New councillors would take fresh oaths and I do not think they could be unseated under S. 41 for violation of an oath previously taken.

Pal with him), instructed by R.C. Prasad, Agent (in 6) – for Appellants.

(With R.J. Bahadur) instructed by S.P. Varma, Agent (in all) – for the Crown.

Sir Brojendra Mitter, Advocate-General of India (with H.K. Bose, Advocate, Federal Court) instructed by K.Y. Bhandarkar, Agent-Appeared in response to notice issued to him under 0.36, R.I. Federal Court Rules, 1942.

Spens C.J. – These are appeals by certain detenus against orders passed by the High Court at Patna dismissing applications filed by them or on their behalf for their release under S. 491, Criminal P.C. Two of the petitions, from which criminal Appeals Nos 3 and 5 arise, were dealt with by one Division Bench, in a judgment which has discussed the contentions urged in support of the petitions. The petitions in the other two cases were disposed of by two other Benches which have followed that judgment. On behalf of the Crown it was urged before the High Court that ordinance 3 of 1944 – which had been promulgated during the pendency of some of these petitions had taken away the power of the Court to pass any order under S. 491, Criminal P.C., in these cases. By way of reply to that argument the validity of the Ordinance was impugned on behalf of the detenus, certain contentions as to the construction and effect of the Ordinance were also advanced. The High Court upheld the objection raised on behalf of the Crown but granted a certificate under S. 205, Constitution Act. In the main judgment under appeal, the learned judges rejected the limited interpretation which counsel for the detenus sought to place on Ss.6 (2) and 10 of the Ordinance. They also held that there was nothing to suggest that the Governor of Bihar had not duly passed the orders for detention. Before this Court, the objection based on the Ordinance has been relied on by the Advocate General of Bihar and counsel for the appellants have urged several contentions both in respect of the validity of the Ordinance and in respect of its meaning and effect. It will facilitate the appreciation as well as the discussion of these arguments to begin with a brief narration of the circumstances that led to the promulgation of the Ordinance.

Immediately after the outbreak of the war, provision was made by an Ordinance (ordinance 5 of 1939) promulgated by the Governor-General and by rules framed thereunder for the administration taking all necessary measures to ensure the public safety and interest and the defence of British India. On 29th September 1939, an Act (Defence of India Act 35 of 1939) was passed by the Legislature itself, making necessary provision in this behalf and the Ordinance was repealed. Section 2 of this Act enabled the Central Government to make rules for securing the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order etc. Clause 2 of this section contained some further provisions relating to the rules to be so made. One of the rules framed by the Central Government was R. 26, Defence of India Rules, enabling certain authorities to make orders for detention, if they were satisfied with respect to any particular person that it was necessary to make such an order with a view to preventing him from acting in any manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order, etc.

In (1943) 6 F.L.J. 28 this Court held that R. 26, Defence of India Rules, went further than the rule-making powers conferred by S.2 of the Act, warranted.⁴ As it would have followed from this decision that person detained at the time under orders passed on the basis of R. 26 must be released, the Governor-General promulgated Ordinance 14 of 1943 whose material provisions were:

S.2. For cl. (x) of sub-section (2) of S.2, Defence of India Act, 1939 (35 of 1939) the following clause shall be substituted, and shall be deemed always to have been substituted, namely: (x) the apprehension and detention in custody of any person whom the authority empowered by the rules to apprehend or detain as the case may be suspects, on grounds appearing to such authority to be reasonable, of being of hostile origin, or of having acted, acting, being about to act, or being likely to act in a manner prejudicial to the public safety or interest, the defence of British India, the maintenance of public order, His Majesty's relations with foreign powers or Indian States, the maintenance of peaceful conditions in tribal areas or the efficient prosecution of the war, or with respect to whom such authority is satisfied that his apprehension and detention are necessary for the purpose of preventing him acting in any such prejudicial manner, the prohibition of such person from entering or remaining in any area, and the compelling of such person to reside and remain in any area, or to do or abstain from doing anything.

S.3. For the removal of doubts it is hereby enacted that no order heretofore made against any person under R.26, Defence of India Rules, shall be deemed to be invalid or shall be called in question on the ground merely that the said rule purported to confer powers in excess of the powers that might at the time the said rule was made be lawfully conferred by a rule made or deemed to have been made under S.2. Defence of India Act, 1939.

The validity and effect of Ordinance 14 of 1943 had to be considered by this Court in 1944 F.C.R.1. The Court then indicated certain doubts as to the validity of S.2 of the Ordinance, as it attempted to change the statute law with retrospective effect, but it upheld the validity of S.3, with the result that detention orders theretofore passed could no longer be impugned on the ground that R.26 was not warranted by S.2. Defence of India Act. The judgment of this Court in 1944 F.C.R.1 dealt with two other objections raised against the validity of the orders of detention then under consideration and the objections were upheld, in some instances unanimously and in other cases by a majority. One related to the authority who was to be satisfied as to the necessity for the detention, viz., whether in the provinces it must be the Governor himself or it may be any person to whom certain classes of work may be assigned under S.59. Constitution Act, the other related to the nature and extent of the presumption to be made in favour of the 'validity and regularity' of orders for detention that had been passed under the invalid R. 26. The position taken up on behalf of the Crown in that case and in other cases before the provincial High Courts was that it was not necessary that the order should be the result of consideration in each case by the Governor and that every presumption must be made in favour of its validity and regularity.

This Court pronounced judgment in 1944 F.C.R.1 on 31st August 1943¹ and ordinance 3 of 1944 was promulgated on 15th January 1944. Roughly the purpose of the Ordinance may be described as three-fold. (i) To confer the power of detention, etc., by the Ordinance itself instead of by rules framed under the Defence of India Act . . . see Ss.4 and of the Ordinance. (ii) to limit the term of detention in the first instance, to provide for the review (by certain authorities) of the order of detention from time to time and to give opportunity to the detenu to make representation to the executive authorities against the order . . . vide Ss. 7, 8 and 9; and (iii) to enact a presumption in the Ordinance itself in favour of detention orders to preclude their being questioned in Courts of law and to take away or limit the power of the High Court to make orders under S.491, Criminal P.C., in each cases . . . vide Ss. 6 and 10.

[Omitted: Observations on various judgments connected with these Ordinances in Indian Courts. — Ed.]

The view stated above as to the scope of cl. (2) of S.6 will also determine the ambit of the expression order having effect by virtue of S.6 etc., in S.10 of the Ordinance. But it does not follow from this that the Court can no longer consider the validity of an order which on the face of it appears or purports to have been passed under R. 26.

In our judgment, no further curtailment of the power of the Court to investigate and interfere with orders for detention has been imposed by Ordinance 3 of 1944. The Court is and will be still at liberty to investigate whether an order purporting to have been made under R. 26 and now deemed to be made under Ordinance 3 or a new order purporting to be made under Ordinance 3 was in fact validly made, in exactly the same way as immediately before the promulgation of the Ordinance. At on consideration the Court comes to the conclusion that it was not validly made on any of the grounds indicated in any of the long line of decisions in England and this country on the subject, other than the ground that R.26 was ultra vires. S. 10 of Ordinance 3 will no more prevent it from so finding than S.16, Defence of India Act, did. Such an invalid order, though purporting to be an order will not in fact be an 'order made under this Ordinance' in having effect by virtue of S.6 as if made under this Ordinance at all for the purposes of S.10.

We are accordingly of the opinion that the learned judges who pronounced the main judgment (in Criminal Misc. cases Nos 60/43 and 204/43) erred in holding that the new Ordinance has taken away the power of the High Court to pass any orders under S.491, Criminal P.C., and that the proceedings must be treated as discharged under the provisions of S.10 (2) of the Ordinance. The judgments in the other two cases purport to follow this judgment. There are observations in some of the judgments bearing upon what may be called the interests of the case. But it is difficult to say that the treatment of that aspect of the case is not likely to have been affected by the view which the learned judges took as to the deprivation by the Ordinance of the power of the Court to pass any order under S. 491, Criminal P.C. It seems to us that in these circumstances the only proper course is to allow all the four appeals and to set aside the orders of dismissal passed by the High Court in all these cases. The cases will be remitted to the High Court with a direction that the petitions be restored to the file and disposed of in due course of law in the light of the decision above given as to the nature and extent of the Court's power in the matter.

Judgment of the Federal Court in these Appeals¹ was delivered on 23rd instant.² A copy of the judgment is placed on the file for perusal and may be retained in Home Department. A copy is also being sent to the Defence Department for information.³

2. It will be seen that the Court has held Ordinance III of 1944 to be valid.⁴ On a question of construction the conclusion arrived at is that the Ordinance does not prevent the Court from investigating whether an order of detention passed under Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules before the date of the Ordinance (and same is the position of orders passed under the Ordinance) was in fact validly made, the only ground of attack against such orders excluded by the Ordinance being the one based on the invalidity of Rule 26 itself.

3. As the Patna High Court had taken a wider view of section 10 (2) of the Ordinance as depriving the High Court of powers to pass orders under Section 491 of the Criminal Procedure Code in all cases and as that view in the opinion of the Federal Court might have affected their decision, all the four cases are ordered to be remitted to the High Court for being disposed of according to law.

4. The Bill for Junior Counsel engaged in the case is placed on the file. It is in accordance with the scales prescribed in the Federal Court Rules, 1942. Arrangements may please be made to pay the Bill in due course. The name and address of the Junior Counsel is:

The point of interest in the judgment is the view expounded on page 24. I do not think we need quarrel with this decision.

Vishnu Sahay, 26-5-44.

This was the incidental point referred to in my note of 8/5⁵ and I must say I never expected any other decision.

The main point however is that Ordinance III has been declared valid — and I suppose this is worth paying Rs 1504 for, I presume Legislative Department are satisfied with the judgement — (I have not had time to read it all) and that Defence Department will consider the advisability of drawing the attention of Provincial Governments to the important parts of it.

235: Sardul Singh Caveeshar's representation

File No. 44/52/44 - Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

To
The Hon'ble, The Lord Chief Justice,
Of the High Court, Punjab, Lahore,
Through the Superintendent Jail, Dharamsala.

Sir,

I was arrested on the 9th of March, 1942, by the Punjab Police and informed that my arrest was effected under rule 129 of the Defence of India Rules. A few days later I was told that orders had been confirmed by Government of India and that I was in detention under rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules. I was first kept in the Lahore Fort and then transferred to Campbellpur Jail and later to Dharamsala Jail where I am detained at present.

2. On 2nd of May 1943, I applied to the Home Member Government of India for a copy of the order of my detention. On the 17th of May 1943 I was informed that my application for copy of the orders of Government of India had been rejected and that I could be shown orders of the Punjab Government dated the 24th March 1943, ordering my detention in Dharamsala Jail.

3. Later I got a copy of the orders of Government of India through my legal adviser. This order was defective in as much as it was not signed by the proper authority and did not show that before it was issued the case had been properly considered by the authority concerned as required by law.

4. The order of Government of India was defective on another ground also. As the Punjab Police arrested me under rule 129 about 10 o'clock in the morning of 9th March 1942, and the order of Government of India which is also dated the 9th March 1942, was passed under rule 26, it could not have been so passed by the Government of India in Delhi on any adequate information before it for the same day I was arrested in Lahore by the Punjab Police under Rule 129.

5. Even if Government of India order was issued by proper authority and for valid reasons, this order was vacated by the Punjab Government order dated the 24th March 1943, when I was ordered to be released from detention in the Campbellpur Jail, and so could not have any legal effect now after the above order of release. That the Government of India order did not hold good now is also confirmed by the refusal of the Home Member, Government of India to supply me with a copy of it and referring me to the present order of detention by the Punjab Government.

6. The order detaining me now in Dharamsala Jail is dated 24th March 1943 and is issued under signatures of the Chief Secretary, Government of Punjab. But this order is also illegal and without any valid authority on the same grounds as were given in the judgment by the Hon'ble judges of the Punjab High Court in the case of Mr Durga Dass Khanna in connection with his application under section 491 I.P.C. The case was argued before your Hon'ble Court by Mr Sikri, Bar-at-Law in the month of November 1943.

7. Ordinance III of 1944 makes previous detentions under rule 26 valid and prevents applications to the High Court under section 491 I.P.C. But the said Ordinance does not apply to my case as no valid order under rule 26 existed in my case when that Ordinance was passed and no order still exists to that effect.

8. I, therefore, request your Lordship most respectfully that orders may be issued by your Lordship for my production in the Court and release under section 491 I.P.C.

9. I am extremely sorry to put this application before your Lordship in this crude form and not in the proper legal language. It is because I am not allowed by the authorities concerned to secure necessary legal help. The Security Prisoners Rules allow such legal help, but the officer concerned has refused my application in this connection again and again, and the Jail officers have received instructions not to forward my applications for interview with legal advisers to the authorities concerned.

10. Only a few days back, after corresponding for more than one year, I received information that in reply to my representation to Government of India, I was allowed interview with a lawyer in a special case. But as that permission has nothing to do with the present case, I cannot make use of that permission in this case. I, therefore, request your Lordship to allow me to argue this case in your Hon'ble Court personally with such legal assistance as your Lordship might deem advisable.

I beg to remain Sir,
Your Lordship's Most faithfully servant,
Sardul Singh Caveeshar,
Security Prisoner, Detained in Sub Jail
Dharamsala (Kangra).

Dated Dharamsala
26th May, 1944.

Note: The Federal Court in their judgment dated 23rd May 1944, in the case *Basant Chandra Ghose*¹ etc. Vs. the Crown has held that notwithstanding Ordinance III of 1944, barring applications from detenus under Section 491 I.P.C. to the High Court, the High Courts have powers to hear and adjudicate on such applications — Ed.

D.O. No. 3/19/44 – Poll (I)

Government of India,
Home Department.

New Delhi, the 8th June, 1944

My dear Houlton,

We have been shown a copy of the Bihar Police Administration Report relating to terrorism in 1943 prepared by your Special Branch and have considered whether we could use the atrocity portions and the photographs for propaganda against Congress. The best propaganda would of course be to produce some of the material as evidence in the trial of Jaiprakash Narain and Co if the incidents could be proved to have occurred in pursuance of the instructions of the underground Directorate or to have been committed by persons who were members of that Directorate's organisation. The proceedings of the trial would then give them all the advertisement that they need, but it will be some time before the trial starts and we do not know yet whether it will be held in camera. It seems to us therefore that it would be worthwhile considering whether some immediate publicity could not be given to some of these incidents and photographs. We do not think we ourselves could publicize them at present, but perhaps the Bihar Government could start a local publicity campaign as suggested at the end of the Report. We might, of course, be able to use some of the material during the next session of the Legislature.

Yours sincerely,

(Richard Tottenham)

The 19th June 1944.

My dear Sir Richard,

Please refer to your Secret. D.O. letter No 3/19/44 – Poll (I), dated the 7th June 1944. The passage about terrorism in 1943 to which you refer is not actually a part of the Bihar Police Administration Report. It is a draft which has been sent to Inspector General of Police and which may be amended or amplified before inclusion in the report. I understand that some statements of fact need checking. With regard to the suggestion that the atrocity incidents might be used at the trial of Jaiprakash Narain, the difficulty would be to establish the direct connection between his activities and the incidents, unless some more definite evidence comes to light. The Tarapur mutilation case was the result of the proceedings of a Congress Court, and seems to be unique. The other cases are generally cases of murder and mutilation of suspected police informers or of rural policemen who had tried to do their duty loyally. There is no doubt that this was part of a planned campaign of terrorism to make people keep their mouths shut. Terrorization of witnesses in cases against the political bandits has also been common (and successful). If it could be proved that Jaiprakash Narain issued orders or instructions to carry out this policy of terrorization, murder and mutilation, it might be possible to bring in the incidents as consequences for which Jaiprakash Narain can be held responsible. The trouble would be to satisfy the court of the relevancy.

As regards immediate publicity, we have published an article on dacoity written by myself in simple language to get home to the ordinary villager, and illustrated by the photographs of mutilated men. This was published in our newspaper 'DEHAT' in English and Hindi. It was sent to the local press, but no other newspaper had the courage to print it. I enclose a copy of the article.¹ The captions under the photographs were altered to avoid references to any cases heard in the courts.

The two main points decided are –

- (i) Sub-section (2) of section 10 of the Ordinance either has no wider operation than sub-section (1) or is void and inoperative, inasmuch as it amounts to a judicial act distinct from a legislative act. – p. 12 to 17 of the judgment.

- (ii) The Courts are at liberty to investigate whether an order purporting to have been made under rule 26 or under section 3 of the Ordinance was in fact validly made, and section 10 does not prevent them from finding that it was not validly made.

I see no reason to be perturbed by either of these decisions.

We have already seen the judgment separately.

The point of reference to this Department is whether it is considered necessary to draw the attention of the Provincial Governments to the important parts of the judgment delivered by the Federal Court relating to the appeals from decisions of the Patna High Court in respect of four persons detained under Ordinance III of 1944.² The important parts of the judgment have been summarized in Mr Sundaram's note and in view of the last sentence of that note it is for consideration whether the Provincial Governments need be addressed in the matter. As, however, the judgment deals mainly with the validity of Ordinance III of 1944 it seems preferable that the Home Department who are administratively concerned with it might address Provinces, if at all. D O. No. 642–P.S.,

My dear Sahay,

Please refer to your Demi-Official letter No. 4/3/43 – Poll (I) dated the 3rd May 1944¹ enquiring about details of some cases instituted by the A.I.S.A. in respect of properties seized from some of their centres in Bengal. Three such cases occurred one at Calcutta and the other two at Bankura. In all three cases the claim for the properties was preferred by the trustees of the Board of Trust A.I.S.A. Bombay and not by the Bengal Branch (A.I.S.A.) which has been declared unlawful by this Government under section 16 (1) of the I.C.L.A. Act 1908. The case relating to the Calcutta Bhandar was heard in the Court of Small Causes, Calcutta and the particulars of the case will be found in the judgment of the Court, a copy of which is enclosed. It appears from that the claim by the Trustees was allowed on the ground that (1) the properties seized at the Bengal Branch Office belonged to the Bombay Office which had not been declared unlawful and (II) that there was no evidence to show that the articles seized were used or might be used for the purposes of an unlawful association.

2. The two Bankura cases were similar in nature and there also the claimant Trustees were successful in getting back the seized properties.

Enclosure: Particulars of the Case

Statement of Case for the opinion of the learned Advocate-General of India.

Subject: Criminal Law Amendment Act (XIV of 1908).

- Encl. 1. Small Causes Courts Judgment
 2. File No. 317/32-C.&G., 1932.

In the Court of Small Causes of Calcutta.
Before the Chief Judge.

Proceeding No. I of 1943 under the provisions of sub-sections (b) and (7) of Section 17 B of the Criminal Law Amendment Act (Act XIV of 1908) in respect of representations made to the Commissioner of Police, Calcutta and forwarded by him.

The All India Spinners' Association & ors vs

The Province of Bengal

Judgment

This proceeding arises under the provisions of sub-sections (6) and (7) of Section 17B of the Indian Criminal Law-Amendment Act (Act XIV of 1908) in respect of certain properties seized in certain premises in the College Street Market claimed by the All India Spinners' Association of Bombay and six other claimants whose representations under the provisions of sub-section (4) of Section 17 B of the said Act were rejected by the Commissioner of Police, Calcutta and forwarded to me under the provisions of sub-section (b) of Section 17 B for adjudication upon the representations.

2. The matter has been heard before me at some length and in making the adjudication under sub-section (6), under sub-section (6), under the provisions of sub-section (7) I have followed the procedure laid down in the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 for the investigation of claims so far as it could be made to apply.

3. The facts and circumstances which led up to the present proceedings are briefly these. The All India Spinners' Association of Bombay had amongst many other of its Bengal branches one at College Street Market, Calcutta. The municipal numbers were B 85, 86, 15 and 16 (converted into one room) on the ground floor. This was the shop room. On the first floor the municipal numbers were C. 28 to C 31. This was the office and go-down. It appears that as far back as the 11th October, 1942 under the Defence of India Rules there was a search of the aforesaid premises made by the Police. The goods and all properties in the aforesaid shop room, office and go-down were seized, locked up and sealed by the Police. Thereafter the business that was being carried on in the aforesaid premises ceased and the properties continued to remain in the custody of the police. No further action seems to have been taken in the matter until the 4th March, 1943 when the notification No. 901 P dated the 26th February, 1943 published in the Calcutta-Gazette dated the 4th March 1943 was issued declaring the All-India Spinners' Association, Bengal Branch unlawful by the Government of Bengal under the provisions of Section 16 (1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1908. On the same day another notification was issued declaring the place unlawful under the provisions of Section 17A (1) of the aforesaid Act. Thereupon it seems the Commissioner of Police commenced preparing a List of all moveable properties found in the aforesaid premises, from the 3rd March, 1943 to the 1st April, 1943 when it was said that the List was completed. Thereafter on the 2nd April, 1943 the Commissioner of Police issued a notification calling upon any person claiming that any article not liable to forfeiture to submit in writing within 15 days any representation he desires to make against the forfeiture of the articles under the provisions of sub-section (4) of Section 17 B in respect of the ground floor only. On the 14th April, 1943 another notification was published by the Commissioner of Police in respect of the first floor. Claims in respect of the ground floor were filed on the 16th April 1943 and in respect of the first floor on the 19th April, 1943. On the 24th May, 1943 representations in respect of certain articles were rejected by the Commissioner of Police and were forwarded to me for adjudication under the provisions of sub-section (6) of Section 17B of the Act.

After giving the usual notices the investigation of the claim proceeded before me.

At the commencement of the proceedings the following issues were raised and consented to by both sides — (1) are the claimants interested in or possessed of the properties seized, (2) whether the articles specified in the List, are or may be used for the purposes of the unlawful Association.

The claimant No. 6 Messrs. P.D. Himatsinka & Co., Solicitors for the Trustees of the Board of Trust, All India Spinners' Association is the principal claimant who is contesting. Claimant No. 7 is the Corporation of Calcutta who are claiming certain fixtures, and the other claimants are employees of the All India Spinners' Association, Bengal Branch, and they are claiming certain articles as their personal belongings.

So far as the evidence is concerned claimant No. 6 called their Secretary Babu Jitendra Kumar Chakravarti who was examined and cross examined at some length. Claimant No. 7 the Corporation called their bill collecting Sircar Babu Narendra Kumar Banerjee. Besides these, no other witnesses have been examined.

I will now deal with Issue No. 1. The evidence adduced on behalf of claimant No. 6 has clearly established the fact that the All India Spinners' Association, Bengal Branch carrying on business in the College Street Market is only a Branch of the All India Spinner's Association, Bombay. The business of the Bengal Branch was carried on through its Secretary who received all his orders from the Head Office in Bombay. The Articles of Association and many resolutions passed by the Directors at the Head Office and communicated to the Secretary of the Bengal Branch have proved this fact. Moreover, their evidence shows that the Secretary of the Bengal Branch submitted the budget estimate of the year to the Head Office which approved and sanctioned the same. Income Tax Returns were also sent to the Head Office in Bombay. There are innumerable entries in books of accounts which have been produced before me which clearly show how monies were disbursed and credited in accordance with the instructions sent from the Head Office to the Secretary of the Bengal Branch from time to time. On an examination of all the documentary as well as oral evidence adduced before me I cannot but come to the irresistible conclusion that the claimant No. 6 carried on business through its Bengal Branch at the College Street Market and the properties claimed by them belong to them and were in their possession at the time of the seizure. There is abundant evidence to support this fact and there is no rebutting evidence to prove otherwise. With regard to the other claimants, except claimant No. 7, the Corporation of Calcutta, it has also been proved by evidence that they are employees of the Bengal Branch. There is also evidence to show that the properties claimed by them belong to them. The very nature of some of the articles claimed, e.g. Punjabis, dhoties and other wearing apparel, clearly proves their ownership in the absence of any rebutting evidence. With regard to the claimant No. 7, the Corporation of Calcutta who are claiming certain fixtures, they are the owners thereof and were in possession through their tenants. On the determination of the tenancy, they will be entitled to take actual possession of the same, so their claim is allowed on that basis.

9. As regards all the other claimants I find on the evidence that having proved that the properties set out in the List made by the Commissioner of Police they are entitled to the possession of the said properties with the exception of a certain number of pamphlets which are alleged to contain objectionable matters and some magic lantern slides. The claimant No. 6 has abandoned his claim in respect of these pamphlets and magic lantern slides.

10. I now come to issue No. 2 as to whether or not the articles specified in the List are or may be used for purposes of the unlawful Association. So far as this issue is concerned there is not an iota of evidence to support it. It has of course been contended before me that these articles are or may be used for the unlawful Association. In the absence of any evidence proving the fact such an argument is not only untenable but preposterous. From the very nature of the articles mentioned in the List it would be absurd to hold that such articles are or may be used for the unlawful Association. It has been suggested that the money realized by the sale of these articles in the course of business are or may be diverted for the unlawful Association and that in sub-section (2) of Section 17 B after the words 'any articles specified in the list' should be understood to include the words their 'equivalent value in money.' In my opinion by no stretch of imagination or language there can be such an interpretation of the sub-section (2) runs as follows:

(2) If, in the opinion of the District Magistrate, or in a Presidency town the Commissioner of Police, any articles specified in the list are or may be used for the purposes of the unlawful association, he may proceed subject to the provisions hereafter contained in this section to order such articles to be forfeited to His Majesty

From the above it is quite clear that the provisions of the sub-section provides for dealing with only articles specified in the list and nothing more. Moreover, there is specific provision namely Section 17E which similarly provides for dealing with monies, securities or credits, and this being so, it is idle to argue that the articles or their equivalent value in money should be understood, when there is a specific provision of law dealing with monies etc.

11. It is a curious fact that on the 11th October, 1942 when the articles were seized under the Defence of India Rules and locked up by the Commissioner of Police, the business naturally closed and how it can now be argued that after the lapse of so many months while the goods remained in the custody of the police locked and sealed, they are or may be used for the unlawful Association.

12. Having considered the matter in the light of the evidence that has been adduced before me and in the absence of any evidence adduced by the opposite party I find that the articles seized cannot be used for the unlawful Association.

13. It is admitted that the All India Spinners' Association of Bombay has not been declared an unlawful Association, and as I have found on the evidence that the articles seized belong to the said All India Spinners' Association of Bombay and their employees, in my opinion they are entitled to possession thereof; and the articles seized should be delivered to them.

with the exception of the pamphlets and magic lantern slides for which the claimant No. 6 has abandoned their claim.

14. Let a copy of this decision be sent to the Commissioner of Police to enable him to take such action as he thinks fit and proper in accordance with the provisions of sub-section (3) of Section 17 B.

4. Security Prisoners. Since the last report, orders for the release of 58 prisoners have been issued and orders for the release of additional 28 are under issue. Since the end of April, Government have ordered the release of 86 prisoners and previous to that date they ordered the release of 116 prisoners. The aggregate number of prisoners affected by all orders passed so far is 202. The advisory committee has reviewed the grounds of detention of 127 prisoners and their recommendations on 21 more are awaited. The committee has recommended the release on condition of 40 prisoners, and the further detention of 55 prisoners. For special reasons the cases of 46 unreleased prisoners were not submitted to the committee.

Sir,

I am directed to say that the case was heard on the 2nd March 1944. Although the sentences passed by the Special Magistrates had been validated by Ordinance No. XIX of 1943, the Hon'ble Judges still held the trial to have been without jurisdiction and declined to interfere with the judgment of the trial court or to expunge the objectionable passages from the judgment. It appeared that they considered it was open to the Assam Government to obtain a proper order with proper remarks when the case of the absconding accused comes up for trial before an ordinary court. One of the absconders in the case is now on trial, but it is not possible to see how the result of this trial could affect the result of the former.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

Chief Secretary to the Government of Assam.

No. 4/3/43 – Poll (I)

New Delhi, the 23rd August, 1944

Our attention has recently been drawn to a judgement of Chief Judge in the Court of small Causes, Calcutta¹ holding that certain articles belonging to the Bengal Branch of the All India Spinners Association which had been forfeited pursuant on the declaration of the Branch to be an unlawful association, were not articles that could be used for the purposes of the unlawful association and should therefore be returned to their owners. The Judge also held that since the articles seized were the property of the parent association in Bombay, or of the employees thereof, and since that Association had not been declared unlawful, they were entitled to be returned on those grounds also.

2. The Judge was in our opinion labouring under a misapprehension in two respects; in the first place, the criterion on which forfeiture is to be decided is not that of ownership, but whether the article in question 'may be used for the purposes of an unlawful association' and in the second place, he appears to have confused the phrase 'for the purposes of an unlawful association' with 'for the unlawful activities of an unlawful association.'

3. A copy of an opinion recorded on this subject by the Advocate – General of India is attached for information. We trust that this will be of assistance to you in arguing points of this nature should they arise in future cases, either Civil or Criminal, arising out of action taken under the Criminal Law Amendment Act. We consider it particularly important that the doctrine that a branch of an organisation cannot effectively be declared an unlawful association without so declaring the parent organisation, should be effectively resisted.

(R. Tottenham)

Additional Secretary to the Government of India.

Enclosure

Opinion of the Advocate General of India

1. The questions put to me relate to the interpretation of certain sections of the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, XIV of 1908. The All-India Spinners Association has its registered office in Bombay. It had branches in various provinces, one of which was the Bengal Branch in Calcutta. On the 28th February 1943, the Bengal Government, acting under Section 16 of the Act, declared the Bengal Branch to be an unlawful Association. The first question put to me is —

Can a branch be declared an unlawful association without declaring the parent institution an unlawful association?

In section 15 the word 'association' has been defined to mean any combination or body of persons, whether the same be known by any distinctive name or not. I take it that the Bengal Branch consisted of a body of persons who acted under the guidance of the parent body in Bombay. The Branch was a distinct entity and, as such, could be declared an unlawful Association provided that it consisted of a combination or body of persons. The answer to the question is in the affirmative.

2. The second question is —

Is the question of title at all material to the exercise of the right of forfeiture under Section 17B of the Act? Is the adjudicating tribunal under Section 17B (b) entitled to go into the question of title?

Under section 17B (2), the articles liable to forfeiture are 'articles specified in the list which in the opinion of the District Magistrate or the Commissioner of Police are or may be used for the purposes of an unlawful association.' The criterion is user, either actual or potential, irrespective of the ownership of the articles. The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative. The second part of the question is a corollary to the first. Adjudication of the question whether any article is liable to forfeiture depends on the opinion, as to user as aforesaid, of the District Magistrate or Commissioner of Police, subject to revision by the District Judge or Chief Judge, Small Cause Court respectively. Any person can make a representation claiming, not ownership of the article, but that the article 'is not liable to forfeiture'. This means that the representation, to be valid, has to show that the article is not used nor capable of being used for the purposes of an unlawful association. Ownership of the article, or, in other words, the question of title is immaterial. Liability to forfeiture being the question for adjudication, the adjudicating tribunal can only take into consideration the matter of user or fitness for use and cannot go into the question of title. If title bears upon user, then, it may be relevant. For instance, a pair of old shoes seized in a notified place may be claimed by the owner as not being used not fit for use for purposes of the unlawful association concerned. Here, the claim is based, not on title, but on user or fitness for use for a particular purpose. The answer to the second part of the question is in the negative.

3. The third question is —

Does the expression 'for the purposes of the unlawful association' cover only the unlawful activities of an unlawful association and not its other activities?

In my opinion, the expression covers all activities. It is not limited to unlawful activities. The whole object is to immobilize the unlawful association and kill all its activities.

4. The fourth question is –

(On whom is the burden of proof to be laid in the course of an adjudication under Section 17B (6)?

The proceedings start with seizure under Section 17B (1). The, the District Magistrate or Commissioner of Police has to consider the question of user and form an opinion, and in case the opinion is adverse, to order forfeiture. Forfeiture does not become operative till publication of the intention to forfeit under sub-section (4) and consideration of claims and rejection thereof under sub-section (6). The claimant has to make good his claim that the user of the seized article is innocent and not for any purpose of the unlawful association. If no claim be made or the claim is not made good, then the order of forfeiture stands. The burden of proof is, therefore, on the claimant. It should be noticed that when a District Magistrate or Commissioner of Police rejects the representation of a claimant, all he has to forward to the District Judge or Chief Judge Small Cause Court is his decision only, without any reasons for his opinion. The claimant cannot succeed unless he is able to displace that opinion. The burden is, therefore, on the claimant.

B.L. Mitter,
Advocate General of India.

Your express letter No. 44/52/44 – Poll (I), dated 25.8.1944 [copy appended with this document – Ed.] regarding the habeas corpus petition filed by Sardul Singh Caveeshar.¹

2. The High Court has agreed to hear the case in camera.

3. Sardul Singh Caveeshar applied for a copy of his detention order under rule 26,

D.O.I.R., on 3.5.43.² There being no provision either in the D.O.I. Act or in the rules made thereunder entitling a detenu to a copy of his detention order no copy was supplied, but the Superintendent of the Sub-Jail, Dharamsala, was told that he could show the detention order to the detenu. This application was disposed of before the receipt of your letter No. 2-DC (14)/44, dated 29.2.44.³ Sardul Singh Caveeshar has not submitted any application for legal assistance in the preparation of his habeas corpus petition to the High Court. He was previously allowed an interview with Mehta Amar Nath, Advocate, Lahore, on the 3rd of October, 1943, in connection with an appeal to the Privy Council and an application to the High Court for his release.

4. The present order of the Punjab Government determining the place of detention of Sardul Singh Caveeshar is open to the same objection as that raised in respect of the order passed in the case of Jai Prakash Narayan. It is, therefore, requested that an order under section 3 (4) of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance be passed by the Central Government and forwarded to us before the next hearing of the case on September the 11th. A copy of the Pb. Government order of July 28th, 1944,⁴ is enclosed.

5. The Assistant Advocate General has raised the question as to whether power was duly delegated to the Additional Secretary to the Government of India on whose signature the order of the Central Government under Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules, dated 9.3.42, was issued and to the Joint Secretary to the Government of India on whose signature the order under section 9 of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance dated 1.7.44 was issued, or whether the matter in both cases received the personal attention of H.E. the Governor-General. The Assistant Advocate-General requires an affidavit on this point to be produced in court and it is requested that this may be forwarded to us with the least possible delay.

6. Our Advocate-General is on leave, and the Assistant Advocate-General is somewhat inexperienced. It is, therefore, suggested that since Sardul Singh is a Central Government prisoner, your Advocate-General might be instructed to appear in the High Court in his case on September the 11th, as he will be present in Lahore on that date in connection with the petitions of Dwijendra Nath Bose and Arabindo Bose.

No. 44/52/44 - Poll (I), New Delhi, the 25th August, 1944.

Your memorandum No. S-4263-B.D.S.B. dated 18th August, 1944, forwarding a copy of a habeas corpus petition filed by Sardul Singh Caveeshar.

2. We agree that if the Court declines to hear the case in camera, it will be desirable to issue orders under Defence Rule 41 prohibiting all references to the proceedings in the Press. We should be glad to have as long as possible advance notice, should this action on our part be necessary.

3. We observe that in paragraph 5 of his petition, Caveeshar refers to the refusal of the Home Member, Government of India, to supply him with a copy of the order under which he is detained. We can find no authority for this statement. Refusal to supply him with a copy of this order would of course be contrary to the General instructions on the subject contained in the Government of India Defence Department letter No. 2-DC (14)/44 dated 29th February 1944. We note further in paragraphs 9 and 10 that Caveeshar makes much of the fact that he has not been permitted legal assistance in the preparation of his petition. We shall be glad to have your comments on this allegation. Please see our D.O. letter No. IV/3/43-M.S. dated 1st May 1944.

4. You will no doubt see that the Punjab Government's order of 24th March, 1943, is not open to the objections which were recently pointed out in J.P. Narayan's case (see this Department's letter No. III/4/43-M.S. dated 22nd August 1944) and we should be glad to be supplied with a copy of this order as soon as possible.

New Delhi, the 8th September 1944.

My dear Barrets,

Our case against Congress or the Congress High Command, for responsibility for the 1942 disturbances is now about as complete as we can hope to make it except in one important respect – namely, judicial pronouncements on the subject. As a result of various letters to Provincial Governments we have received a large collection of judgments in rebellion cases; but the supply of these has dried as for the last year; and in any case, we have found it an almost impossible task to go through all those that we have received, extract from them the sort of thing we have been looking for. We have no desire whether to impose further work on Provincial Governments, nor do we ourselves want to receive any further complete copies of judgments. What we have in mind rather is that each Provincial Government (or, at least each Provincial C.I.D. or Special Branch) would have no difficulty in recollecting any really important pronouncements by the courts (naturally the higher, the better), on the general question of the responsibility of the Congress organisation or its leaders for the disturbances. If we could make a representative collection of such pronouncements in the form of brief extracts from judgments, it would be a very valuable addition to our records. We realize that in some Provinces there may be no such pronouncements, while in others there may not be more not be more than one or two. That does not greatly matter. Even a dozen good instances covering the whole of British India would be quite sufficient. If, therefore, any examples of the kind of thing we want readily occur to you we should be very much obliged if you could let us have them. If you have already sent us the judgment containing the pronouncements in question, it would, of course, be sufficient simply to refer us to them.

Yours sincerely,

245: Official Notings regarding the continued detention of 4 men of the Army (dt 14.9.1944-21.12.1944) (Extracts)

File No. 39/16/44 - Home Poll (I)

[NAI]

There were originally four men of the 1/15 Punjab Regiment under detention. They were

1. Subedar Kartar Singh, Sikh, s/o Achhar Singh of Hoshiarpur District.
2. Hav. Ujagar Singh, Sikh, s/o Suchet Singh of Lyallpur District.
3. 1/NK Piara Singh, Sikh, s/o Harnam Singh of Lahore District.
4. Sep. Nazar Singh, Sikh, s/o Santa Singh of Hoshiarpur District.

They were believed to be implicated in an attempted murder of Hav. Hazara Singh, but it was impossible to secure sufficient evidence to bring anyone to trial although there were strong enough grounds for the discharge of all four men from the Army. Investigation which followed the attempted murder led to disclosure of anti-British, pro-Japanese and pro-Congress sentiments among some men of the unit.

2. H.M. in his minute of 30.6.44 recommended the release of Kartar Singh and D.I.B. and D.M.I. agreed. The remaining three were detained under orders which will be in force until 6th October, 1944.

3. Summaries of the evidence against these three men are in the folder below (flag 'N'). (Notes below)

(a) Hav. Ujagar Singh. Three independent sources made statements that Ujagar Singh was connected with subversive organisations and was therefore a danger to security if he remained at large. However his alleged friendliness with an individual suspected of an attempted murder cannot be considered as contributory ground for detention. In any case, this allegation comes from Hazara Singh who was the victim of the attempt. It is doubtful therefore whether we can accept this or for that matter any other of Hazara Singh's statements which may well have been made after the attempted murder (the date of which is not given) and, even if made before, might possibly have been based on personal enmity which eventually led up to the attempted murder. The case against Ujagar Singh rests on little more than two independent statements which do not in my mind justify further detention and I feel we should ask for more evidence. (In August 1944, Ujagar Singh was interrogated in C.S.D.I.C. but we have had no details).

(b) L/NK Piara Singh. The evidence against Piara Singh does not, as it stands, justify continued detention. The only important item against him is his friendship with Hardy Singh unless of course Hazara Singh is considered reliable. H.M. in his minute of 30.6.44 disposed of the statement made by the 'four witnesses'. There are I think sufficient grounds for restriction.

(c) Sep. Nazar Singh. The case against Nazar Singh is very flimsy. There is really no evidence to warrant further detention and Nazar Singh, together with the other three, has paid some penalty already in the form of discharge from the Army and will have spent six months in prison. He should, I feel, be restricted to his village.

14.9.44.

(G.A.T. Shaw)

Attache.

U.S. (I).

I would also draw attention to the representations made by these three prisoners in reply to the communication of grounds of detention at pages 24-16/c.

2. I doubt whether, with the material available, we are in a position to make possible exception is Ujagar Singh whose further detention on the available material would probably I think be justified. We should in all three case ask D.M.I. for further information. This should include the interrogation report of Ujagar Singh; and if the other two prisoners have not been interrogated, we might I think suggest that this should be done.

3. Leaving a sufficient period for submission to H.M. and for communication of orders to the Resident, Indore, we have less than a fortnight in which to obtain this further information. I doubt whether it will be forthcoming within this period. We say ask D.M.I. whether he is likely to be able to supply us with further material by September 30th. If not, we may ask him to obtain the information required separately and send it on to us in due course as available, and meanwhile to return this file without delay. We shall then have to extend all three detention orders pending a full examination of the case, as was done in the case of the C.I.H. and R.I.A.S.C. prisoners. This is not a very satisfactory method, but I see no alternative.

4. It is clear that an average review of a detention case if, thoroughly carried out, is likely to take considerable more than the one month's grace during which extension orders can be passed under section 9 of the Ordinance. There is nothing however to prevent cases being examined before the beginning of this month and I think it should in future be routine that all cases are submitted for commencement of review at least two months before the detention order is due to expire.

2. These men were detained at the request of, and on evidence provided by, H.Q. Southern Army. We have now asked that H.Q. for any further evidence they may have on record or have obtained since the men were detained.

3. Taking into consideration the past unrest in this unit, I recommend strongly that these three men should continue in detention for a further period of three months while their case is being re-examined.

Will H.M. please see notes from p. 30 ante? The detention orders against these three persons will expire if not extended before October 6th. I agree that the case should have been taken up for consideration earlier and that more information is really required. I agree also with D.S. that, strictly speaking, the fact that we require further information shows that we are not satisfied and, if we are not satisfied originally that it was necessary to detain these people and I do not think their representations, by themselves, are sufficient to make us change our view. I would, therefore, recommend the issue of extension orders in these cases on the understanding that they will be reconsidered as soon as the full report has been received from H.Q. Southern Army. It is also most important that these cases should be taken up for review in future in plenty of time, even though the extension orders cannot issue until some time during the month preceding the date of expiry of the original orders.

General Staff Branch
(M.I. Directorate)

In continuation of my note, dated 27 Sep 44, at page 33 of the file, it has not been possible to produce additional evidence against the three men now under detention.

2. In such cases, evidence in detail sufficient for normal legal action, is seldom forthcoming and it may be pointed out that, had such evidence been available, the men would have been put on trial instead of being detained. Other considerations must be taken into account and in this case the Security history of this unit shows that a spirit of unrest had prevailed for some years and that there had been contact with SUBHAS CHANDRA BOSE before the latter escaped to Europe. It was from 1/15 Punjab Regt. that a platoon of Sikhs deserted to the enemy in 1943 and included one of the original Bose contacts who had become a senior N.C.O. The majority of these men are still in enemy hands and most of them are believed to be cooperating with the Japanese against us. I may add that investigation into the past history of this unit is still continuing and the C.I.D. are cooperating with the military authorities in this enquiry. Some of the missing platoon have been recaptured and information obtained from them confirmed that intrigues lasting over years created a very unhealthy spirit in this unit. This continued investigation of the case may well result in the provision of further evidence or material against the three men now detained. In the meantime there is justification for the comment that much trouble would have been prevented in the Army during this war if trouble makers against whom the information was 'Light' had been dealt with vigorously under wartime emergency legislation. The object of this legislation is, it is submitted, to cover such contingencies, and to insist on too high a degree of proof in such cases is to vitiate and render the legislation abortive.

3. As pointed out an exhaustive enquiry failed to produce legal evidence on which to try these men. Government of India in the Home Department were approached and approved their detention on the evidence available. The same conditions still exist, although additional evidence is not available, I strongly recommend that the three men continue in detention while investigations continue and while the Officer Commanding the unit is doing his utmost to restore a healthy spirit amongst his men.

4. With reference to Home Department note, dated 10 Nov. 44, on page 38, it is not desired to interrogate Piara Singh or Nazar Singh as this was done most thoroughly during the Court of Enquiry held in the unit. In addition, the interrogation of Hav. Ujagar Singh at C.S.D.I.C. revealed nothing new.

5. A copy of the Security history of the unit is attached for information.

U.O.No. 5641/VI/DMI dated 16.11.44.

War Department

I agree with Home Department that, if these cases are looked at in a judicial light from the point of view of whether there is enough evidence to convict an individual, the evidence is scanty and insufficient. But surely the DMI is right in suggesting that it was not intended that Ordinance cases should be viewed in quite this light, and this appears to have been the initial view of the Home Department. The emphasis, it is suggested, has shifted so that instead of considering whether there is danger of injustice to an individual (which must always be the first consideration in a judicial enquiry), we have to consider first whether there is danger to the State.

2. The dangers are first, that recruiting may be affected, and secondly that enemy agent in the country may contact these men and be assisted in introducing subversive material to serving troops. The first of these is the lesser danger though the more probable. The second, which is much more serious, must be considered in the light not only of the actual evidence against the individuals, but the evidence against the unit, for which the statement at 'O' should be seen.

3. It seems clear that men in the unit contacted Bose sympathizers and that as a result someone introduced subversive material which resulted in the desertion of a platoon. The enquiry indicated that these men were the leaders; and since there must have been some leaders, we can only suppose that these men were not leaders if we assume that there were other leaders whom enquiry has failed to reveal. I feel there are no grounds for such an assumption. I suggest that we must examine the case in the spirit of Addl. Secretary Home Dept.'s note of the 26th February in which he wrote 'The opinion formed of these four men is no doubt the result of the impression they created under examination or interrogation and even if the "material" against them may not in all cases seem very convincing, we cannot lightly reject the advice of the responsible military authorities'.

4 War Department therefore concur in the view of the DMI in the case of these men. Home Department will no doubt consult DIB; and we should be glad to know their views in the light of remarks. I do not think we need refer the matter to the War member until this has been done.

This case concerns 3 men of the 1/15th Punjab Regt. Hav. Ujagar Singh, L/NK Piara Singh, and Sep. Nazar Singh. We have practically no information regarding the reasons why the military authorities require these men's detention... There was apparently an attempt on the life of one Hav. Hazara Singh but what the motives of that murder were we do not know. In the case of the first two we have some vague allegations of their having had some political contacts of having been friendly with a Havildar who deserted to the Japanese. All that I can find against Nazar Singh, except that he deserted from one unit and joined another is that he is suspected of having written an anonymous letter and of having been concerned in the attempt to murder the Havildar.

2. On 28th September further information was asked for but none has been forthcoming. It must be clearly understood that Home Department cannot agree to keep people indefinitely in detention on vague information of this sort.

3. In the circumstances Hazara Singh and Piara Singh may remain in detention till their orders expire on 5-4-45. If no further information of a reliable and serious nature is forthcoming by then they will be released. Nothing that we have against Nazar Singh justifies his further detention. He should be released at once. It does not seem necessary to apply any restrictions.

Dated Camp Abu, the 23rd September 1944.

In view of the rumours that have been circulating about the possibility of underground Congress workers surrendering themselves to the authorities, the Government of India thought it advisable to examine the position in respect of detention orders issued during the 1942-43 Disturbances which remained unserved owing to the fact that the person against whom they were directed had absconded.

2. Such orders of course continued in force when Ordinance No. III of 1944 was promulgated, by virtue of section 6 of the Ordinance. The Government of India are however advised that, even though they remained unexecuted, the provisions of section 9 of Ordinance No. III must be held to apply; that is to say, any such order that was not extended before July 15th expired on that date.

3. In view of the above, the State will no doubt examine the position with regard to persons who have evaded detention by absconding and, if the old orders have not been extended, will issue fresh orders of detention in cases where they are considered necessary.

Order

This order will also govern Miscellaneous criminal case No. 72 of 1944. The cases arise out of applications under S.491 (1), Criminal P.C. The applications are in respect of Purushottam Yeshwant Deshpande* and Yeshwant Vishnu Lele. In order to appreciate the points involved, it will be necessary to set out a few relevant facts from the applications and the affidavits which support them. Purushottam Yeshwant Deshpande is an Advocate of the High Court. He is also an Editor of the Bhavitavya a Marathi Weekly which is printed by the Independent Press. He lives in Craddock town and the office of the Bhavitavya is situated in the adjacent block. W.G. Sheorey, is the Editor, Printer and Publisher of the Independent, an English Weekly. He is also the Printer of the Bhavitavya. He lives in a house on the Jail Road in the compound of which is situated the office of the Independent and the press in which it is printed. One Inamdar was employed as a clerk in the Bhavitavya office but he left service in May 1944. On 21st August 1944, at about 6.50 a.m. Mr R.K. Misra, Additional District Magistrate, Nagpur, accompanied by several police officers and a posse of constables, surrounded the residence of Deshpande in Congress Nagar and searched the house and the office of the Bhavitavya till 1.30 p.m. and seized certain articles. During the course of the search, the police took down the numbers of certain 100 rupee notes. After the search the party left and instructed Deshpande to attend the Sitabuldi Police Station at 3 p.m. He went to the Police Station again and was interrogated by the police. He was then arrested and put in the police lock-up at Sitabuldi. He was not informed why he was arrested nor was he told what the charges against him was.

On 22nd August 1944, which was a holiday on account of Ganesh Chaturthi, Deshpande was removed to the police lock-up in the compound of the District Magistrate's Court and kept there for the whole day. In the afternoon, at about 5 p.m. he was removed to the Central Jail at Nagpur. A report was published in the Hitavada of 22nd August 1944 about the searches and arrests made on that date. The relevant portion of the reports is reproduced below:

It is reported that: simultaneous search were carried out at Wardha also and some five rupee notes were seized.

These searches are stated to be connected with an armed dacoity alleged to have been committed in East Khandesh some time in April last. . . . The persons connected with the dacoity are still absconding and the search is stated to have been made with a view to catching the absconders.

Waman Venkatesh Deshpande, a nephew of the Deshpande whose case we are considering was questioned by a police officer regarding Inamdar, his visitors and his present whereabouts. Deshpande informed the officer that Inamdar was at one time employed as a clerk in the Bhavitavya Office but that he left some time in May 1944. On 23rd August 1944, at about 10.15 a.m., two persons said to be police officers from Bombay, went to the house of Purushottam Deshpande and asked his wife about Inamdar and his friends. On the same day, 23rd August 1944, Mr V.K. Ringe, an Advocate of this court, was instructed by Deshpande's wife to see Deshpande in jail in order to obtain necessary facts from him to enable an application for bail to be made, but the Superintendent, Central Jail, Nagpur, refused to grant an interview on the ground that Deshpande was detained under R.129, Defence of India Rules. Then, on 25th August 1944, Deshpande's wife, Mrs Vimalabai Deshpande, filed the present application under S.491 (1) (b), Criminal P.C. praying that he be set a liberty as his detention was illegal and improper. This application was supported by an affidavit sworn by Waman Venkatesh Deshpande, his nephew. Relevant paragraphs from the application are reproduced below:

12. That from the nature of the inquiry by the Police and from the report in the Hitarada it appears that Bombay Police are investigating into an offence of dacoity and are trying to trace the offenders. The enquiries regarding Inamdar suggest an inference that the police suspect that the said Inamdar who was probably a suspect in the eyes of the police was harboured in the Bhavtarya office.

14. That searches and enquiries by the police having been ostensibly made in connection with an attempt to trace the offenders in a dacoity alleged to have been committed in Bombay Presidency, the arrest of the applicant's husband ought to have been made under the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code. But it appears that R.129, Defence of India Rules has been deliberately and in utter want of good faith used in order to prevent Mr Deshpande from pursuing the ordinary legal remedies and to deprive him of his ordinary legal rights. This is an abuse of the Defence of India Act and the rules framed thereunder.

15. That the arrest of Mr Deshpande under R.129, Defence of India Rules is a gross abuse of powers by the authorities, malicious and a fraud upon the law.'

These paragraphs specifically challenge the detention as illegal and improper on the ground that there was utter want of good faith, gross abuse of power and a fraud upon the law. The application also complained that a request for an interview with counsel had been refused. On 28th August 1944 this Court directed issue of notice of the application to the opposite party for a date to be fixed in office. The Superintendent, Central Jail Nagpur, was further directed to produce a copy of the warrant or order under which Deshpande was detained. The office fixed the hearing for 11th September 1944. On the same day, 28th August 1944, Waman Venkatesh Deshpande filed an affidavit stating that his uncle had been taken from the Central Jail to the lock-up of the Police Station in the District court compound on 27th August 1944 and that he was being detained in police custody. He stated that he believed that he had been kept there continuously from 27th August 1944 for purposes of interrogation. On 30th August 1944, another application was filed in this Court, seeking information from the Crown, or the Provincial Government, on certain points. We reproduce the relevant portions below:

'2. . . the following information is necessary in order to enable full and complete arguments to be advanced at the hearing: (i) who is the ultimate officer who made or directed the arrest? (ii) What report of the fact of arrest was made to the Provincial Government by the officer making the arrest? (iii) Has the Provincial Government passed any order on such report under sub. 2 of R. 129? and if so, what? (iv) If the Provincial Government has passed no order, has the officer who made the arrest passed any order in writing in respect of the commitment of arrested person to custody? If so, what? (v) Is there any general or special order of Provincial Government about the commitment of the arrested person to custody? If so what? (vi) What is the purpose of transferring the applicant's husband to the lock-up in the compound of the District court?

3. . . . The hearing of the case in which the applicant urges that the arrest has been made by misusing the powers given by the Defence of India Rules should take place before the end of the first period.

4. . . . The applicant's husband has been transferred to the lock-up in the compound of the District court from the jail. . . . The purpose of the transfer is not known to the applicant. Presumably it is in connection with an inquiry into an offence under the Penal code and in order to enable the Police officer to have facilities of interrogation.

5. The applicant thinks it necessary that since interview by a lawyer was not permitted, the applicant's husband should be ordered to be produced before this Honourable Court to enable the Court to know all the circumstances about the arrest and detention.

6. That if this Honourable Court so decides, it may direct the Provincial Government to allow a lawyer to have an interview with Mr P.Y. Deshpande before the date of hearing.

7. The transfer of Mr P.Y. Deshpande from the Jail to the lock up and his continued detention there have given rise to a grave apprehension in the mind of the applicant. The applicant's husband is not in robust health and the transfer to the lock-up and detention there would certainly cause mental torture to him which will inevitably undermine his health. There being no restriction on the visits of the Police officers as regards the times and the periods the applicant's husband might be kept without sleep for days and this would amount to physical torture also. The applicant feels that detention in jail is the lesser of the two evils so long as detention continues.

8. The applicant prays for the following reliefs:

- (a) The Crown or the Provincial Government be ordered to apply the information specified in paragraph 2 of this petition. . . .
- (d) A lawyer of Mr P.Y. Deshpande should be permitted to have an interview with Mr P.Y. Deshpande at the place of his detention.

This application came up for hearing before a bench composed of Hemeon J. and one of us, Bose J., on 1st September 1944. An early hearing was asked for on the ground that the matter was urgent because of the detention in police custody. A complaint was also made in argument that interviews with counsel had not been granted. As to this, Bose J. remarked that there was no longer any difficulty about legal interviews. Notice was directed to issue to the Crown and the matter was fixed for hearing at 11 a.m. on 4th September 1944. The learned Advocate General happened to be present in Court in connexion with another case and he was told informally that the matter which would be considered on the 4th was the question of detention in police custody rather than jail custody. Counsel on both sides were told that the merits of the application would be considered on the 11th along with the application under S.491 (1) which had already been fixed for that date. But in order that the Provincial Government might have an opportunity of considering all the points raised, the order was couched in general terms and was as follows:

Issue notice to the Crown and in duplicate to the Legal Secretary to the Provincial Government to show cause of (this is a slip for 'against') the application dated 30-8-44. Three copies to be supplied to the Advocate General today. The case will be heard on Monday at 11 a.m. (4.9.44.)

On 4th September 1944, the learned Advocate-General filed a copy of an order of the Provincial Government dated 26th August 1944, directing that Deshpande be detained in police custody during the remaining period of his detention of 15 days expiring on 4th September 1944, and stated that there might not be a fresh extension of the period of detention and that Deshpande might be released. Accordingly the case was fixed for 5th September 1944 instead of being taken up on the 4th. Complaint was however still made that no legal interviews had been sanctioned and we were asked to pass orders regarding this. We told the learned Advocate General to look into the matter and to let us know the position on the following day at 11 a.m.

On the following day, 5th September 1944, the matter was taken up at 11 a.m. Counsel complained bitterly that they were in an exceedingly difficult position because no orders regarding an interview with the detenus had been passed and accordingly it was very difficult for them to set out the necessary facts in the absence of instructions from Deshpande himself. We asked the learned Advocate-General for an explanation and he assured us that after I.L.R. (1913) Nag.154 there was no longer any difficulty about interviews. He said that his instructions were that in Ringe's case Ringe did not even wait for an answer. He simply went to the jail, asked for an interview, and walked away again. This does not sound likely to us. But that apart we have an affidavit before us sworn by Deshpande's nephew who was present in person and who swears to the matter to his personal knowledge, that an interview was refused on the ground that Deshpande was detained under R.129. There is no affidavit in reply. The complaint about this was made on 28th August 1944, and was repeated on 1st September 1944 and on 4th September 1944. So there was ample time for the Provincial Government to make an affidavit in reply, particularly as both of us stressed on 1th September 1944, that an adverse inference would be drawn against the Provincial Government if no affidavit refuting the facts set out in the affidavits before us was filed. In the circumstances we can only conclude that the allegations in W.V. Deshpande's affidavit are true.

The next excuse the learned Advocate-General made on behalf of the Provincial Government was that no panel of names had been supplied to Government and that the understanding reached after Prabhakar 'Tare' case was that a panel of names should be supplied so that Government might choose from among the panel. He also said that Deshpande had not asked for an interview but that his wife had made the application. We pointed out that four senior members of the High Court Bar were appearing in the case and that surely by now Government could have made up its mind as to which it would select, or if it considered them all undesirable, could have made alternative proposals.

The Advocates appearing in Deshpande's case are Dr T.J. Kedar, Mr T.L. Sheode, Mr M. Adhikari and Mr B.L. Gupta. They filed their memorandum of appearance on 21th August 1944, and the application of 30th August of which copies were supplied to the Advocate General by the orders of this court, is signed by Messrs Adhikari and Gupta. Messrs Kedar, Adhikari and Sheode appeared on 1st September 1944. These are counsel of eminence in the profession and of status. Dr T.J. Kedar is one of the leaders of the Bar with over 35 years practice. He was Vice-Chancellor of the Nagpur University for six years and as such was in honorary command of the University Training Corps. He was also a Minister for some time and has been a member of the Provincial Legislature for many years. Mr T.L. Sheode is the President of the High Court Bar Association and was formerly a member of the Bar Council. He is one of the leaders of the Bar and has put in over 34 years of practice. Mr Adhikari is a senior lawyer of over 24 years practice and Mr Gupta has put in over 21 years of practice and is a Lecturer in the University College of Law. What possible objection could there have been to one of these gentlemen being granted an interview? And in fact no objection was made. On the contrary we were repeatedly assured that no obstacles would be placed in the way of an interview. We told the Advocate-General that we would give the Provincial Government time till 4 p.m. to make up its mind.

At 4 p.m. the learned Advocate-General again assured us that there would be no trouble. We then asked him which lawyer was to be permitted to see Deshpande. He replied that an application regarding this should be made to the District Superintendent of Police as he was now in charge of the prisoner. On this we were sharp with him and told him that the Provincial Government must choose immediately between Messrs. Kedar and Sheode and that unless it did so we would either direct Deshpande to be brought before us and permit him to interview any counsel he chose or release him altogether. On this the learned Advocate-General stated that his instructions were that there would be no objection to either Dr Kedar or Mr Sheode interviewing Deshpande. We accordingly directed that an interview be granted to Mr Sheode.

This is a deplorable attitude, unbecoming a Provincial Government. We could have appreciated a straightforward stand to the effect that under the Defence of India Act and Rules no interviews need be granted and that is a matter which lies in the sole and exclusive province of the Provincial Government. We could have understood the Crown seeking to make this or any other case a test case, and asking for a ruling so that one side or the other might test its validity before a higher tribunal—either the Federal Court or the Privy Council. We could have understood a request for a reference to a Full Bench. All that would have been candid and wholly proper. These are difficult times and the authorities torn between the stress and strain of war demands and the normal calls of peace time government, have unenviable duties to discharge. They are armed with special powers under an Act and rules which judges trained to the law find it difficult and perplexing to construe. Opinions differ widely about them — even judicial opinion — and strong views are held on both sides as the powerful dissenting judgments of Lord Atkin in (1941) 3 ALL E.R. 335 and Lord Shaw in Halliday's show. No judge would wish to be harsh or ungenerous in his criticisms of those who are called upon to administer these special and perplexing laws. But judges on their part are entitled to candour and frankness when the matter comes before them and they are entitled to expect that their decisions will be respected until they are set aside by Legislature or higher authority. They cannot allow the Court to be trifled with. What we cannot understand in this case is the repeated assurance that no obstacle would be placed in the way and then find some fresh obstruction at every stage.

The first complaint about interviews was made in the application of 25th August Notice of this was issued to the Crown. The complaint was repeated in the application of the 30th. It was again repeated in argument on 1st September in the presence of the Advocate General, who though not appearing on that date was present in Court and was given informal notice of the application by the Judges and more was supplied with three copies of the application at his express request. This application is signed by Messrs. Adhikari and Gupta. It expressly asks for an interview. the counsel who appeared and were present in Court were Messrs. Kedar, Adhikari and Sheode. The counsel who argued the application was Dr Kedar with Mr T.L. Sheode assisting him. Whatever doubts may have existed previously there could have been no doubt on that date either about the identity of counsel or about the fact that an interview was wanted. The complaint was again repeated in argument at 11 a.m. on 4th September—this time with considerable bitterness. Dr Kedar and Mr Sheode argued the application. The Crown had three days to consider its attitude. In spite of this we allowed another 24 hours to enable the Crown to consider the matter still further. Even then nothing had been done at 11 a.m. on the morning of the 5th and in spite of the fact that the Crown had before it the names of four senior lawyers of this court it contended that no panel of names had been furnished, and contended that the application was by Deshpande's wife and not by Deshpande himself. Even then we were forbearing and told the learned Advocate-General that these four senior counsel with two leaders of the Bar among them could be regarded as the panel and gave the Provincial Government time till 4 p.m. either to choose between them or furnish an alternative or (sic) names. And what were we told at 4 p.m.? After repeated assurances at each stage that no disrespect was intended and that every reasonable facility would be afforded we were told that an application for an interview should be made to the District Superintendent of Police.

Judicial patience and temper wear thin in such circumstances. This court, having negotiated with the Provincial Government direct through its Advocate-General regarding this request for permission to interview Deshpande, having allowed adjournments in the face of strong protest by the other side because of the assurances given, having furnished the Crown at its request, with a panel of four names consisting of two of the leaders of the Bar and two advocates of long standing and experience even though this panel of names had been before the Provincial Government for at least three days together with an application expressly asking for an interview, is told at the end of it all that an application to the District Superintendent of Police is now necessary. There was no assurance that the application would be granted. This can only be described as deplorable. One would have thought that if an interview were to be allowed at all that the more dignified course, quite apart from considerations of straightforwardness and frankness, would have been to assent to the position, however unwelcome with good grace from the start instead of trifling with the Court's time and patience and inviting avoidable criticism and adverse comment.

And all this was done to deprive a man of a little legal advice so that he might defend his liberty. All done in the name of public safety and the efficient prosecution of the war. Is the Realm really in such desperate straits? Are the war efforts really hampered or endangered if men are allowed legal advice to enable them to defend their liberties? We have certainly seen no evidence of it, nor do we believe that that can be possible. We have a more robust faith in the might of Allied arms. But if it does, or is likely to, then why not frankly and openly take away these rights and liberties by legislation? That is done elsewhere, particularly in countries with which we are at war. Why not here? After all the safety of the Realm is the paramount consideration. And if it is done it will be our duty to give effect to such laws however harsh or oppressive they may be. But if it is not done and if remnants of liberty are still left to the subject, then we cannot allow this Court to be made a mockery and its proceedings a farce. So long as the law says as it indubitably does that a man may defend his liberties in this Court in given circumstances, however restricted, we cannot allow the executive to deprive him of those rights and force us to conduct our proceedings in a manner which has been characterized by the Privy Council as opposed to natural justice—certainly opposed to the British justice which is administered in this court in His Majesty's name. Even the House of Lords in (1941) 3 ALL. E.R.338 said that an attempt to try an issue without a full and fair hearing would be 'startling', a 'fantastic result', and a 'travesty of a trial'. The point was also considered in I.L.R. (1943) Nag. 154 at p. 162.

The claims of the Crown are dangerous claims. What we decide today for A will ensure tomorrow for B. Even when this Act and its rules have gone other laws may take their place and the principles which we lay down now will live on. Other Governments with other views may come into being. Of course if that was the intention and meaning of those who framed this Act and its rules, and if that is the interpretation which the words used bear, then our duty is plain. But there is a human side to all laws, and in a matter of such fundamental importance we would require strong and indisputable evidence to convince us that that is what the Act and the rules import. Nor can it be forgotten that in this case a wife is seeking desperately for redress for her husband. And what is she told? — that her application is of no avail because her husband has made none. She is not allowed to find out from him what his wishes are and she is not even told that he does not wish to make an application. And in any event how can she know? How can she be sure that precious time is not being wasted while her husband's application is being bandied about from jailor to Magistrate, from Magistrate to jailor, from jailor to Secretariat, and from Secretariat back to jailor for oblivion in his files secure from the piercing scrutiny of this Court? That did not happen here. But it has happened. (See Misc. Cri. Case No. 47 of 1944) It might and will happen again if Judges shrink from their duty and relax their vigilance. And anyway, how can she know that it did not, seeing that it has.

This vexed question of interviews was thrashed out in I.L. R. (1943) Nag.154 decided in December 1942, and so far as this province is concerned the decision is that they must be granted. We were given to understand sometime ago that this principle had been accepted and that a modus operandi had been agreed upon. As far as we know no High Court has decided that legal advice can be wholly withheld. the only difference of opinion that we are aware of lies in the procedure to be followed. In the Bombay case, reported in I.L.R. (1943) Bom.433 at p. 439 the detenu was produced in Court and was permitted to interview his legal advisers there. In our view it is more convenient, and saves time and expense and trouble all round to leave this in the hands of Government.

On the Nagpur view Government is given wide latitude regarding the counsel whom the detenu may see and is afforded scope for regulating the place and manner of the interview. I can take all proper precautions against undesirable practices. On the other view it would be necessary in each case to have detenues from all over the province brought here every time an application is made. The learned Bombay Judges are agreed that the good faith of a detention can be challenged, and if challenged, that it must be enquired into. But how is any man to set forth his case if he is not allowed either to come in person to plead his own cause or to instruct any legal adviser who can do that for him? Once the principle is conceded that those orders can be challenged on certain grounds it becomes inevitable that means must be devised to enable this to be done effectively. No Court has yet held that there can never be any challenge. Even the House of Lords has conceded that there can and they have gone as far, in (1941) 3 ALL E.R. 338 as any court has yet gone in a matter touching the liberty of the subject. In our opinion the view taken in I.L.R. (1943) Nag. 154¹ is the most convenient all round. But whether that be so or not, that is the considered view of this Court and it must be followed until set right by higher authority, or overruled by a Full Bench. we draw attention in this regard to the observations of Lord Reading C.J. in (1916) 1 K B. 595 at p. 610:

This is the King's court: we sit here to administer justice and to interpret the laws of the realm in the King's name. It is respectful and proper to assume that once the law is declared by a competent judicial authority it will be followed by the Crown.

After the decision in I.L.R. (1943) Nag. 154 any refusal in this province to grant an interview along the lines laid down there: or to afford a detenu reasonable facilities for access to legal advice, or any attempts to place obstacles in his way, will amount to an abuse of power and might even justify an order for immediate release: See also I.L.R. (1944) Nag. 629 at pp. 636, 637. To return now to the facts. When the case was taken up on the 5th the learned Advocate General produced a copy of another order of the Provincial Government dated 2nd September 1944 directing that P.Y. Deshpande be detained in police custody for a further period of fifteen days from 5th September 1944. Mr Sheode had the long sought' for interview on the 5th. The purport of the interview is set out in the affidavit of Waman Venkatesh Deshpande dated 8th September 1944. The relevant portions are reproduced below:

- (i) The local police and the Bombay CID police interrogated the detenu only about some dacoity alleged to have taken place in the Bombay Presidency, particularly with reference to one Inamdar, who was in his (detenu's) service as a clerk in the Bhavitavya office and who left his service in May 1944 last. . . . The detenu was further asked whether he knew the whereabouts of the said Inamdar and about his (Inamdar's) friends and associates alleged to be connected with the aforesaid dacoity.
- (ii) All these interrogations continued both in jail and in the lock-up for about 6 or 7 days and since the last 3 or 4 days all this is stopped altogether.
- (iii) Not a single question was ever put to the detenu at any time about war activities, or about other topic. In fact the whole enquiry centred round the dacoity affair only.
- (iv) Since the interrogation stopped, the detenu is required to wash his clothes, and clean the pots of his daily use, which formerly used to be done by his servant who took his meals to the lock-up and he has thus been deprived of the amenities which were allowed to him previously.

The case was taken up again on 11th September 1944. On that the learned Advocate-General filed a statement on behalf of the Provincial Government supported by an affidavit of Mr Jayaratnam, Chief Secretary to the Government of the Central Provinces and Berar, Political and Military Department. The statement is reproduced below:

1. Certain persons including Mr P.Y. Deshpande of Nagpur were arrested on the evening of 21st August 1944 under R.129, Defence of India Rules under the ultimate orders of the Deputy Inspector General of Police (Crime and Railways). The formal report of the arrest was received by the Provincial Government on 23rd August 1944.

2. The report was carefully considered by the Provincial Government and inter alia, revealed reasonable grounds for suspecting that Mr Deshpande was actively associated with certain persons engaged in underground activities calculated to prejudice the public safety and efficient prosecution of the war and in the opinion of the Provincial Government, there were reasons to suspect that they had already acted in a manner which had prejudiced the public safety.

3. On receipt of this report the Provincial Government passed an order under Defence of India Rule 129 (2) and (4) for Mr P.Y. Deshpande's detention temporarily in police custody for a period of 15 days. During this period he was also interrogated with regard to his activities and associates.

4. A further report was sent to the Provincial Government upon which the Provincial Government by an order dated 2nd September 1944 extended the period of detention by 15th days.

5. An order for search was issued under R.126 on 20th August 1944 by the District Magistrate Nagpur.

6. He was arrested under R.129 on the evening of 21st August 1944.

7. That the Provincial Government is advised that it is not the normal practice to make such statements on affidavit and that there are rules providing for the filing of affidavits.

8. That this Provincial Government is aware that affidavits are filed sometimes to assist the Courts in reaching a just and proper decision.

9. That this Provincial Government is anxious to give all reasonable assistance to this Honourable Court may reach a just and proper decision. At the same time this Provincial Government is apprehensive that this action may not in future be accepted as a precedent requiring the Provincial Government to make returns on affidavit.

10. That the Provincial Government, subject to the reservation that this may not be treated as a precedent, is prepared if called upon to file forthwith an affidavit in support of the allegations of fact in paras 1 to 6 above, and particularly in defence to the wishes expressed by this Honourable Court.

Paragraphs 1 to 4 of the statement have been reproduced in identical terms in the affidavit, dated 10th September 1944, by Mr Jayaratnam, Chief Secretary to the Government of the Central Provinces and Berar, Political and Military Department. An ordinary typed copy of the order dated 22nd August 1944 passed by K.C. Diwakar, police officer, Sitabuldi, under R.129 (1), Defence of India Rules addressed to the Superintendent of Central Jail, Nagpur, committing Mr Deshpande to custody has been filed. The reason for the arrest has been stated thus:

I have arrested P.Y. Deshpande . . . whom I reasonably suspect of having acted, or of acting of being about to act in a manner prejudicial to the efficient prosecution of war.

This is a mechanical reproduction of R.129. Defence of India Rules and is open to the same criticism as was made by the Federal Court in 1944 F.C.R. 1 at p. 22 and in 1943 F.C.R. 1 at page 8. Judges dislike rubber stamps and are suspicious of them. We shall criticise this later. The order of Diwakar which has been filed in the case has not been attested as a true copy by any responsible officer of the Crown. It is necessary in habeas corpus cases that the order signed by the officer making the arrest and committing the person so arrested to custody should be filed: see the observations of Lord Green M.R. in (1942) 1 ALL E.R.373 at p. 377:

Now it transpired that no such order has ever been made by the Home Secretary: the document was false from beginning to end including the statement at the foot that it had been signed by the Home Secretary. This cynical piece of carelessness on the part of departmental officials was severely criticised by the Divisional Court . . . It appeared however that the Home Secretary had in fact made an order . . . for the detention of the applicant under Reg 18B (1A), although no copy of that order was given to the constable or the applicant. On the application of the applicant for a writ of habeas corpus a divisional Court consisting of Humphreys' Singleton and Tucker J.J. ordered his release.

Separate orders passed by Diwakar committing W.G. Sheorey and Yeshwant Vishnu Lele to custody have been filed. W.G. Sheorey and H.P. Deshpande have been released by the Provincial Government and the applications made on their behalf have been filed as the purpose of the applications has been served. It may be noted that in the above cases the same features occur as in P.Y. Deshpande's case, and the applications for their release were made on the same grounds.

Yeshwant Vishnu Lele is a teacher in the Khadi Vidyalaya of the All India Spinners' Association, Wardha Branch. He also assists the Secretary of the Gandhi Sewa Sangh Wardha Branch, and is a resident of Wardha. On 21st August 1944 at about 7 a.m. two Sub-Inspectors from Wardha and two police officers from Bombay accompanied by a Magistrate of Wardha, went to the place where Lele was residing and searched it. No warrant for the search was shown to him, nor was he informed about the purpose of the search. In the affidavit of Mrs Kamalabai w/o Dwarkanath Lele it is stated:

They only represented that the search was being taken in connexion with some dacoity in Bombay Presidency.

After a search of about 2 1/2 hours Lele was arrested and taken to Nagpur and was detained in the central Jail. an application for his release under S.491 (1) (b) Criminal P.C., has been filed by his brother's wife Mrs Kamalabai w/o Dwarkanath Lele. The grounds urged for release are the same as in Deshpande's case. The application is supported by her affidavit on 11th September 1944 after her lawyer Mr Gomkale had had an interview with Lele on 7th September 1944. The relevant portion of the affidavit is given below:

3 That since that date almost every day for about 8 to 10 hours he is being continuously questioned by various police officers about the alleged dacoity in the Bombay Presidency.

In para 4 of the affidavit, after referring to the threats given on the Hazaribagh Hills, it states:

From the above information received by the applicant from Mr Gomkale pleader, the applicant believes that Mr Lele has been transferred from Jail to the police lock-up to give a full and free scope to the police for prosecuting the investigation of the alleged offence of dacoity. It is submitted that this is an abuse of the provisions of R.129, Defence of India Rules.

In cases where the liberty of the subject is at stake, the responsibility of this Court is great and it has a right to expect that the Crown will place all the facts before it frankly or at any rate so much of the facts as will, without disclosing secret information, enable the court to reach a conclusion on the issues raised: see as to this the observations of Harries C.J. in ILR (1944) Lah.245 at p. 267.

This court has to determine whether Deshpande and Lele are illegally or improperly detained and whether the power exercised under R.129, Defence of India Rules was a fraud on the statute. There are matters which cannot be judicially determined unless the Court has material before it for arriving at a just and proper decision. This is recognised in the statement filed by the Provincial Government. Nevertheless it has made its affidavit under protest and seeks a ruling on the point. As to this it will be more convenient to consider the law first and then the procedure regarding affidavits afterwards. In considering the law the first thing to bear in mind is that the detentions we are considering here are under R.129, Defence of India rules and not under R.26. There is a fundamental difference between the two. But in order to understand the difference it will be necessary to consider certain other provisions of the Defence of India Act. Section 14 of the Act directs that: 'Save as otherwise expressly provided by or under this Act, the ordinary criminal and civil Courts shall continue to exercise jurisdiction'

And S.15 says.

Any authority or person acting in pursuance of this Act shall interfere with the avocations of life and the enjoyment of property as little as may be consistent with the purpose of ensuring the public safety and interest and the defence of British India.

Now these are two important and fundamental positions. Nothing is to be altered, no rights or liberties to be interfered with, no privileges withdrawn or curtailed, except as expressly provided by or under the Act. The ordinary laws are to continue to function except and in so far as they are expressly altered by or under the Act. More, even when they are altered the special powers conferred are to be used sparingly, and the ordinary lives and avocations of those proceeded against under the Act and its rules are to be interfered with as little as possible, and only to the extent consonant with the public safety and interest and the defence of British India. These conditions are express and restrictive. They are fundamental: The Act and the rules must be construed in the light of them. The next question is, how far are the ordinary laws altered by the Defence of India Act and the rules? So far as present purposes are concerned, they do three things. First, they confer certain emergency powers for the purposes set out in S.2 and confer them on a number of persons and authorities, and they frame rules for carrying this into effect. Secondly they make a breach of these rules punishable as an offence and thus create special offences, and also make certain existing offences punishable in a special way. See Rr.34 (6) and 38 (5). Thirdly they confer certain powers of detention. These are conferred by Rr.26 and 129.

Now how are these special offences to be punished and what is the procedure to be followed by the tribunal trying them? Chapter 3 of the Act makes provision for the constitution of Special tribunals. No Special Tribunal affecting the present matters has been constituted. Therefore that part of the Act is of no avail here. Apart from Chap. 3, there is no provision as regards a tribunal for trying either these special offences, or any other existing offence, not is any procedure prescribed. Accordingly Ss.14 and 15 of the Act come into play and we are relegated to the ordinary law. The ordinary law is contained in S. 5. Criminal P.C. Under that

(1) All offences under the Indian Penal Code shall be investigated, inquired into, tried and otherwise dealt with according to the provisions hereinafter contained.

(2) All offences under any other law shall be investigated, inquired into, tried and otherwise dealt with accordingly to the same provisions but subject to any enactment for the time being in force, regulating the manner or place of investigating, inquiring into, trying or otherwise dealing with such offences.

Now Deshpande and Lele have either committed offences or they have not. If they have not, then there is no power to detain them or to keep them in custody except under Rr.26 and 129. If they have, then S.5. Criminal P.C. comes into play. If the offences they are accused of having committed are offences under the Penal Code the procedure regarding the investigation, inquiry and trial is the procedure prescribed by the code. If they are any of the special offences created by the Defence of India Act and its rules then sub s. (2) of S.5. Criminal P.C. operates. There is no special enactment regulating the manner of the investigation and inquiry and so again the procedure in the code applies. Rules 129 gives the Provincial Government special power to regulate the place of detention and the nature of the custody but not to regulate the manner of an investigation. Therefore, the procedure regulating the manner of the investigation is the procedure set out in the Criminal Procedure Code.

Under that Code any person accused of an offence has valuable rights. Under S.61 he cannot be kept in police custody for more than twenty-four hours without being produced before a Magistrate. If the police want to detain him longer they must obtain a special order from a Magistrate under S.167 and cannot obtain this unless they give reasons and make out a case for it; and the Magistrate cannot make the order unless he records his reasons for doing so. Then for each successive remand the police must make out a stronger and an ever stronger case. Also he has a right to ask for bail. And all these proceedings are under the general superintendent and control of the High Court. None of this is taken away or touched by the Act therefore all the old rights and privileges remain intact. The learned Advocate General relied on S.161 of the code. But that is restricted to 'an investigation under this Chapter'. That chapter embraces Ss.154 and 176 and includes S.167 to which we have just referred. It does not stand alone and must be read in its proper context along with the remaining provisions of the Code.

The provisions relating to detention are to be found in Rr.26 and 129, Defence of India Rules. But they relate to detention and to nothing else. They confer wide powers but even they have their limitation-limitations which we shall examine in a minute. Up to the present, all we need say is that if either the police or the Provincial Government desire an investigation into any offence, whether under the Penal Code or under the Defence of India Rules, they are bound to conduct their enquiry in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Procedure code. They cannot call in aid their powers of detention and in the guise of exercising those powers conduct a secret investigation into a crime. If they have information that these detenus have committed crimes or offences they are not bound to investigate into them. They can rest content with detaining them under Rs 26 or 129 provided the matter falls within the ambit of those rules. But if they want an investigation they must proceed in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Procedure code. If they do otherwise it is a fraud upon the Act and their action is not taken in good faith. They cannot make the best of both worlds.

[Omitted: Discussion of many cases in Britain and elsewhere on the question of good faith and satisfaction of the Provincial Government under Rule 26 of D.I.R -- Ed.]

That brings us to the next question: What powers have we got under S.491, Criminal P.C.? this was decided in I.L.R. (1943) Nag. 154 But as the decision there was provisional and as it related to R.26 and not to R. 129, we feel it incumbent on us to review the matter afresh. The power to issue a direction in the nature of a writ of habeas corpus is derived from S.491, Criminal P.C. which runs thus:

(1) Any High Court may, whenever it thinks fit, direct —

- (a) that a person within the limits of its appellate criminal jurisdiction be brought up before the Court to be dealt with according to law;
- (b) that a person illegally or improperly detained in public or private custody within such limits be set at liberty;

(2) the High Court may, from time to time, frame rules to regulate the procedure in cases under this section.

(3) Nothing in this section applies to persons detained under the Bengal State Prisoners Regulation 1815, Madras Regulation 2 of 1819, or Bombay Regulation 25 of 1827, or the State Prisoners Act, 1850, or the State Prisoners Act, 1850.

Under S 491 (2), Criminal P.C. no rules have been framed by this Court to regulate the procedure in cases under this section. The combined effect of R.1 (r) (vii), High Court Rules and R.4 is that these applications have to be heard by a Bench of two Judges. In accordance with these rules, these applications came for hearing and disposal before us. Under the several regulations mentioned in sub s (3) of S.491 the executive has been given power to detain a person indefinitely without any charge being formulated and without the person being placed on trial. A High Court has no power to issue a direction under S.491 in regard to persons detained under these regulations. But the present detentions are not under them. The rule of law expounded by Dicey in his book, 'Introduction to the study of the law of the Constitution', is the same in India as in England except for certain difference not relevant to the present matter. In England the executive has no power to detain a person indefinitely without trial in normal times, and the power of the High Court there to issue a writ of habeas corpus in respect of the person detained under the orders of the executive has not been taken away. The power of the High Court in the Letters Patent is subject to the legislative powers of the local Legislature and of the Indian Legislature and also of the Governor-General in council under S.71, Government of India Act, and also of the Governor-General under S.72 of that Act. They can be amended and altered in all respects: see cl. 38, Letters Patent of the Nagpur High Court and S.223, Government of India Act. But they have not been altered. The power of the High court to issue a direction under S.491 has not been taken away in regard to persons detained under R.129, Defence of India Rules. Formerly, a High court in India had jurisdiction to issue the common law writ of habeas corpus: see 6 Beng. L.R. 391 at p. 459. Later, there were a series of legislative enactments and there was a difference of opinion in the High Courts on the point whether the power of the High Court to issue a common law writ of habeas corpus had been taken away.

The view taken in 45 Mad.922 was that the High Court in India had a right to issue the common law writ of habeas corpus. In 54 Cal.727 however, it was held that a High Court had no such power. The Madras High Court in a subsequent decision in I.L.R. (1939) Mad. 708 overruled their previous decision in 45 Mad. 922 and approved the decision in 54 Cal. 727. The matter is now settled by their Lordships of the Privy council in I.L.R. (1939) Mad. 744 where it has been held that a High court has no power to issue the common law writ of habeas corpus in cases falling under S.491, Criminal P.C. But though a High Court in India now has no power to issue the common law writ of habeas corpus the problem which falls for decision under S.491 is the same. In I.L.R. (1943) Nag. 154 Pollock J. at p. 157 summarised the effect of the decision of the House of Lords in (1941) 3 ALL E.R.338 (1942) A.C. 284 and (1942) 111 L.J.K.B.475 in these terms:

The position is this, that the Court has no power to inquire into the grounds for the Home Secretary's having 'reasonable cause to believe' or 'being satisfied' with the meaning of the regulation and that the only matters upon which the Courts have power to inquire are the good faith of the Home Secretary, the authenticity of the order, and its application to the person detained.

At p. 159 he stated that the validity of the order of detention can be challenged on the ground that the person passing the order had no authority to pass it, and on the ground that he was not in fact satisfied that it was necessary to pass such an order and had acted in bad faith. If the person passing the order had authority to pass it and was in fact so satisfied then this Court cannot go into the grounds on which he was satisfied and the order cannot be called in question in this Court. Bose J. at page 160 observed:

Fundamentally, the principles which underlie both provision are the same. The object of both is to safeguard the liberty of the subject against excesses of the executive and against an abuse of power.'

And at page 170:

Allegations of want of good faith must be investigated in spite of the war. Other cases, some of less authority, also reach the same conclusion, though they use different language. Thus some call it an 'abuse of power' others a 'fraud upon the Act'.

At page 172:

It is to be observed that S.16 requires that the order be passed in the exercise of the power conferred by the Act and not merely in colourable exercise of such power. . . . It is not enough therefore that these orders should be passed under colour of the power conferred. They must be done in actual exercise of it and, as I read the law, no power is conferred to make such orders in bad faith, or in abuse of the Act or for the purpose of effecting a fraud on the Act and consequently these issues must be investigated if they are raised.

In 60 Cal. 364 at pp. 376-7 Ramfry J. interpreted the word 'improperly' in S.491 to refer to cases in which although the forms of law have been observed there has been a fraud on an Act or an abuse of the powers given by the Legislature, and further stated:

The Courts can and in a proper case, must consider and determine the question whether there has been a fraud on an Act or an abuse of powers granted by the Legislature.

In 61 Cal. 197 [in 1934 in the case of Profulchandra Mitra V. the Commandant High Detention camp — Ed.] Amer Ali J. observed at page 214:

it is apparent that the English courts, in their anxiety to do justice between the subjects and executive, have asserted and maintained a residuary power to interfere, in certain cases, notwithstanding that the action taken is technically legal.

And later,

I agree with Mr Chaudhuri that under certain circumstances, the malice of a subordinate would tend to be imputed to the higher authorities.

And after referring to the case in (1916) 2 K.B. 742 stated at page 215:

This decision appears to me to indicate the type of case, to meet which the English courts have asserted jurisdiction i.e., cases involving some element of misuse of the statute itself.

In I.L.R. (1943) ALL.773¹ Iqbal Ahmad C.J. stated on page 775:

It is however clear that in cases in which even though the forms of law have been observed, the detention constitutes a clear fraud on an enactment or amounts to an abuse of the powers given to the executive by the Legislature, it is the duty of this Court to step in and to order that the person detained be set at liberty.

In (1916) 2 K. B. 742 Lord Reading C.J. observed at p. 749:

If we were of opinion that the powers were being misused, we should be able to deal with the matter. In other words, if it was clear that an act was done by the executive with the intention of misusing those powers this Court would have jurisdiction to deal with the matter:

Low J. at p. 752 observed:

I do not agree that if the executive were to come into this court and simply say a person is in our custody, and therefore the writ of habeas corpus does not apply because the custody is at the moment 'technically legal' the Court would have no power to consider the matter and if necessary deal with the application for the writ. In my judgment that answer from the Crown in reply to an application for the writ would not be sufficient if this Court were satisfied that what was really in contemplation was the exercise of an abuse of power. The arm of law in this country would have grown very short and the power of this Court very feeble, if it were subject to such a restriction in the exercise of its power to protect the liberty of the subject as that proposition involves.

In (1941) 3 ALL R.R.338 Viscount Maugham stated at p. 342:

It should be mentioned that the good faith of the Secretary of State is not challenged.

At page 348:

'The result is that there is no preliminary question of fact which can be submitted to the courts, and that in effect there is no appeal from the decision of the Secretary of State in these matters provided only that he acts in good faith.'

Lord Macmillan said at p. 364:

In the latter case it is for the Secretary of State alone to decide in the form of his own conscience whether he has a reasonable cause of belief, and he cannot if he has acted in good faith be called upon to disclose to anyone the facts and circumstances which have induced his belief, or to satisfy anyone but himself that these facts and circumstances constituted a reasonable cause of belief.

And Lord Wright said (p. 373):

The Judge adds, as is obvious, that the court might no doubt be called upon to decide questions of bona fides or mistaken identity, if they should ever arise.

Lord Romer said (p. 384):

if at the trial the Home Secretary gives rebutting evidence to the effect that, in his opinion, there were reasonable grounds for his belief, his statement, being merely a statement as to his opinion must necessarily be accepted unless it can be shown that he was not acting in good faith and the onus of showing this would be upon the plaintiff.

In (1941) 3 ALL. R.R. 383 Lord Macmillan observed at p. 396:

The result in my opinion is that the production of the Secretary of State's order, the authenticity and good faith of which are in no way impugned, constitutes a complete and peremptory answer to the appellant's application.

At p. 403 Lord Wright observed:

If the Home Secretary were to misrepresent the state of his mind that would be fraud . . .

In (1942) 1 ALL. E.R. 207 Viscount Caldecote L.C.J. observed at p. 209:

It would be a gross abuse of the powers given by Parliament to attempt to use them in order merely to suppress unpopular or obnoxious opinions. Regulations not required for any of the purposes stated in the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, S.1 or in the amending Act of 1940 would indeed be ultra vires.

And Wrottesley J. (p. 213):

... the Court is entitled to be told what the applicant is entitled to be told, and in addition since the Habeas corpus Act, 1640, the court have power to supervise and control the Crown and its ministers in matters affecting the freedom of the subject.

In (1866) L.R. 1 H.L. 34 it was laid down that where persons have special powers conferred on them by Parliament for effecting a particular purpose they cannot be allowed to exercise those powers for any purpose of a collateral kind. In 1905 A.C. 496 Lord Macnaghton observed at p. 430 as follows:

There can be no question as to the law applicable to the case. It is well settled that a public body invited with statutory powers such as those conferred upon the corporation must take care not to exceed or abuse its powers. It must keep within the limits of the authority committed to it. It must act in good faith. And it must act reasonably. The last proposition is involved in the second, if not in the first.

So also in (1939) 2 K.B. 98 Scrutton L.J. said at page 145:

The Attorney General went so far as to argue that though the order violated all the statutory conditions was made without a scheme, or advertisement or public inquiry, once the order was made, it had the effect of a statute. I cannot agree. In my view an order which goes beyond the statutory conditions under which alone it can be made an order which for that reason the Minister could be prohibited from making, if he announced his intention of making it, is not an order which when made can . . . have statutory effect.

And Greer L.J. at p. 157:

If the Minister had, in the events that happened no power to make any order at all, his delegated power of legislation never came into existence.

And Slesser L.J. at p. 170:

I do not think that the mere fact that the minister describes the order as an order necessarily constitutes it one

The decision of the House of Lords in (1895) A.C. 328 can also be referred to. The propositions deducible from these cases are: (i) If a person exercises power conferred on him in bad faith, or for a collateral purposes, it is an abuse of the power and a fraud upon the statute and is not really an exercise of the power at all, and a Court can interfere with such colourable exercise of the power: and (ii) when the issue is raised that any particular order has been made in bad faith or for a collateral purpose and therefore not made in exercise of the power, the Court is bound to enquire into the facts; see 48 C.W.N. 766 at p. 762.

The question is: Is there anything in the Defence of India Act or the rules framed there under which has in any way modified these well settled propositions? Section 16, Defence of India Act 1939 is in these terms:

(1) No order made in exercise of any power conferred by or under this Act shall be called in question in any Court.

(2) Where an order purports to have been made and signed by any authority in exercise of any power conferred by or under this Act, a Court shall, within the meaning of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, presume that such order was so made by that authority.

The presumption raised by sub-s. (2) of S.16 is a rebuttable one. Under S.4, Evidence Act, a Court shall presume that the order was so made until it is disproved. In I.L.R. (1943) Nag. 154 the order of detention under R.26, Defence of India Rules was passed by Mr Farquhar, Additional District Magistrate. With reference to such an order Pollock J. observed at page 157:

The first question to be decided is whether Mr Farquhar had power to pass such orders. If he had no such power, then the order was not made in exercise of the power conferred upon him under the Defence of India Rules and its validity could be challenged in this Court.

Bosc J. said at page 172:

. . . Section 16 requires that the order be passed in the exercise of the power conferred by the Act and not merely in colourable exercise of such power.

In A.I.R. 1943 F.C.1 at page 9 the Federal Court held:

We are clearly of opinion that where the order is made under or by virtue of a rule which is invalid and therefore of no force or effect, the order is a nullity and S.16 (1) has no application.

The question there was whether the order of detention which was passed under R.26 which was in excess of the rule making power conferred under S.2 (2) (x) could be challenged. The decision was that S.16, Defence of India Act, was no bar and that the order of detention of Talpade² was declared to be illegal. In A.I.R. 1943 Cal. 377³ the question was whether the orders of detention passed under R.26, Defence of India Rules, which contained a recital that the Governor was satisfied that the detention of the persons mentioned in the orders was necessary for the purpose mentioned in them could be challenged. It was held that S.16, Defence of India Act, was no bar and the orders of detention were declared invalid as the Governor was not satisfied that their detention was necessary. This was affirmed by the Federal Court in (1944) F.C.R. 1. In I.L.R. (1943) Lah. 617 the Provincial Government passed a requisite order under R.75A, Defence of India Rules. It was held that S.16 of the Act did not preclude the order from being challenged on the ground that it was ultra vires or that it was not made bona fide but for some collateral purpose. The decision was that the order was ultra vires and that it had not been made in good faith but for a collateral purpose, that is for a purpose other than that for which the Legislature had invested the Provincial Government with extraordinary powers.

In 48 C.W. N. 766 the question for decision was whether the order passed by the Provincial government superseding the Howrah Municipality under sub r. 6) of R. 51 (f), Defence of India Rules, was invalid. The order contained a recital that the Governor was of opinion that it is necessary to supersede the Commissioners of the Howrah Municipality for ensuring the due maintenance of the vital services of the said local authority in the event of hostile attack. Das J. reviewed the case law on the subject and held that s.16, Defence of India Act, was passed in good faith, and held that the order was invalid as it was made for a purpose not contemplated by the Defence of India Act or the rules framed thereunder. Section 16, Defence of India Act, is thus no bar to an enquiry whether the order passed under the Defence of India Act or the rules framed thereunder is a valid order made in good faith and the question of good faith, when raised has to be decided by the Court: See I.L.R.(1944) Nag. 629 at pp. 636, 637.

In (1931) A.C. 662 Lord Atkin at p. 670 observed:

In accordance with British jurisprudence no member of the executive can interfere with the liberty or property of a British subject except on the condition that he can support the legality of his action before a Court of justice. And it is the tradition of British justice that judges should not shrink from deciding such issues in the face of the executive.

In (1941) 3 ALL E.R. 338 Lord Atkin at , 361 observed:

In England amidst the clash of arms the laws are not silent. They may be changed, but they speak the same language in war as in peace. It has always been one of the pillars of freedom, one of the principles of liberty for which, on recent authority, we are now fighting that the judges are no respecters of persons, and stand between the subject and any attempted encroachments of his liberty by the executive, alert to see that any coercive action is justified in law.

The following passage from Dicey's Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, Edn.9, pp. 293 and 294 will illustrate the lengths to which the Courts will go to uphold the law.

Nothing better illustrates the noble energy with which judges have maintained the rule of regular law, even at period of revolutionary violence, than (1798) 27 St. Tr. 6614. In 1798, Wolfe Tone, an Irish rebel, took part in a French invasion of Ireland. The man-of-war in which he sailed was captured and Wolfe Tone was brought to trial before a Court Martial in Dublin. He was thereupon sentenced to be hanged. He held, however, no commission as an English officer, his only commission being one from the French Republic. On the morning when his execution was about to take place application was made to the Irish King's Bench for a writ of habeas corpus. The ground taken was that Wolfe Tone, not being a military person was not subject to punishment by a Court Martial or in effect that the officers who tried him were attempting illegally to enforce martial law. The Court of King's Bench at once granted the writ. When it is remembered that Wolfe Tone's substantial guilt was admitted, that the court was made up of judges who detested the rebels, and that in 1798 Ireland was in the midst of a revolutionary crisis, it will be remembered that no more splendid assertion of the supremacy of the law can be found than the protection of Wolfe Tone by the Irish Bench.

These traditions continue. In (1923) 92 L.J. K.B. 797 Scrutton L.J. said:

This case is not to be exercised less vigilantly because the subject whose liberty is in question may not be particularly meritorious. It is indeed one test of belief in principles if you apply them to cases in which you have no sympathy at all.

Those observations were quoted and acted on by this Court in I.L.R. (1940) Nag.1 at p. 10 and in I.L.R. (1940) Nag. 154 at p. 165 and were applied as recently as this month by this Bench in Misc. Cri. case No. 47 of 1944.

[Omitted: Description of the right of applying for a writ of Habeas Corpus evolved in English legal History — Ed.]

Both in England and in India fundamental rights are not guaranteed. The right to personal liberty of the subject and other rights flow from the ordinary laws of the land. The interference with personal liberty is remedied in England by a writ of habeas corpus and in India by an application under S.491 Criminal P.C. The Emergency Powers Defence Act of 1939 conferred powers on His Majesty to make such regulations as appear to him to be necessary or expedient for purposes connected with the defence of the realm. Under S.1 (2) (a) of the Act provision could be made for the detention of persons whose detention appeared to the Secretary of State expedient in the interest of public safety and the defence of the realm. In exercise of the powers thus conferred the King in council framed Regn. 18B. The text will be found reproduced in (1941) 3 All E.R. 338 at p. 341. This was the regulation which the House of Lords had to construe in that case and they showed that despite the wide powers conferred by that regulation the right to the writ still remained. All this shows that the right to the writ of habeas corpus and the corresponding guarantee, of liberty under S.491, Criminal P.C. are living realities and form one of the most fundamental and powerful forces in the constitution. It also shows with what extreme zealousness the right is guarded and upheld by the Courts. Our conclusion is that we have the power to take action under S.491. The rights conferred by that section have not been taken away or affected. That means that in this case we are entitled to enquire into the allegations made because first an issue of want of good faith is raised, and because secondly, in a matter under R.129 as contrasted with R.26, the Court can and must enquire into the reasonableness of the suspicion which justified the detention, the burden being on the Crown.

We now turn to the facts. The reason stated for the arrest of Deshpande and Lele in the order of arrest is that the officer arresting reasonably suspects them of having acted or of acting, or of being about to act in a manner prejudicial to the efficient prosecution of war. The word 'or' before 'being about to act' is perfectly in order in the rule but it is out of place in the orders of detention. The police officer making that order has not stated whether the persons had acted in the past in a manner prejudicial to the efficient prosecution of war, or were acting at present, or were about to act in the future, in a manner prejudicial to the efficient prosecution of the war. There is no reference of any reasonable suspicion that these persons acted in a manner prejudicial to the public safety. The police officer who makes an arrest in pursuance of sub-r. (1) is required forthwith to report the fact of arrest to the Provincial Government. We take it that the order of detention under R.129 (4) Defence of India Rules, passed on 22nd August 1944, was made on the strength of such a report. On 26th August 1944, the Provincial Government directed that Deshpande be detained in police custody during the remaining period of his detention of 15 days expiring on 4th September 1944. On 2nd September 1944, an order directing Deshpande to be detained in police custody was extended for a further period of 15 days from 5th September 1944. In none of these orders is there any reference to the fact that P.Y. Deshpande has acted in any manner prejudicial to the public safety-not that such a reference would have been in place in such an order. But it serves to show that the orders of the Provincial Government were made on the basis of the police report, which of course is what is intended under the rule.

Under R.129 the power to arrest and detain is conferred on the police, or on any other officer of Government empowered in that behalf by general or special order of the central Government or the Provincial Government. It is not conferred on the Provincial Government. The powers of the Provincial Government are to be found in R.26. Under R. 129 all that the Provincial Government can do is to specify the place of detention and up to a limit of two months its duration. Therefore the only authority we are concerned with under R.129 is the police officer who made the detention, and it is for him to show that he had reasonable grounds for suspicion. Clearly he cannot discharge thatonus by merely asserting that he had reasonable grounds because that is the very question we have to decide. Under the law as we understand it, the Court is to be the judge of that and not the police officer. Therefore he must tell us what those grounds were and leave us to decide whether they are reasonable. That was the very point argued and decided in (1914) A.C. 808 by the House of Lords. That apart, in this particular case we have not even a prima facie guarantee that there is a reasonable suspicion. The alternative terms in which the order is couched shows that the police officer making the arrest did not know his own mind. He did not know what he suspected and floundered about in his order from one alternative to another. If one suspects that A has acted in a certain manner one says so. If the suspicion is that he is in addition about to act in that or a similar manner in the future again one says so and uses the word 'and' and not 'or'. The moment the 'or' is introduced it becomes patently apparent that no thought was given to the requirements of the rule and that a rubber stamp order was made. That will certainly not satisfy the condition of 'reasonable suspicion' which R.129 requires.

Incidentally this order has not been supported by an affidavit, and the burden being on the Crown the mere production of an order under R.129 is not enough. There must be proof. The only affidavit we have on the side of the Crown is one which tells us about the suspicions entertained by the Provincial Government, not by the police officer making the arrest. But what we have to determine here is what were his suspicions, and not the Provincial Government's. Turning next to the affidavit made by the Chief Secretary, when we examine its terms it becomes more apparent than ever that the police officer making the order did not know what he suspected. As we have said, his order is confined to matter which will be 'prejudicial to the efficient prosecution of the war'. The affidavit of the Chief Secretary on the other hand, sets out that the material placed before the Provincial Government gave rise to the suspicion that Deshpande's activities were 'calculated to prejudice the public safety and the efficient prosecution of the war'. Now under R. 129 the Provincial Government can only act on the report of the police made under sub-r. (2). If the police had no material in which their opinion would have justified an order on the ground that the public safety was likely to be endangered how can the Provincial Government decide otherwise? Of course, the Provincial Government can act under R.26, but it does not choose to do so, it cannot decide ex post facto that the police officer making the arrest ought to have accepted matter which in the police officer's opinion would not have justified him in making the arrest. As we have said, all we can consider under R.129 is whether the police officer making the arrest had reasonable grounds for suspicion at the time of making the arrest and whether he in fact suspected. He seems to have entertained no suspicion on the score of public safety. This difference of opinion between the police officer and the Provincial Government in itself shows that there is room for a difference of view on the material set out in the report, and accordingly makes it all the more incumbent upon us to know what the grounds for the suspicions are.

As regards the question of public safety. In one sense every offence, however trivial, affects public safety—even some silly personal defamation or drunken brawl between a couple of inebriates. But that cannot be the connotation in which these words are used here. They import something much wider relating to the defence of the realm. A clue to the meaning of the words is to be obtained from part 10 of the Rules in the chapter headed 'Public Safety and Order'. They relate to matters like the holding of or taking part in public processions meetings or assemblies, and to trade disputes, hartals, etc., and to the wearing of unauthorized uniforms. The chapter is a preventive chapter and has no reference to offences committed in the past even if they be offences like dacoity. If Messrs Deshpande and Lale are suspected of having committed an offence under the Penal Code, the investigation into the offence has to be in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code. If, however, they are suspected of having committed a prejudicial act within the meaning of R.34 (6), punishable under R.38 (5), Defence of India Rules, or of having committed any offence under those rules the investigation into them has to be conducted in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Procedure code as no separate procedure has been provided for investigating an offence committed under the Defence of India Act. The procedure for investigating into an offence is regulated by Chap. 14. 53, 1501 to 176. Cr. P.C.

The learned Advocate-General contended that under S.161, Criminal P.C., a police officer has power to question any person supposed to be acquainted with the facts and circumstances of the case. 'Any person' in the section is wide enough to include an accused person: see 18 Pat. 234 and I.L.R. (1940) Nag. 232. Section 161 has to be read along with other provisions in the chapter. An accused has a right that he should be placed before a Magistrate within 24 hours of the arrest. The Magistrate has to decide whether a remand should be granted. If so on what conditions and for each successive remand a stronger case has to be made out by the prosecution. The accused is entitled to move for bail. All these rights are inter-related and the power of the police cannot be considered apart from the right which an accused person has. Undertrial prisoners are entitled to all reasonable facilities for interviewing or otherwise communicating either orally or in writing with their relatives friends and legal advisers: see Jail Manual R.906 p. 253. These rights are not available if they are detained under Rule 129, Defence of India Rules. A copy of the order dated 22nd January 1944 giving instructions of the Provincial Government regarding the conditions to be applicable to all persons detained in police custody under Rule 129, Defence of India Rules, has been placed before us. Instructions 9 and 10 are reproduced below:

Interviews:

(9) (i) A prisoner shall not be permitted to have an interview with persons other than police officers except on the written order of the Superintendent.

(ii) . . . The Superintendent shall be competent subject to any special directions that may be issued by the Inspector General of Police to allow or refuse an interview. . . .

Police Interviews:

(10) Subject to the directions of the Inspector General of Police the Superintendent may by general or special order authorize any police officer, either singly or with another police officer and accompanied or unaccompanied by subordinate police officers, to interview any prisoner'.

If a police officer, for facility of carrying on an investigation unhampered and unrestricted detains an accused person, or a witness supposed to be acquainted with the facts and circumstances of the case under R.129, Defence of India Rules, that would be an abuse of the power conferred under R.129: see the judgment of Harries C.J. in A.I.R. 1944 Lah. 373 at p. 375.¹ It may be noted that there is no restriction as regards the time period and the number of interviews which a police officer is entitled to have with a detenu in a day. The complaint made here is that Deshpande has been subjected to continuous interrogation by the police for a number of days and there is no refutation of that allegation. The question is whether the police officer in question passed the order of detention under R.129, Defence of India Rules in good faith or whether the detention was made with a view to facilitate the investigation into a dacoity in East Khandesh unhampered and unrestricted by any of the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code and was not made in bona fide exercise of the power. The affidavit and the application on behalf of Deshpande complained that no interview was allowed and that he was in the police lock-up instead of in jail.

This refusal to grant an interview or to afford facilities to the detenu to place in his case before the Court amounts to an abuse of power under the Defence of India Act and the rules framed thereunder and is an additional ground for suspecting the good faith of the authorities: see I.L.R. (1944) Nag.629 at p. 636. The complaint in the application was that the arrest and detention have been with a view to facilitating an investigation into a dacoity which took place in East Khandesh, and that the detention under R.129 was in utter want of good faith and was made to prevent Deshpande from pursuing his ordinary legal remedies and to deprive him of his ordinary legal rights. This, it was urged, is an abuse of the Defence of India Act and rules framed thereunder.

An affidavit was filed on 28th August 1944 to the effect that Deshpande was kept in police custody from 27th August for purposes of interrogation. On 30th August 1944 the applicant wanted information as to the purpose of transferring the applicant's husband to the lock-up in the compound of the District court and stated that the detention in jail was the lesser of the two evils so long as the detention continued. On 6th September 1944, after Mr Sheode had an interview with Deshpande, an affidavit was filed stating that the interrogations continued both in jail and in the lock-up for about 6 or 7 days. In spite of the definite and specific allegation that the order of detention was not made in good faith but for an ulterior purpose in order to facilitate the police in carrying on an investigation into a dacoity the Provincial Government passed an order on the 26th placing him in police custody. The protest of the applicant was registered on 30th August, and in spite of that protest a fresh order was passed on 2nd September 1944 extending the period of detention in police custody for a further period of 15 days from 5th September 1944. The application filed on behalf of the Provincial Government and the affidavit sworn by the Chief Secretary lack details and particulars. They may be compared and contrasted with the affidavits and particulars furnished in (1941) 1 K.B.72.⁵ The order of the Home Secretary is at pp. 72-3, the particulars furnished by the Advisory committee under the Defence Regulations at pp. 73-4 and the affidavit of Sir John Anderson at pp. 75-6. A part of the affidavit of the Secretary of State in (1941) 2 All E.R.749 will be found at pp. 753 and 754. The affidavit filed by the Chief Secretary is open to the criticism which Stable J. made in (1941) 2 All E.R. 749 at p. 759.

An affidavit in stock form, applicable to all cases and, as Langton J., expressed it in a recent case, 'over the rubber stamp' is in my judgment, undesirable in almost any proceedings and most particularly undesirable in proceedings of this nature, where the liberty and reputation of the subject are involved and in which consequently particular individual attention must, as a matter of right be given to every relevant factor

This was cited with approval by Shearer J. in I.L.R. (1944) Pat. 252 at p. 258. The applicant made definite and specific allegations of fact, viz., that a dacoity was committed in East Khandesh some time in April last, that police officers from Bombay were investigating into the offence, that the arrests and searches were made with a view to find out the culprit and catch the absconders, that the police officers from Bombay had questioned Deshpande about Inamdar and his whereabouts and his associates, that no question was asked from Deshpande about the articles in Bhavitavya or about his activities in relation to the war and that the inquiries have been restricted to find out the whereabouts of Inamdar and his associates. These facts have not been denied either in the statement filed by the Provincial Government or in the affidavit of the Chief Secretary.

Paragraph 2 of the statement of the Provincial Government is cryptic and it is almost impossible to find out what is alleged against Deshpande. It is not asserted that Deshpande was engaged in underground activities calculated to prejudice the public safety and/or the efficient prosecution of war. The only allegation against him is that he was actively associated with persons who were engaged in such activities. But what kind of association? Innocent or otherwise? And what are the facts which lead to a conclusion that the association is an active one? The affidavit is curiously and studiously silent about this. How can we judge whether there is any association or not, and whether it is active, and whether it is innocent or otherwise, without being placed in possession of a single fact on which to form an opinion? In the English cases there were definite allegations made that the persons detained were members of the British Union of Fascists and the parts which they had taken and how their activities were calculated to endanger public safety were set out. We have a right to expect that statements made on behalf of the Provincial Government will be full and frank. The Provincial Government has undoubtedly a right to withhold its sources of information, as also the evidence on which the conclusion was reached. But it must state frankly matters on which there can be no question of secrecy, particularly when they have already been made public and have even been published in the papers. The statement studiously avoids any reference to the investigation which is being carried out by the police officers from Bombay in a dacoity which was committed in East Kandesh. In our opinion the order of the Provincial Government placing Deshpande in police custody could not have been with a view to promote the efficient prosecution of war or to safeguard the public safety, but must have been with a view to afford facilities to the police officers to carry on the investigation into the offence which had already been committed and to find out the traces of Inamdar and his associates. Had the case been otherwise the Provincial Government would have taken the responsibility for the detention upon itself and would have acted under R.26. That in turn would have given Deshpande certain limited findings.

The police officer who arrested and ordered the detention has not filed any affidavit. The circumstances in the case leave no manner of doubt that the arrest and search were made with a view to trace the whereabouts of Inamdar and his associates and to investigate into the offence of dacoity which had been committed. Deshpande was placed in police custody in order to give police officers facilities for carrying on an investigation. The detention in police custody could not possibly have contributed to the efficient prosecution of the war or in any way to safeguard the public safety. In the case of Lele there is a definite statement that two police officers from Bombay searched his quarters and stated that the search was being made in connection with a dacoity in the Bombay Province. This has not been controverted by the Provincial Government. No statement or affidavit has been filed by the Government in Lele's case. The learned Advocate General submitted that the statement filed in Deshpande's case should be taken as a statement in this case also. But there is no reference at all to Lele in either the statement or the affidavit in Deshpande's case, accordingly neither can be read as applicable to Lele. If this was due to laxness then we say with Lord Wright in (1942) A.C. 284:

I feel very strongly that in a question like this affecting the liberty of the subject the greater care should be taken and the greatest correctness of procedure observed. Laxity is most reprehensible, whoever may have been responsible.

And with Lord Macmillan:

Nothing could be more unfortunate than that in a matter in which scrupulous accuracy is imperative the impression should be created that the safeguards prescribed for the protection of detained persons are carelessly observed and administered.

The circumstances in Lele's case also indicate that the order of detention by the police officer was not made in good faith in exercise of the powers for the purpose mentioned in the rule but that they were made with the ulterior purpose of facilitating the police investigation. That brings us to the question of affidavits. As we have said the Provincial Government filed its affidavits under protest and asked for a ruling. Affidavits have been filed in numerous cases in England as well as in India to justify detention . . .

[Omitted: Discussion of these cases — Ed.]

In the English case just cited a decision on a similar difficult question was obviated by the assistance of the Crown in making the affidavit. We were also anxious to obviate waste of time and energy and so asked for an affidavit. The matter is within the knowledge of the Provincial Government and a single sentence in the affidavit would have settled the question in two minutes and thus have obviated much tedious argument and tiring deliberation. Unfortunately, the affidavit did not make the point clear and adhered to the ambiguous formula 'the Provincial Government', which as we have said the Federal Court considered insufficient.

Fortunately, however, the learned Advocate-General was able to tell us that he had seen the files personally and could assure us that the files had been placed before His Excellency the Governor and that the orders were passed by His Excellency in person. Of course we at once accepted the learned Advocate-General's assurance, it having been made on personal knowledge from a personal inspection of the files and not merely on instructions. That has obviated hours of fruitless argument and consequent loss of time over a matter which, as it turns out, would have been purely academic seeing that His Excellency had in fact passed the orders. But the matter ought to have been cleared up in the affidavit. These 'rubber stamp' returns are open to objection, particularly an affidavit. The question about the necessity of filing an affidavit was considered by the House of Lords in (1942) A.C. 284 Lord Wright put the matter generally thus:

The guiding principle of habeas corpus is, as I have explained, that is festinum remedium. Hence there is a presumption against unnecessary affidavits.

As the learned Law Lord explains, the whole object of these proceedings is to make them expeditious, to keep them as free from technicality as possible, and to keep them as simple as possible. Accordingly, when there is nothing to enquire into, that is to say, when there is no question of fact to be examined, as was the case in (1942) A.C. 284 there is no need for an affidavit. As Lord Wright put it:

Until there emerges a dispute of fact into which the Court feels it should inquire, I think the defendant's statement is enough though no doubt if the Court is proceeding to enquire into the merits it may order affidavits

We do not think we can put the matter more concisely than that. But the point to note is that in all these cases — even in two cases after this decision, the Crown in its anxiety to assist the Court and to avoid any possible waste of time went out of its way to make affidavits even though the House of Lords itself had decided that affidavits were unnecessary. That is a refreshing contrast to the attitude here. It is not always easy to anticipate whether the Crown need answer the application once it has produced its order of detention. Therefore, even though it was not strictly necessary to do so it invariably produced an affidavit in the cases we have set forth; and that excellent tradition has been followed in certain Indian cases. That deals with the position when no issue of fact requiring an answer is raised. It is not necessary to file an affidavit in the first instance if the return is good on the face of it. But it is always wise to do so. It assists the Court. It avoids unnecessary waste of time and it obviates attacks on Government's good faith. Candor and frankness are always appreciated. But if an issue of fact is raised in the application then an affidavit in reply refuting the facts, or explaining them away, is always necessary, and should be filed along with the return so as to obviate unnecessary delay. Otherwise the truth of the facts alleged will normally be accepted.

[Omitted: Reference to Viscount Maugham's judgement in 1941 3, ALL ER 338 — Ed.]

In the present case issues of fact were raised. The good faith of the police and of the Provincial Government were expressly challenged and facts were set out which, if un rebutted and unexplained, were sufficient to support the allegations. An affidavit therefore was necessary and should have been filed from the start. In fact it is the complete absence of any refutation of these facts and the failure to explain them that leads us to conclude that the orders in these two cases were not made in good faith and that they are a fraud on the Defence of India Act and its rules. We hold that the detentions of Purushottam Yeshwant Deshpande and Yeshwant Vishnu Lele are illegal and improper and direct that they be set at liberty forthwith. We wish to make it plain that the validity of R.129 was not questioned before us and accordingly we express no opinion about its intra vires character. After we had delivered judgment, but before we had signed it, the learned Advocate-General stated that we had misunderstood the position of the Provincial Government regarding the granting of interviews and asked us to embody the following explanation in our order. That we have pleasure in doing . . .

There has been misunderstanding on two points which I must clear,

(1) When I informed you Lordships that either Mr Kedar or Mr Sheorey could interview and they had to apply to the D.S.P. I meant to say that they had to get in touch with the D.S.P.

(2) I assured your Lordships that no interview was asked for by the prisoner and that no interview was refused. All the applications were to the High Court. The only request to the Government (i.e. jail authorities) being an application by Mr Ringe.

As this misunderstanding should, I think be removed I am drawing your Lordships' attention to it before the order is signed.

Order accordingly.

Observations

This is an application to the Lahore High Court under section 491 Cr.P.C. by Sardul Singh Caveeshar. The application will be heard on the 2nd of October, 1944. Learned Counsel is briefed to appear for the Central Government and to oppose the application.

2. On the 9th March, 1942, the Punjab Police arrested the applicant under Rule 129 of the D.I.R. at Lahore and detained him in the Lahore Fort. The Central Government, which had previously arranged with the Government of the Punjab for making the arrest, passed an order under Rule 26 (1) (b) of the D.I.R. on the 9th March, 1942, for detention of the applicant [enclosed towards the end of this document after Appendix No. III – Ed.] The order, which was signed by Sir Richard Tottenham, Additional Secretary in the Home Department of the Government of India, was duly served on the applicant. A copy of it is briefed. An affidavit has been filed in this case by Mr F.C. Bourne, Chief Secretary to Government, Punjab, and the second paragraph thereof, which is as follows, concerns the said detention order, dated the 9th March, 1942:

Para 2. The order of detention passed by the Central government is valid and was issued after the case of the petitioner had been carefully considered by the Central Government.

A copy of the affidavit is briefed herewith.¹

3. By the said order of the 9th March, 1942 [copy appended with this document] the Punjab Government also was empowered to determine from time to time the place and conditions of the applicant's detention (under Rule 26 (5) of the D.I.R.). On the 8th October, 1942, the applicant was transferred by the Punjab government from Lahore Fort to Campbellpore. (Vide the two orders of that date of which copies are attached).²

4. On the 24th March, 1943, the Punjab Government transferred the applicant from Campbellpore to Dharamsala. The order of the Punjab Government dated the 24th March, 1943, for detention of the applicant in the District Jail, Dharamsala, is briefed.³ Another order had been passed the same day by the Punjab Government cancelling the order for the applicant's detention at Campbellpore. A copy of that order also is briefed.⁴

5. Under section 6 of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance (III of 1944) the detention order passed by the Central Government on 9th March, 1942, must be deemed to have been passed under this Ordinance and was valid under section 9 thereof until 14th July, 1944.

6. On the 8th February, 1944, the Central Government informed the applicant by a notice (under section 7 of Ord. III of 1944) of the grounds of his detention and of his right to take a representation against the order of detention. A copy of the notice is briefed.⁵ The applicant made a representation⁶ which was duly considered by the Central Government which, however, decided to continue his detention and informed him accordingly on the 27th April, 1944. (A copy of the letter is briefed).⁷

7. On the 1st July, 1944, the Central Government passed an order directing that the detention order, dated the 9th March, 1942, should continue in force. This order was signed by Mr Vishnu Sahay, joint Secretary to the Government of India in the Home Department. It was duly served on the applicant. Its copy is attached. (This order is not mentioned in the application under section 491 CR. P.C. obviously because the petition was made on the 26th May, 1944, well before the date of the extension order)

8. The applicant challenges the validity of the Central Government's order, dated the 9th March, 1942, on the grounds stated below.

9. First, the applicant contends that the order (dated 9th March, 1942) was not signed by the proper authority. The order, as already stated, was an order of the Central Government under section 26 (1) (b) of the D.I.R. The expression 'Central Government' means, in that rule, the Governor-General in Council (see sub-clause (b) of clause 9 (ab) of section 3 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, and Rule 3 of the D.I.R.). Under section 40 (1) in Schedule Nine to the Government of India Act, 1935, orders of the Governor-General in Council 'shall be signed by a Secretary to the Government of India, or as the Governor-General in Council may direct, and, when so signed, shall not be called into question in any legal proceeding on the ground that they were not made duly by the Governor-General in Council'. The order, as already stated, was signed by an Additional Secretary to the Government of India. He was, learned Counsel will submit, 'a Secretary' to the Government of India within the meaning of section 40 (1) of the Ninth Schedule to the Government of India Act (and distinguishing prefixes like 'First', 'Second' or 'Additional' do not affect the fact that the person concerned is 'a Secretary to the Government of India'). Alternatively, learned Counsel will urge that under section 40 (1) of the Ninth Schedule, an order of the Governor-General in Council 'shall be signed by a Secretary . . . or otherwise as the Governor-General in Council may direct'. Such a general order exists, namely, Home Department Resolution No. 18/3/39-Public, dated the 28th July, 1939. It states that the Governor-General in Council is pleased to direct that orders and other proceedings of the Governor-General in Council shall be signed by a Secretary, Joint Secretary, Deputy Secretary, Under Secretary or Assistant Secretary to the Government of India. If any point is made that the resolution does not mention an Additional Secretary, learned Counsel will submit that an Additional Secretary is as much a Secretary as an Additional Judge of the High Court is a Judge. If necessary, this fact can be established by an affidavit of the Home Secretary. It follows, therefore, that the order, dated 9th March, 1942, was signed in accordance with the provisions of section 40 (1) of Schedule 9 to the Government of India Act. Therefore, under the same section, it is not open to the applicant to contend that order was 'not duly made by the Governor-General in Council' (i.e., by the Central Government).

10. The Second ground of the applicant is that the order, dated 9th March, 1942, 'did not show that, before it was issued, the case had been properly considered by the authority concerned as required by law'. The law, however, does not require that an order under Rule 26 (1) (b) of the D.I.R. should contain any particular recital: see.

(i) R.V. Home Secretary, Ex-parte Lees (1941) 1 K.B. 72 at p. 78; and

(ii) R.V. Briton Prison (Governor) Ex-parte Pitt-Rivers (1942) A.E.L.R. 207.

However, the order, dated 9th March, 1942, does 'whereas the Central Government is satisfied with respect to the person known as Sardul Singh Caveeshar . . . ' which are in accord with the opening part of Rule 26 from this recital a presumption arises, under Sec 14, Indian Evidence Act, that what the recital says is correct (see in this connection).

(5) Kamla Kant Azad v. King Emperor, I.J.R. 1944. Pat. 252.⁹

But, apart from the presumption, the second paragraph of Mr Bourne's affidavit¹⁰ states that 'the order of detention . . . was issued after the case of the petitioner had been carefully considered by the Central Government'. The case of Har Kissen Khanna v. The Crown (Ex-Parte Durga Das Khanna), I.L.R. 1944 Lahore (F.B.) is distinguishable on the facts; also there was no affidavit filed in that case on behalf of the Crown.

11. The applicant's third ground is this: That since he was arrested at about 10 a.m. on 9th March, 1942, at Lahore, the order in question could not have been passed on the same day in Delhi 'on any adequate information'. The answer to this is that the Central Government had already communicated to the Punjab Government its decision to detain the applicant under Rule 26 and had already asked the Punjab Government to arrest the applicant under Rule 129 of the D.I.R. This is stated in para 3 of Mr Bourne's affidavit.

12. Lastly, the applicant contends that the Central Government's order, dated 9th March, 1942, 'was vacated by the Punjab Government's order, dated the 24th March, 1943'. The mere production of the latter order before the Court will be sufficient to negative this contention of the applicant: the order nowhere purports to vacate the Central Government's order. Legally it cannot 'vacate' the order from which it derives its own force and authority.

13. What the Punjab Government did on the 24th March, 1943, was merely to transfer the applicant from the District Jail, Campbellpore, to the Sub-Jail at Dharamsala. Instead of passing a single order of transfer, it passed two orders, namely:

(1) An order, addressed to the Superintendent of the District Jail, Campbellpore, terminating the detention of the applicant in that jail.

(2) An order, intended as an order of commitment of the prisoner, addressed to the Superintendent of the Sub-Jail, Dharamsala, for the prisoner's detention there.

The form used for the latter order is one suitable for an order of detention under Rule 26 (1) (b); it was incorrectly used for the order, which, obviously, was under sub-rule (5) of Rule 26. All this, however, in no wise, affects the validity or continuance of the orders of the Central Government dated 9th March, 1942.

14. Learned Counsel will submit that the applicant's detention is lawful, being under the Central Government's order under Rule 26 (1) (b) of the D.I.R., dated the 9th March, 1942, which was duly served, and which should be deemed to have been passed under Ordinance III of 1944, and which was, within 30 days before it would have expired (15th July, 1944) duly extended by the Central Government's Order dated the 1st July, 1944, which also has been duly served. To this latter order also will apply the provisions of section 40 (1) of the Ninth Schedule to the Government of India Act, 1935, and Home Department Resolution No. 18/3/39-Public, dated 28th July, 1939.

Appendix III

Supplementary Observations

With reference to the last but one sentence in para 9 of the Observations already submitted, the affidavit which was contemplated therein and which was settled by learned Counsel, was sent to the Home Department. The Home Department is not sure that the wording of para 2 or para 4 of the affidavit¹¹ is correct and has been advised that it would be much better not to file an affidavit but to rely on the argument in para 9 of the Observations.

2. Learned Counsel is instructed accordingly. If the Court requires an affidavit, it will presumably indicate the point on which the affidavit is required. In that event Counsel will please ask for an adjournment to produce the required affidavit.

3. Of course, if the detainee himself does not initiate it, there will be no occasion for discussion of the point concerning an Additional Secretary's constitutional position.

No. 16/1/42-Political (I).
Government of India.
Home Department.

New Delhi, the 9th March 1942.

Order

Whereas the Central Government is satisfied with respect to the person known as Sardul Singh Caveeshar that, with a view to preventing him from acting in a manner prejudicial to the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, it is necessary to make the following order:

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred by clause (b) of sub-rule (1) of rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules and by Sub-section (4) of section 2 of the Defence of India Act, 1939, the Central Government is pleased to direct—

(1) That the said Sardul Singh Caveeshar be arrested by the Police wherever found, and detained until further orders of the Central Government, and

(2) That the power of determining from time to time under sub-rule (5) of rule 26 of said Rules, the place in which and the condition under which the said Sardul Singh Caveeshar may be detained, shall be exercisable also by the provincial Government of the Punjab.

Dear Mitra,

Roy mentioned to me the Lahore habeas corpus cases in connection with some enquiries from the Home Department and I wrote a note on the file stating what transpired in Court. I may take this occasion to inform you that the Judge in the course of the proceedings made some remarks which ought to be known to the Government. I was arguing on the strength of some H.L. cases that the recitals in our order were deemed to be correct till falsified. The Judge said that such a presumption would not necessarily arise in India where orders were made in the name of the Governor or Governor-General without their knowing anything about them as appeared in the Punjab F.B. case¹ and Shib Nath Banerjee's² case. I made it clear that such a presumption did arise though as a presumption of fact it was rebuttable. The Judge agreed, but we added that any slight evidence would rebut the presumption and then it would be incumbent on the Government to place evidence before the Court to prove affirmatively that the order was really that of the statutory authority concerned.

It was lucky that the proceedings were held in Camera or else the hostile press would have made a tremendous fuss over the Judge's remarks.

Yours sincerely,

B.L. Mitter

253: Saligram Singh and others Appellants — Petitioners v. Emperor [Varma and Meredith J.J. (19 Oct. 1944)]

AIR, Vol. 32, 1945, Patna, p. 69

Raj Kishore Prasad — for Petitioners.

Advocate-General — for the Crown.

19.10.44

Meredith J. — These appeals against convictions under the Defence of India Rules have been admitted for hearing. Bail has been asked for, but that is opposed by the Crown relying upon the provisions of Rule 130A, Defence of India Rules.

Having regard to the provisions of R.130A, this Court upon the facts of these cases cannot possibly grant bail. But it is contended by Mr Raj Kishore Prasad on behalf of the appellants that this 130A is ultra vires and inoperative.

He argues, first it is not covered by S.2, Defence of India Act, and consequently the rule-making power provided by the Act gives no power to make such a rule. It is enough to say that this point has been expressly considered by a Bench of the Madras High Court in re Bhuvarama Iyengar (I.L.R. 1942 Mad. 414), and I find myself in clear agreement with the reasonings and conclusions of Sir Lionel Leach C.J. upon the point. There is a ruling of the Bombay High Court in re Surajlal Harilal (A.I.R. 1943 Bom.82) to a similar effect. . . . Lastly, Mr Raj Kishore Prasad asserted that R. 130A was quite unreasonable and repugnant to elementary principles of justice and, therefore he says, we should refuse to consider ourselves bound by it. I am afraid that whatever we may think upon this point our powers do not extend so far. It is the business of the High court to observe laws however unreasonable if validly made. I must not be assumed to have expressed the opinion that the provision is in fact unreasonable and unjust, because it must be remembered that many provisions which would appear very harsh and unreasonable in peace time may be justified by the necessities of war.

In my judgment bail must be refused in these cases.

Varma J. — I agree and I have nothing to add.

Bail refused.

AIR, Vol. 32, 1945, Privy Council, p. 48

(From Federal Court of India: (143) 30 A.I.R. 1943 F.C.36)

6th November, 1944.

N.L.C. Macaskie, Sir W. Monckton, Sir Thomas Strangman, W. Wattach and R.K. Handoo
— for Appellant.

Respondents Ex — Parte.

The Lord Chancellor — This is an appeal by the Government of India from a judgment of the Federal Court (Varadachariar C.J. and Zafrulla Khan J., Rowland J., dissenting) dated 4th January 1943, dismissing an appeal from a judgment of the High Court at Calcutta (Sir Harold Derbyshire C.J., Khundkar and Sen J.J.), Setting aside a conviction of 15 individuals by a Special Magistrate purporting to act under Ordinance No. 2 of 1942 promulgated by the Governor-General on 2nd January 1942. The ground upon which the conviction was set aside was that the Ordinance was ultra vires. The question is largely academic, for upon Ordinance 2 being declared by the Federal Court to be ultra vires, Ordinance 19 of 1943 was promulgated to replace it. But in view of the elaborate argument that has taken place and the way in which the topic has been dealt with in the judgments in India, their Lordships think that the better course is to decide the question whether Ordinance 2 is invalid, especially as this may be of as instance deciding other questions which may arise hereafter as to the validity of Ordinances made, in cases of emergency, by the Governor-General under the authority of S. 317 and para 72 of Sch 9 Government of India Act, 1935.

Their Lordships must, however, make a preliminary observation on the way in which the issue of the validity of the Ordinance has been dealt with by the Indian Courts. The appeal from the Special Magistrate who convicted the accused was brought to the High Court under its criminal revisionary jurisdiction by a petition for revision under Ss. 435 and 439, Criminal P.C. This assumes that the Court below was a valid inferior Court whose decision calls, in the view of the appellants who were convicted and sentenced by it, for revision. But if the Special Magistrate who tried the case was a valid Court, duly authorized by the Ordinance, then by the very terms of the Ordinance there is no appeal to the High Court. Sen J., at the beginning of his judgment in the High Court, points this out very clearly. If, on the other hand, the Ordinance had no validity, the Special Magistrate was in the same position as a private person who took upon himself to conduct a trial of the appellants and to sentence them to imprisonment without any authority at all. In this latter alternative, the remedy of release by process in the nature of habeas corpus (S.491, Criminal P.C.) would be the appropriate remedy. Their Lordships content themselves with pointing this out, without seeking to dispose of the litigation on this ground, as in their opinion the matter can be satisfactorily dealt with by considering whether the objections taken to the Ordinance have any validity.

The Governor-General purported to make and promulgate the Ordinance under a power conferred in him by para 72 of Sch.9, Government of India Act, 1935. That paragraph – which must, of course, be read in the light of the India and Burma (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1940 (where under the operation of the words ‘for the space of not more than six months from its promulgation’ was suspended during the period therein specified) – provides as follows:

72. The Governor-General may, in cases of emergency, make and promulgate ordinances for the peace and good Government of British India or any part thereof, any Ordinance so made shall, for the space of not more than six months from its promulgation, have the like force of law as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature but the power of making Ordinance under this section is subject to the like restrictions as the power of the Indian Legislature to make laws; and any Ordinance made under this section is subject to the like disallowance as an Act passed by the Indian Legislature, and may be controlled or superseded by any such Act.

It is to be observed that the paragraph does not require the Governor-General to state that there is an emergency, or what the emergency is, either in the text of the Ordinance or at all, and assuming that he acts bona fide and in accordance with his statutory powers, if cannot rest with the Courts to challenge his view that the emergency exists. In the present instance, such questions are immaterial, for at the date of the Ordinance (2nd January 1942) no one could suggest that the situation in India did not constitute an emergency of the most anxious kind. Japan had declared war on the previous 7th December: Rangoon had been bombed by the enemy on 23rd December and again on December: earlier Ordinances had recited that an emergency had arisen which required special provision being made to maintain essential services, to increase certain penalties, to deal with looting of property left unprotected by evacuation of premises, and so forth. Their Lordships entirely agree with Rowland J.’s view that such circumstances might, if necessary, properly be considered in determining whether an emergency had arisen: but, as that learned Judge goes on to point out, and, as had already been emphasised in the High Court, the question whether an emergency existed at the time when an Ordinance is made and promulgated is a matter of which the Governor-General is the sole judge. This proposition was laid down by the Board in 58 I.A. 169 and is plainly right. On 3rd September 1939, the date on which war was proclaimed between His Majesty and Germany the Governor-General, acting under S. 102, Government of India Act, 1935, had proclaimed that ‘a grave emergency exists whereby the security of India is threatened by war’ and thereupon the Indian Legislature acquired power to make laws for a province with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the ‘Provincial Legislative List’, with the result that the Governor-General, acting under para. 2 of Sch.9, had in case of emergency the same width of Legislative power.

Two objections, however, were raised to the validity of the Ordinance in connection with the question of ‘emergency’. The Ordinance recited that ‘an emergency has arisen which makes it necessary to provide for the setting up of Special Criminal Courts’. And the body of the Ordinance contained the necessary framework for Courts of Criminal jurisdiction consisting of Special Judges, Special Magistrates and Summary Courts, the provisions as to their respective limits of jurisdiction and procedure, together with restrictions on appeal (which fall to be separately considered in this judgment), but the Ordinance did not itself set up any of these Courts, but provided by S.1, sub-section (3) that the Ordinance Shall come into force in any province only if the Provincial Government being satisfied of the existence of an emergency arising from any disorder within the Province or from a hostile attack on India or on a country neighbouring on India or from the imminence of such an attack, by notification in the official Gazette, declares it to be in force in the Province, and shall cease to be in force when such notification is rescinded.

In view of this last provision, it was contended that the Ordinance was invalid either because the language of the section showed that the Governor-General, notwithstanding the preamble, did not consider that an emergency existed but was making provision in case one should arise in future, or else because the section amounted to what was called delegated legislation', by which the Governor-General without legal authority sought to pass the decision as to whether an emergency existed to the Provincial Government instead of deciding for himself. There is, in their Lordships opinion no valid ground for either of these contentions. As regards the first one, it is enough to say that an emergency may well exist which 'makes it necessary to provide for the setting up of Special Criminal Courts' without requiring such Courts to be actually set up forthwith all over India. Any other view would appear to deny to the Governor-General the possibility, when faced with an emergency, of making provisions which could be instantly applied if the danger increased and became even more critical to the part of India where it was necessary to apply them. It would in fact (as Beaumont C.J. observed in reference to a similar objection in the Bombay High Court in I.L.R. (1943) Bom. 331 at p. 351), deny to the Governor-General, when faced with an emergency, the exercise of any foresight in the protection of the State. He may well have considered that, in view of the existing emergency, it was necessary to have a scheme for Special Courts drawn up and all ready for application if the existing emergency was further aggravated. A very similar situation arose in this country when, under the Emergency Powers Act, the Government devised and prepared for instant application a system of Zone Courts which were to be put into force only if, owing to invasion by the enemy or the like, the ordinary Courts in some part of the country were judged unable to function satisfactorily. Sen J. in the High Court expressed the opinion that 'the provisions of this Ordinance proclaim unmistakably that the Governor-General did not think that an emergency which necessitates that such an emergency may arise at some future time. That, however, is not enough. The Governor-General had no power to promulgate this Ordinance unless he was of opinion that the emergency requiring it actually existed; it is therefore ultra vires of the Governor-General'.

With all respect of the learned Judge, their Lordships are quite unable to accept this reasoning; it is perfectly possible, and indeed it is quite obvious, that the Governor-General regarded the situation on 2nd January 1942, as constituting an emergency – in view of what was happening it would be remarkable if he did not – and this justified and authorized the Ordinance providing in advance for Special Courts. It does not in the least follow that the bringing of Special Courts into actual existence and operation all over India must take place at the same time.

The next objection to be considered is the contention that S.26 of the Ordinance, which is framed to exclude the revisional and appellate powers of the High Court in cases dealt with by the Special Courts constituted under the Ordinance, was ineffective and ultra vires as being in conflict with S.223, Government of India Act, 1935. Section 223 provides

Subject to the provisions of this part of this Act, to the provisions of any Order in Council made under this or any other Act, and to the provisions of any Act of the appropriate Legislature enacted by virtue of powers conferred upon that Legislature by this Act, the jurisdiction of, and the law administered in, any existing High Court . . . shall be same as immediately before the commencement of part 3 of this Act.

Previous to 1935 the High Court had revisional jurisdiction over the Magistrates' Courts in the relevant area. The argument advanced was that this jurisdiction could not be taken away by an Ordinance made by the Governor-General under para 72, as the Governor-General's Ordinance was not an 'Act of the appropriate Legislature'. 'Legislature', it was said, only means the Central Legislature consisting of the two Houses and the Governor-General, or the Provincial Legislature consisting of the two Houses and the Governor, and the Governor-General when making an Ordinance in cases of emergency under para 72 was not either of these Legislatures. The argument, as Sir Harold Derbyshire pointed out in his judgment, overlooked the provision in S.311 (6) of the Act, which says:

Any reference in this Act to . . . Acts or laws of the Federal or a Provincial Legislature, shall be construed as including a reference to an Ordinance made by the Governor-General.

There is, thus, no substance in this objection. Assuming that the condition as to emergency is fulfilled, the Governor-General acting under para 72 may repeal or alter the ordinary law as to the revisionary jurisdiction of the High Court, just as the Indian Legislature itself might do. There remains to be considered another objection to the validity of the Ordinance which is, as their Lordships understand, the main ground upon which it has been held to be ultra vires. The objection may perhaps be stated in more ways than one, but the substance of it, as appears both from the judgment of Sir Harold Derbyshire in the High Court and of the Chief Justice in the Federal Court, is that the Ordinance makes it possible to discriminate between one accused and another, or between one class of offence and another, so that cases may be tried either in the Special Courts or under the ordinary and well established Criminal procedure according to the direction and decision of Provincial authorities. It is evident that this is an aspect of the matter which has greatly troubled the majority of the Judges in India who have had this case before them, and in view of the well established practice in India by which decisions in Criminal cases are open to review by a higher Court, it is natural that those who are versed in applying this system should feel disturbed by the totally different arrangement contained in the Ordinance. The following are the sections of the Ordinance which appear to have given the judges in India most concern;

5. A Special Judge shall try such offence or classes of offences, or such cases or classes of cases as the Provincial Government, or a servant of the Crown empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf, may by general or special order in writing direct . . .

10. A Special Magistrate shall try such offence or classes of offences, or such cases or classes of cases other than offence or cases involving offence punishable under the Indian Penal Code with death as the Provincial Government, or a servant of the Crown empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf, may, by general or Special order in writing direct . . .

14. If any question arises whether, under an order made under S.5 or S.10, an offence is triable by a Special Judge or a Special Magistrate, the question shall be referred for decision to the authority which made the order and the decision of that authority shall be final.

16. — (1) A Summary Court shall have power to try such offences or classes of offences, or such cases or classes of cases as the District Magistrate, or in a Presidency-town the Chief Presidency Magistrate, or a servant of the Crown authorized in this behalf by the District Magistrate or Chief Presidency Magistrate, may by general or special order direct.

Provided that no person shall be tried by a Summary Court for an offence which is punishable with imprisonment for a term exceeding two years, unless it is an offence specified in sub-section (1) of S. 260 of the Code.

(2) The District Magistrate or Chief Presidency Magistrate may by general or Special order give directions as to the distribution among the Summary Courts within his jurisdiction of cases triable by then under sub-section (1).

Sir Harold Derbyshire found that the sections above quoted were invalid. He pointed out, with justice, that the Ordinance left it to the local Government, or to some officer of the local Government empowered by it in that behalf, to direct what offences or classes of offences, and moreover what cases or classes of cases, should be tried by the Special Courts. He thought that this amounted to repealing the Code of Criminal Procedure in part, for under the Ordinance there would be no trial by jury and no right of appeal and no right of revision by superior Courts, including the High Courts, such as are enacted by the Code.

'In effect', he said,

It is the Provincial Government or the District Magistrate acting not in a judicial capacity but in an administrative capacity that deprives the subject of his right under the Code and repeals its valid provisions as far as he is concerned. That, in my view, is repealing the Code of Criminal procedure in part — in that instance legislation ad hoc for the man's case.

He added that he did not find authority in S.72 to justify this result and in his view the above-quoted sections which he declared invalid, purported to authorize persons other than the duly authorized Legislature constituted under the Government of India Act, 1935, to repeal ad hoc certain provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code and of the letters patent of the High Court. Khundkar J. agreed with the Chief Justice on this point and stated his objection to the above quoted sections of the Ordinance thus.

The result is that no man accused of an offence may know whether he is to be tried by a Court under the Code, subject to all the safeguards provided by the Code, including a right of appeal or revision under the Code, or to be tried on the mere motion of the provincial Government or of an officer of the Crown empowered by the Provincial Government, by some one or other of the Special Courts under the Ordinance. The provincial Government or an officer of the Crown empowered by the Provincial Government is endowed with a power that is far reaching, unfettered by rule, unconditional and subject to no supervision by the High Court or by any Court under the Code. It is a power to direct any person accused of any criminal offence to be tried by one or other of the Courts constituted under the Ordinance.

The learned Judge goes on to point out what he regards as 'the possible mischief which may flow from the unwise or injudicious exercise of such a power, fortifying his criticism by quotations from well-known writers on jurisprudence such as Anson and Salmond; and he concludes that the above-quoted sections are ultra vires on the ground that the Ordinance gives to the Provincial Governments a 'power to effectuate jurisdiction of Special Criminal Courts by making orders in individual cases or groups of cases'. Sen J., as their Lordships understand, did not differ from the Chief Justice and Khundkar J., in this view, though he rested his decision that the Ordinance was ultra vires on other grounds which their Lordships have already indicated. In the Federal Court the Chief Justice dwelt on the value of the revisionary jurisdiction, but considered that the most serious defect in the impugned Ordinance was the power it conferred to discriminate between one accused and another by directing trial in different Courts. He developed his objections on this point by elaborate reference to the constitutional principles involved in certain decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the High Court of Australia, and quoted passages from the writings of Sir Courtenay Ilbert and of Sir Cecil Carr to illustrate the relation between executive and legislative powers in the British Constitution. He concluded that Ss. 5, 10 and 16 of the Ordinance are 'Open to objection as having left the exercise of the power thereby conferred on executive officers to their absolute and unrestricted discretion, without any legislative provision or direction laying down the policy or conditions with reference to which that power is to be exercised'.

This was the grounds upon which the Chief Justice and Zafrulla Khan J. based their decision that the appeal of the Crown should be dismissed.

With the greatest respect to these eminent Judges, their Lordships feel bound to point out that the question whether the Ordinance is ultra vires does not depend on considerations of jurisprudence or of policy. It depends simply on examining the language of the Government of India Act and of comparing the legislative authority conferred on the Governor General with the provisions of the Ordinance by which he is purporting to exercise that authority. It may be that as a matter of wise and well framed legislation it is better if circumstances permit to frame a statute in such a way that the offender may know in advance before what Court he will be brought if he is charged with a given crime, but that is a question of policy, not of law. There is nothing of which their Lordships are aware in the Indian Constitution to render invalid a statute, whether passed by the Central Legislature or under the Governor-General's emergency powers, which does not accord with this principle. Rowland J., at the beginning of his dissenting judgment, collects a number of striking quotation from previous judgments delivered in the Privy Council as to the proper rule of construction. Again and again, this Board has insisted that in construing enacted words we are not concerned with the policy involved or with the results, injurious or otherwise, which may follow from giving effect to the language used. The learned judges who were in the majority in the Federal Court would presumably not contest this proposition, and their Lordships rather understand their view to be based on the conception that there is something underlying the written Constitutions of India which debars the Executive Authority, though specially authorized by the statute or Ordinance to do so, from giving directions after the accused has been arrested and charged with crime as to the choice of Court which is to try him. Their Lordships are unable to find that any such constitutional limitation is imposed. Indeed, Rowland J. points out that if it were held that where two sets of Courts exist side by side power cannot be delegated to pass an order directing that a case shall come before the Special Court and not before the Court under the Code, this would throw doubt on a long course of legislation in India where this very thing is enacted. The learned judge cit. 13 instances, and, in addition to these, refers to the discretion conferred by the Army Act and by the Air Force Act upon the prescribed authority to decide in a particular case, where a Criminal Court and a Court martial would both have jurisdiction, before which Court the accused shall be brought for trial. There is not, of course, the slightest doubt that the Parliament of Westminster could validly enact that the choice of Courts should rest with an Executive Authority, and their Lordships are unable to discover any valid reason why the same discretion should not be conferred in India by the law-making authority, whether that authority is the Legislature or the Governor-General, as an exercise of the direction conferred on the authority to make laws for the peace, order, and good Government of India. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be allowed. The judgment of the Federal Court must be set aside and the ordinance 2 of 1942 declared not to be ultra vires.

Appeal allowed.

255: Balkrishna Narayan Saoji (Applicant) v. Col. N.S. Jatar, Inspector General of Prisons, C.P. Berar, Nagpur and another — Opposite Party Bose and Sen J.J. (6 Nov. 1944)

AIR, Vol. 32, 1945, Nagpur, p. 33

Misc. Criminal Case No. 47 of 1944. Decided on 6th November 1944.

G.R. Pradhan, S.G. Ghuls, Y.G. Shirke and R.E. Manochar — for Applicant

M Hidayatullah, Advocate-General — for the Crown.

(Order 13th September 1944) — These are proceedings for contempt of Court against the Inspector-General of Prisons of the C.P. Government and the Superintendent of the Central Jail at Nagpur. The applicant Balkrishna Narayan Saoji was at the time we are considering here a security prisoner detained under R.26 (1) (b). Defence of India Rules. It seems that he had been giving considerable trouble in the jail and we make it plain that in the action we propose to take we are not in any way sympathizing with his conduct or endorsing his action. We have no doubt he richly deserved all he got. On 19th May 1943, the then Superintendent of the Central jail, not the one now before us, filed an application against the prisoner under S.52. Prisons Act, for having refused to take food on 17th May 1943. The case was eventually registered on 3rd June 1943, under R. 19 (2) read with R. 17 (9), C.P. and Berar Detention Order. The case was taken up by Mr M.A. Razzaque, a Magistrate of the First Class. On 21st September 1943, the applicant applied to the Magistrate for an adjournment. The prayer was refused and the case was closed for judgment on 25th September 1943. On 23rd September 1943, the applicant put in a petition to the High Court, written on the 22nd asking for a stay of proceeding and handed this to the Superintendent now before us for being forwarded to the High Court. He also asked in the petition that interviews with other counsel might be permitted because the counsel employed by him had told the Magistrate on 21st September 1943, that he was unable to argue the case. We make no comment on this latter request because in view of the applicant's conduct in jail it is possible that this was not made in good faith. We will confine our attention to the application for stay.

Instead of forwarding this application to the High Court, the Jail Superintendent forwarded it to the Magistrate trying the case with a request to him to forward it not to the High Court, but to the Inspector General of Prisons for such remarks as the Magistrate might like to make on it. Moreover knowing that the case had been fixed for judgment on 25th September 1943.

the application was not forwarded immediately but was sent on 24th September 1943. This has been regarded as prompt action by the Inspector General of Prisons in his report to the Secretary to Government. The report is dated 21st July 1944, and the remark is to be found in para 2. All we will say about this is that opinions differ as to what constitutes promptness, considering the urgency of the matter. The Magistrate did not return the application immediately as he should have done, but kept it for four days and waited till 28th September 1943, before directing it to be returned. We are told by the learned Advocate-General that the jail endorsements on this application show that it was not received by the Superintendent of the Central Jail till 8 p.m. on 30th September 1943. This delay of two days from the passing of the Magistrate's order to the receipt of it in the Central Jail requires explanation, and before we proceed further with the Jail Superintendent's case we call for an explanation from the Magistrate, first for keeping this important application asking for stay of these proceedings with him for four days. (The endorsement of his office shows that he received it on 24th September 1943, at 4 p.m. His order directing its return to the Superintendent of the Central Jail was not made till 28th September 1943). Secondly, as to whether the application was in fact returned on the 30th at as late an hour as 8 p.m. or whether it was returned earlier, and if it was returned after he had delivered judgment why this should have occurred.

The Magistrate did not deliver judgment on 25th September 1943, as he had originally proposed but postponed delivery till 30th September 1943. We do not know why delivery of judgment was postponed. Of course there was nothing wrong in postponing it and it may be that it was done in order to allow time for the application to reach the High Court. But if that is so, the delay which, according to the learned Advocate-General's instructions occurred in the Magistrate's Court requires explanations. As we have said, we withhold further comment on the Jail Superintendent's case until that explanation is received. On returning the application to the Jail Superintendent the Magistrate made the following endorsement:

The judgment is fixed for 30th September 1943 and as such, I cannot pass any remarks. This may be returned back to Superintendent, Central Jail, for necessary action as I have nothing to do with the revision petition.

The date on which the Superintendent received this back has as we have just remarked, yet to be ascertained. But on receiving it back from the Magistrate the Superintendent instead of forwarding it to the High Court forwarded it to the Inspector General of Prisons on 1st October 1943. In his endorsement forwarding it to the Inspector-General of Prisons the Superintendent stated that:

Mr Razzaque has returned it to the jail after delivering the judgment in case of the prisoner on 30th September 1943.

When the Inspector General received this application he did not forward it to this Court as he should have done but returned it to the Jail Superintendent and had it not been for another application made at a later date this matter would probably never have come to the notice of the Court. In our opinion, this constitutes contempt. The Inspector-General's explanation is that as the application of the 22nd/23rd asked for stay and as he received the application after judgment had been delivered he was of opinion that nothing more could be done and so he returned it to the Jail Superintendent and that in doing so he had no intention of impeding the course of justice. We accept this explanation to the extent that he acted in good faith, but we consider it necessary to censure him for his action. It was not for him to arrogate to himself the functions of His Majesty's Judges and decide what this Court could and could not do. We regret to notice a lamentable tendency of late of attempts by executive officials to set themselves above the High Court. Examples are to hand not only in these cases but in matters which have reached the Federal Court dealing with cases from Bengal and the Punjab. They are also to be found in two decisions of the Lahore High Court. A similar attempt was made in England.

It is true the exigencies of war have armed the executive with immense powers and that Courts of justice, including the High Courts, have to some extent been neutralized and rendered ineffective, but it is not for the executive to judge how far their powers extend. That is the sole and exclusive privilege of His Majesty's Judges and of His Majesty's Privy Council. No official, however highly he may be placed, has the right to determine the extent of his own authority and power and any attempt by whomsoever made and however highly he may be placed, to withhold matter or delay applications addressed to this Court, however frivolous or worthless they may appear to be constitutes a gross contempt of Court, and if this happens again in this province, severe action will be taken against any person who attempts to abuse his position of authority by withholding or delaying matter intended for this Court, and we repeat that this will be done whoever the official may be and however highly he may be placed. We also state that ignorance of the law will provide no excuse, particularly after this case. The Crown is not slow to ask for the application of this maxim with all its rigour in cases where the executive are proceeding against persons more humbly placed in life. A man who sells a pack of cards or a bag of wheat above the control rates in circumstances when he could not reasonably have known of the order fixing the price is prosecuted, and the Courts are asked to treat him with severity. They are asked to apply the maxim that ignorance of the law affords no excuse and are told that it is the business of these humbly placed persons to know the law and find out what it is. We say nothing about that but remark that the maxim applied equally in the case of Government officials who are more happily placed and who have the advantage of free legal advice from the legal advisers to the Crown at their disposal if they trouble to ask for it. There is, therefore, no excuse on this point.

Turning now to the case of the Inspector-General of Prisons we hold that ignorance of the law affords him no excuse and so the Inspector-General is guilty of contempt of Court. But in considering the action we should take against him we take into consideration the fact that he did not know the law and did not realise that it constitutes contempt of Court to act as he did and we believe that he acted in good faith. Also there was present in his case ground for a layman to believe that the matter had become infructuous because judgment had already been delivered. We do not imply that he was right in this. As we have said he was wrong. But we are satisfied that he held view in good faith and acted accordingly.

We say that he was wrong in the view he held because even though the proceedings of the Magistrate could not have been stayed after he had delivered judgment there was still much that the High Court could do. It could direct an inquiry into circumstances of the case. It could also institute proceedings for contempt as has now been done. We also take into consideration his long record of distinguished and gallant service-gallant on the field of battle where he has been subjected to sacrifices which most of us have happily been spared — distinguished in the domain of civil administration and distinguished no less for administrative ability than for a record of just and humane administration of the jails of this Province of which he has been in charge for many years. We therefore consider it sufficient in his case to administer a censure. We do even this with reluctance and regret because of his distinguished and gallant record of service and because we do not question the good faith of his action. But it is necessary for us to vindicate the authority of the Courts and uphold the majesty and grandeur of the law which knows no fear and shows no favour, which makes no distinction between man and man, and which acts without spite vengeance or malice.

A copy of this order will be sent to Mr Razzaque, the Magistrate who tried the proceedings out of which this application arises, for an explanation on the points we have referred to earlier in the order. The case of the jail Superintendent will be considered after the Magistrate's explanation has been received.

(Order 6th October 1944) — As far as we can gather from our file the original of Saoji's application has never been handed over to this Court until it was produced by the Advocate-General today. As the complaint all through has been regarding suppression of this document, if what we state is actually the case, the matter requires explanation. As we had paper books before us we did not see the original and took it for granted that the copies in our paper book were copies of the original. But we find that they are copies of copies supplied by the Crown. And these copies are not even certified as true copies. The matter requires explanation. We want to know (1) where and in whose possession the original has been since the date of issue of notice (2) why it was not filed and who was responsible for withholding it from this Court, (3) why such copies as have been supplied were not certified as true copies and who was responsible?

It also appears that the original of No. 1317 S.P. dated 29th September 1943 and of the Central Jail Superintendent's endorsement No. 1349 dated 1st October 1943 was not filed here and in this case also only uncertified copies were furnished. This is exceptionally important because now that the original has been shown to us we find it bears an important endorsement by the Inspector General of Prisons, which is not in the copies supplied. We want to know: (1) where and with whom this document with its endorsements has been since the issue of notice to the Crown. (2) Who was responsible for withholding the original from this Court (3) why the copies supplied were not certified as true copies and who was responsible for suppressing the endorsement of the Inspector General of Prisons from the copies supplied and (5) why this important endorsement was suppressed?

Another matter in which explanation is required is in relation to the Inspector General of Prisons' statement in his report No. 158/C dated 21st July 1944. Para 2 that Saoji's application was forwarded to the Magistrate Mr Razzaque 'in accordance with the usual procedure'. We want to know (1) whether this procedure is to be found in rules, or circulars or other written directions, and if so where. We shall also require copies of these if they are in writing (2) and in any event we shall require some five or six instances in which this has been done particularly in connection with applications addressed to the High Court. The Advocate-General wants a fortnight's time. Put up a fortnight hence.

(Order 6th November 1944) — This case becomes more and more serious the further we go and its ramifications have extended farther than we had at first visualised. The applicant Saoji put in a petition to this Court on 12th May 1944 complaining that a petition which he had made from jail on 22nd September 1943 for revision of proceedings in a criminal case in a lower Court, where he was being prosecuted, was not forwarded to this Court and that it was withheld by the Inspector-General of Prisons of this Province and by the Superintendent of the Central Jail, Nagpur. He stated specifically that the application had never been sent and that it was detained by these two officers. The petition was accompanied by an affidavit – On 3rd July 1944 a Bench of this Court called for a report from the Jail authorities on the application and directed the office of this Court to furnish them with a copy of it.

The report was received on 7th August 1944 and the matter was placed before us on 14th August 1944. After studying the application and the report we considered that prima facie case of contempt was disclosed and so directed notice to issue to the Crown and to the non-applicants. There is no fixed procedure in contempt proceedings and this can be regarded as the stage at which this Court took cognizance of the complaint. The previous proceedings were in the nature of a preliminary investigation. Anyway whatever doubts there may have been regarding the nature of the previous order there can be none in respect of the order of 14th August 1944 which we issued.

Arguments were heard on 12th September 1944 and the case of the Inspector General of Prisons was disposed of. In the case of the Jail Superintendent we considered it necessary to have further information. One of the points we were considering was the question of delay. Saoji's affidavit suggested that his application to this Court was dated 22nd September 1943 and that it had been handed over to the Jail Superintendent on the same day. The Inspector-General of Prisons in his report to the Secretary to the Provincial Government stated that the application was dated 22/23 and that it had been forwarded to the trying Magistrate promptly in accordance with the usual procedure. The Jail Superintendent in his report to the Under Secretary to Government dated 19th July 1944 stated categorically that the application was written on 22/23rd September 1943 and that it was handed over on the 23rd. We wanted further information about this 'prompt' action and indeed commented on the term in our order of 13th September 1944 which disposed of the Inspector-General's case. It will be seen that there is a difference of a day between the date in the affidavit and the statements of the Inspector-General in his report and of the Jail Superintendent in his. The date in the paper book copy was also 22/23.

The other point regarding the delay was the delay which, according to the Superintendent's explanation, occurred in the office of the Magistrate trying the case. The Jail Superintendent said that he received the application back from the Magistrate on 30th September 1943 and sent it on to the Inspector-General the next morning. We did not on that date see the original of the Magistrate's order returning the application. We were reading from the copies in our paper books which we naturally concluded were copies of the original. The Advocate-General however said that he had the original of the covering letter before him and told us that the original (that is to say, the covering letter) bore an endorsement which was not in our paper books. We thought that he was reading from the original from the Court files. The endorsement was to the effect that the original application of 22nd September 1943 was received back from the Magistrate at 8 p.m. on the 30th. That struck us as an odd hour for an application like this to be delivered in the Jail, so we asked the Magistrate for an explanation about this, as well as about the delay which was said to have occurred in his office. He gave an explanation about the delay with which we shall deal in a minute, but he also said that the application was handed back to the Jail Superintendent between 4.45 and 5 p.m. and not at 8 p.m. as we had been told by the Advocate-General. He explained that the application was handed back in person by his reader, and as he and his reader were, according to the gate register at the Jail, only there between 4.45 and 5 p.m. the application could not have been handed back at 8 p.m.

Seeing this discrepancy between the endorsement which the Advocate-General read out to us on 13th September 1944 from what he told us was the original, and the explanation of the Magistrate, we said we would like to see the original for ourselves. This was at the hearing on 6th October 1944. But when we turned to the record we found to our surprise that the originals were not there (that is to say, neither the original of the application nor of the covering letter), and that what had been handed over to the Court was not the document which the applicant complained was being suppressed from us but a copy of a copy. And even that copy was not certified as a true copy. And so also with the Magistrate's order of 28th September 1943 and the covering letter. Also, so far as the Magistrate's order is concerned, the copy given to us did not have this important endorsement about the time of receipt in jail.

It is bad enough in an important case of this kind, where the good faith of high Government officials is being challenged, that there should be this inexcusable carelessness, but the explanation given makes matters worse. Whether or not Government officials know that secondary evidence is not ordinarily permissible in Courts and that the originals, when in existence, must be produced, the law officers of the Crown certainly ought to know this. It is bad enough in any ordinary case to be so careless, but here, where the good faith of the head of a Department is being challenged, and where the complaint is that a document addressed to this Court is being deliberately withheld not to hand it over to the Court at the earliest possible opportunity is inexcusable. And to hand over partial copies of other documents is equally inexcusable. This is particularly unfortunate here because it lays official honesty open to serious attack. The document was not even in Court on 6th October 1944, that is to say 4 1/2 months after complaint about its suppression was made. When we asked for it, its whereabouts was not even known and it was eventually unearthed in the Advocate-General's office. He then filed the document on that day along with some other papers and that was the first we saw of it. As a matter of fact even the Advocate-General had only been given it a few days before and as the original had been made out in triplicate he concluded that he had one of the original triplicates before him and that another of them must already have been filed along with the documents forwarded with the report of the jail.

We say this was particularly unfortunate in this case for this reason. As we have said, there is a discrepancy of a day between the date given in the applicant's affidavit and the report of the Inspector-General of Prisons which was forwarded to this Court. We take it that the object of forwarding this report without comment was to apprise us of the fact that was the defence to this action — at any rate the defence and explanation furnished to the Secretary to Government. But what this report does not disclose, and what becomes apparent the moment one looks at the original application, is that the date 23rd on the original application, is not in Saoji's handwriting and was quite evidently not there when it was handed over to the Assistant Jailor. That date is in different ink and has been inserted by somebody else — presumably some clerk in the jail office. The entire application is in Saoji's own handwriting and the date placed on the application by him is 22nd September 1943. Underneath the 22 a line appears in different ink and underneath that figure the figure 23. Looking at the copy given to us we were led to conclude that the date of the application was 22/23 is added by somebody else.

Now we do not say that this was done with malicious intent or for some improper reason. It may well be that the date on the application was incorrect or that having been written on the 22nd it was not handed over to the Jail authorities till the 23rd, and so the latter figure was added. But such tampering with a document addressed to this Court is improper and is in itself a contempt. The jail authorities can endorse the date of receipt by them separately if they so desire but they have no business to alter or add to or tamper with any portion of a document intended for and addressed to this Court. It is most objectionable to add a figure to the date so as to make it appear that the document bears a different date to the one which it originally bore. These alterations are not even initialled, and it is only a close scrutiny of the document which reveals the tampering – for tampering it is, whether done with innocent intent or from an improper motive. It is even more objectionable not to disclose these facts to us when the original is not handed over to us as it ought to have been, and we are provided with copies which furnish no inkling of this. We will deal with the explanation given to us about this later.

Another fact which the original discloses and which is not to be found in the copy handed over to this Court is that the application is headed: 'Urgent. Two more copies made over as demanded'. This heading is in a prominent position and is written in three lines in thicker ink than the rest of the application and the lines are underlined. It could not possibly escape the attention of any one who glances at the application. It hits the eye at once. It also shows that the application was prepared in triplicate by the prisoner himself. An extremely important point which was not disclosed to us until after we had demanded production of the original. Turning next to the attack made on the Magistrate by the Jail Superintendent, for attack it is whether so stated or not. The Jail Superintendent sent Saoji's application of 22nd September 1943, to the Magistrate trying the case on 24th September 1943, with a covering memorandum of that date in these terms:

Subject: Revision application of Class II security prisoner B.N. Saoji – and Detention Order, 1943.

In forwarding herewith the revision application of Class II security prisoner B.N. Saoji addressed to the High Court, I would request you kindly to forward it to the Inspector-General of Prisons with your such remarks as you like to make on it. The application may be sent in duplicate to the Inspector-General of Prisons'.

This application was received by the Magistrate at 4 p.m. on the 24th. We were given an uncertified copy of this memorandum but were not furnished with the original. The copy did not have on it the endorsement about the time at which was received. We draw attention at this stage to the word 'revision' in the memorandum because it has an important bearing on a matter which we will discuss in due course. At the moment we merely draw attention to the word. The application and the covering memorandum were received in the Magistrate's office at 4 p.m. on 24th September 1943. The first question which arises is whether the application was forwarded promptly by the Jail Superintendent.

It will be recollected that the Magistrate closed the proceedings before him for judgment on 21st September 1943, and that he fixed the case for delivery of judgment on 25th September 1943. There was accordingly urgency in the matter. If the High Court was to have an opportunity for interfering, there were only four days left to it to hear the application and pass orders. The applicant's affidavit states that the petition was handed over on the 22nd, and the date on the petition as now observed from the original bears him out. There is no counter affidavit. All we have is the unproved endorsement of the Assistant Jailor to the effect that the application was signed before him on the 23rd. It is most unsatisfactory to have matters left in this inchoate form and we would be fully justified in concluding that the affidavit is true. However, in contempt proceedings the person proceeded against is as much entitled to the benefit of the doubt as any accused in a Criminal case. Accordingly we will give the Jail Superintendent the benefit of the doubt and accept that the document was handed over on the 23rd. But we are justified in assuming on these facts that it was handed over early in the day.

Now, as we have said, the document is prominently headed 'urgent'. That strikes the eye at once. The first sentence in it asks for 'immediate action'. It discloses, and of course this would be a matter known to the Jail Superintendent in any event that the case had been fixed by the Magistrate for judgment on 25th September 1943. It discloses that the applicant was seeking revision of this order and asking the High Court to stay delivery of judgment until the applicant had been properly tried. (The complaint was that the applicant was not permitted to consult three counsels whom he named: that a petition for revision against one of the interlocutory orders of the Magistrate was destroyed by the jail officials: that the applications made to the trying Magistrate were not forwarded: that at the fifth adjournment of the case when the prisoner was ultimately produced in Court he informed the Court of his inability to proceed because the counsel who had hitherto been appearing for him had withdrawn being busy with some other case: that the Court refused to give the prisoner further time, closed the case, and fixed 25th September 1943 for delivery of judgment). The urgency of the matter was therefore apparent on the application as soon as possible, the Jail Superintendent left it till the last possible minute and despatched the application almost at the close of a working court-day. Clearly it would have been impossible for the High Court to do anything at that stage. And this is regarded by the Inspector-General of Prisons as 'prompt action'. The jail is at Nagpur. The trying Magistrate was at Nagpur. The trial was at Nagpur. The High Court is at Nagpur. The Provincial Government is at Nagpur. The Inspector-General of Prisons is at Nagpur. The Legal Secretary is at Nagpur. The law officers of the Crown are at Nagpur. There are telephones at Nagpur, and whether or not the trying Magistrate has a telephone connection every one of these authorities could be reached on the telephone. Had there been the slightest doubt as to the proper course it could have been cleared up at very short notice. But the Jail Superintendent does not say he had any doubts. He says in his report of 19th July 1944 that 'it was forwarded by me to the Court of Mr Razzaque M.F.C. Nagpur on 24th September 1943 for being forwarded to the High Court' (the under lining (here italicized, is ours) 'through the I.G. of Prisons C.P. and Berar'.

And he explains why he did this. He says: 'The idea of sending the petition through Mr Razzaque was that the case of the prisoner may be adjourned till the orders of the High Court on the petition of the prisoner were received'.

We do not believe this explanation, and the Jail Superintendent has given another one in the belated explanation which he tendered to us direct on 13th October 1944. The explanation given there (we refer to the statement of 13th October 1944) is not that the Magistrate might have an opportunity of staying his proceedings, pending the orders of the High Court but 'because he was undefended undertrial and judgment was due to be delivered in the case of which he sought stay of proceedings'.

We say we do not believe the first explanation because the memorandum forwarding the application to the trying Magistrate asks that the application be forwarded, not to the High Court, but to the Inspector-General of Prisons. This is not the formula adopted in official correspondence when a communication is intended to reach an ultimate destination. Had there been the slightest intention that the application should ultimately reach the High Court the trying Magistrate would have been asked to forward it to the High Court, through the Inspector-General of Prisons, and not to the Inspector-General of Prisons. We have not the slightest doubt that so far as the Jail Superintendent was concerned the ultimate destination which he intended for the document was the Inspector-General of Prisons and not the High Court. We say this with all the more confidence because it is apparent from his own action that he was aware of the usual official formula when a paper is being forwarded to an ultimate destination through another channel. When he sent Saoji's application of the 22nd to the trying Magistrate along with the covering memorandum which we have reproduced above he added an explanation for the Inspector-General and sent it along with the other papers. This document, also dated 24th September 1943 runs:

Forwarded to the Inspector General of Prisons C.P. and Berar, Nagpur, through Mr M.A. Razzaque, M.F.C. [Magistrate of the First Class], Nagpur for favour of disposal.

This is also headed

'Revision application of Security Prisoner B.N. Saoji addressed to High Court'.

Then again, it now transpires that the application was made in triplicate. According to the Legal Secretary's explanation:

This, in practice means that petitions are made in triplicate one copy being for the jail office, one for the Inspector-General of Prisons and the third for the authority to whom it is addressed.

Why was not the third sent to us if that is the case? If the real object was to enable the Magistrate to stay proceedings till the High Court could decide the point, why was not one of the originals sent to us and the other to the Inspector-General through the Magistrate? The answer is obvious. There was not the slightest intention on the Jail Superintendent's part to forward the application to the High Court. He was not prepared to take the responsibility. We have not the slightest doubt that it was not the intention of the Jail Superintendent to forward the application to High Court or to see that it reached the High Court. His intention was quite clearly to let his superior, the Inspector-General of Prisons, deal with the matter. He himself was either afraid, or did not want to take the responsibility of acting on his own initiative.

Now we would not have blamed him for this. He would have been wrong. He would have been guilty of contempt just the same. But nothing beyond a mild admonition would have been necessary had there been a frank and straightforward confession of guilt and after explanation or, alongside of it, an unqualified and unconditional apology. But there is not a trace of apology regarding this. There is no contrition. There is no expression of regret. On the other hand, false explanations are offered, the action is defended and the trying Magistrate is attacked. That we will come to later. But at this stage we will remark that there is no possible excuse or justification for this attitude. The importance of tendering an unconditional and unqualified apology in contempt cases was stressed by one of us in I.L.R. (1941) Nag. 301. The matter was dealt with at length and at p. 308 it was said:

I refer to the matter in these strong terms only in order that there should be no misconception about apologies in the future, and about the practice in respect of the tendering of them and in order that there should be no possible mistake about my meaning and attitude.

That was in the year 1941 so there has been ample time to take heed of the warning given. We also reproduce a passage from Oswald on Contempt, Committal and Attachment, Edn. 3, page 215:

The respondent to an application to commit should be careful not to aggravate his offence, and so perhaps bring more severe punishment on himself by unduly resisting the application: if he has in fact been guilty of contempt it is safe to apologize.

We also draw attention to the remarks of Kindersley V.C. in (1964) 33 L.J. Ch. 294 at page 298 and of Lord Russell of Killowen in (1900) 69 L.J.Q.B. 502 at page 506. We may mention in addition that we drew the attention of the Advocate-General to the decision in the Nagpur case during the course of the arguments on 6th October 1944 and remarked that the only person who had tendered an unqualified apology up till then was a person who was not before us against whom we were not proceeding, and who was not at fault, namely the trying Magistrate Mr Razzaque. We did this of set purpose to afford the Jail Superintendent an opportunity to tender an unconditional apology. And what do we find after that? Not a word of apology regarding the omission to forward the application at once but a long written justification of this by the Legal Secretary which was not only not repudiated by the Advocate-General in argument but was actually defended. A new afterthought was added by the Jail Superintendent about an undefended under trial prisoner and no repudiation was made of the prior explanation which in our opinion, is untrue despite the fact that we had hinted at the previous hearings that we found this difficult to believe. And to crown all we are informed in the Legal Secretary's long written statement that we are labouring under a misapprehension.

Now to return to the trying Magistrate. His office received the application at 4 p.m. on 24th September 1943. It was not returned to the Jail Superintendent until the 30th. Judgment had by then been delivered. We called for an explanation regarding the delay. The explanation is full and frank. There is no attempt at concealment or evasion. It is evident from the facts given there and from his reader's statement that the Magistrate was not at fault. He has nevertheless manfully accepted responsibility for the delay in his office and has tendered an unqualified and unconditional apology. This is in refreshing contrast to the evasions, denials and half truths with which we have had to contend so much of late and reflects credit on Mr Razzaque.

As neither Mr Razzaque nor his reader are before us, it will suffice to set out the facts relating to this very shortly. The application was received in Mr Razzaque's office too late to be put up before him on the 24th when it arrived. On the 25th Court reader forgot to put it up and the explanation is a reasonable one. The reader was overworked at the time and as the Court had to shift from the usual Court, where Mr Razzaque had to try some case; to the jail where he had to try others, the reader overlooked this application in the resulting confusion. The 26th was a Sunday and, according to the reader, the application was placed before Mr Razzaque on the 27th, Mr Razzaque does not try to blame his reader and say that this is not true. All he says is that he does not remember this and that he was under the impression that he passed orders on it as soon as it was placed before him which would make it the 28th. We think that was possibly the case because there was nothing for Mr Razzaque to do but to return the application and he would hardly have laid it aside for consideration. The endorsement which he made on the forwarding memorandum looks as if it was written then and there as soon as the papers were put up to him. However, we are not here to decide between Mr Razzaque and his reader. But we do observe that we appreciate not only Mr Razzaque's straightforward and wholly frank attitude, but his courage and manfulness in not trying to blame a subordinate and in accepting full responsibility for all that occurred in his office whether he was personally to blame or not. Orders were passed on the 28th and so far as Mr Razzaque personally was concerned, the matter ended there.

It will be recollected that though the case had been fixed for delivery of judgment on the 25th this was later changed to the 30th for reasons which have no bearing on the present case. The reader says that there was a rush of work on the 29th and that as he was to go to the jail with Mr Razzaque on the 30th he thought it would save time to take the papers personally and hand them back in person. We doubt if this is true. It is much more likely that the reader being overworked thought he would save himself trouble if he left the matter over till the 30th and then take the papers in person. This would save entries in the dark book and so forth. However, the reader is not before us, and we are not concerned here with his action. The papers were returned to the Jail Superintendent on the 30th at 5 p.m. As we have said, the Advocate-General informed us at the hearing on 6th October 1944, reading from the covering letter, that the figure was 8. We had not then seen the document. When the trying Magistrate pointed out that was impossible, then we were told by the Advocate-General and the Legal Secretary that the figure was 5 and not 8. Now that we have seen the document, we think the figure is a 5 and not an 8 though it could be read as either. Moreover it is formed in such a way that accusations of tampering could with justification be made. After a close scrutiny, through powerful glasses, we are satisfied that there has been no tampering or alteration but it is unfortunate that the Crown should lay its officials open to this sort of suspicion through its negligent omission to file the original forthwith.

We agree that whether it was 5 p.m. or 8 p.m. would not have made much difference except that 8 p.m. is such an unusual hour that there was some suspicion about the correctness of the date, and seeing the want of candour in the Jail Superintendent's report of 19th July 1944 we thought it proper to have all doubts set at rest. The Jail Superintendent forwarded the papers to the Inspector-General of Prisons on 1st October 1943. The Inspector-General made the following endorsement on 7th October 1943 and returned the papers:

Returned The case has already been decided and the question of staying proceeding does not arise

Now this endorsement was not on the copies supplied to us. We were given a copy of the original memorandum of the Jail Superintendent to the Inspector-General; but this endorsement was omitted. The endorsement is important for two reasons. First of all, we were, on 13th September 1944, considering the conduct of the Inspector-General of Prisons. Notice had been issued to him to show cause in an application for contempt. He had pleaded his good faith. It is patent that his actions – what he wrote, and what he did, and what he said and what orders he passed – were material and relevant and vital. This withholding of the most crucial order of all might therefore easily have had disastrous consequences for the Inspector-General. The endorsement is also important for another reason. We are now considering the Jail Superintendent's conduct, and it is relevant in this connection to consider whether he was acting on his own responsibility in withholding the application from this Court or was acting on the orders of his superior officer. It is neither here nor there that the endorsement can be construed in two ways. That is for us to decide. But whatever be the meaning of the Inspector-General's endorsement the fact remains that the application was not forwarded and that it was not handed over to this Court till 6th October 1944, more than a year after it was written, despite the complaint made on 12th May 1944, in the present application, despite the report which was called for by this Court on 3rd July 1944, despite the notices issued for contempt on 14th August 1944, and despite the challenges made in the arguments on 12th September 1943.

We do not suggest that this omission was deliberate. Reference to the action taken by the Inspector-General will be found in his report of 21st July 1944. It gives an accurate and true picture of what he did, so there is no question of dishonest suppression. But the principle is wrong. It is not for the Inspector-General to paraphrase his own orders and supply us with his own version of what he said. The fact that it is a clear and accurate paraphrase makes no difference. We are the judges of his conduct and we are entitled to know at first hand exactly what he did. If the intention is to withhold the original for good reasons or bad, and if the intention is nevertheless to supply us with copies so that we might act on them, at the very least those copies should be certified as true. If they are not relevant, there is no point in filing them. When these deficiencies and irregularities emerged on 6th October 1944, we passed a categorical order on that date calling for an explanation in respect of three specific matters. We did this so that there might be no misunderstanding. In a previous case (*P.Y. Deshpande's habeas corpus application*¹) complaint was made that we had not made ourselves clear and that we had misunderstood the position of the Crown. We accordingly left no room for misunderstanding in this case. First of all, we wanted an explanation about the withholding of Saoji's original application of 22nd September 1943. We wanted to know where and in whose possession it had been since the date of the issue of notice. We wanted to know why it was not filed and who was responsible. We wanted to know why such copies as were supplied were not certified as true copies. So also as regards the Jail Superintendent's memorandum of 24th September 1943 and his endorsement of 1st October 1943. And in particular we wanted to know why the Inspector-General's endorsement on the letter had been suppressed. The third matter related to the Inspector-General's statement in his report dated 21st July 1944 to the effect that the Jail Superintendent's action in forwarding to the trying Magistrates was 'in accordance with the usual procedure'. In answer to these queries the Crown filed a statement signed by the Legal Secretary. The statement commences:

It is respectfully submitted that the facts have not been correctly represented to the Hon'ble High Court with the result that the Hon'ble judges have been under certain misapprehensions.

Now what facts were misrepresented? We set out the matter on which we sought information in our order of 6th October 1944. We have reproduced the substance above. The facts we set out are that the original of Saoji's application of 22nd September 1943 was not filed, that the originals of the Jail Superintendent's memorandum of 24th September 1943 and his endorsement of 1st October 1943 were not filed and that the Inspector-General had made a certain statement in his report. No other fact is referred to. Not one of those facts is inaccurate. What fact then was misrepresented? And who did the misrepresentation? And what misapprehensions were we labouring under? Did we think that the originals had been filed? Did we misquote the Inspector-General's statement in his report? Or what? It is true, we said that these documents had been withheld and that an endorsement had been withheld and that an endorsement had been suppressed. That they were withheld is beyond dispute. Whether the endorsement was deliberately suppressed may be open to question, but we said nothing about the suppression being deliberate. Suppress is a stronger term than withhold, but a reference to any dictionary will show that the word means 'to withhold, keep secret, not reveal'. (We quote from the Concise Oxford Dictionary). The endorsement was withheld, the matter was kept secret and it was not revealed. The expression is strictly accurate. But if that was the one fact which was considered to be inaccurate it would not justify the use of the plural 'facts'. The statement says that facts have not been correctly stated. Proceeding further, the statement endeavours, we gather, to elucidate the misapprehension. In para 5 the statement refers back to our earlier order of 30th September 1943 in which we disposed of the Inspector-General's case and states:

¹The previous impression finding place in this Hon'ble Court's earlier order dated 13th September 1944 that they were received at 8 p.m. is done to a misreading of the endorsement itself.

What does this mean particularly when read in conjunction with the opening passages of this statement except that we had misread the endorsement? We, who had never seen the endorsement, who had never been given the document so that we might see it for ourselves, and who relied on the Advocate-General's statement of fact to us? The learned Advocate General contended in argument that was not the meaning and that there was no intention to convey the impression that we had misread the endorsement. But if language is to have any meaning we find it difficult to see what else the words can be said to import. After all this statement was not drawn up in a hurry. It is a careful and considered statement. However, as the words used import an attack upon us personally, whether that was the intention or not, we will say no more about the matter except this. We had not called for a written argument from the Legal Secretary. The Advocate-General is the proper person to present the Crown's case in argument. We deprecate manuscript eloquence in Court as much as any other judge. Written statements are not for the purposes of argument, and statements filed on behalf of the Crown form no exception to this rule.

It is necessary now to see what this statement says, personal matters aside, because it embodies the Crown's defence to this action. We will deal first with the third of the matters raised in our order of 6th October 1944. It will be remembered that the Jail Superintendent, after making the prisoner write out three copies of his application in his own handwriting, forwarded two of those copies to the Inspector-General of Prisons through the trying Magistrate and asked the Magistrate to make what remarks he liked in the matter. He retained the third. The application, though addressed to this Court, was not forwarded to it by the Jail Superintendent nor did he ask any one else to do so, and this despite the fact that there were three copies of it. The Inspector-General of Prisons justified this action in his report dated 21st July 1944 in these words:

The Superintendent of the Jail Mr Masum Ali promptly forwarded the application to the Court of Mr Razzaque in accordance with the usual procedure as the prayer was for staying proceedings.

This justification was repeated in argument on 12th September 1944. We examined the Jail Manual along with the Advocate-General on that date and were unable to find any justification for this assertion. Accordingly we asked the Advocate-General to look into the matter and let us know more about this procedure at the next hearing. No further light was forthcoming on 6th October 1944. So we placed the position beyond doubt in our order and asked for chapter and verse, particularly as the allegation was not repudiated on behalf of the Crown on 6th October 1944. Then followed the Legal Secretary's statement which was given to us on 27th October 1944. The action is still justified; and all else having failed, and after we had questioned its propriety, we are told that it is 'a matter of commonsense'. Again as this reflects on us personally we refrain from comment. But it is necessary for us to examine the position.

First, let us be clear as to what the application was. The prayer was for a stay of proceeding until the applicant could instruct a pleader, but the application was one for revision and could be nothing else. It is not so called but the body of the application makes that clear. We have already set out its substance. The complaint is that the applicant had not been afforded a proper opportunity of defending himself and that the case had been fixed for delivery of judgment of 25th September 1943. The application was in substance one for revision of the order fixing the case for delivery of judgment without giving the applicant a proper chance of defending himself. The applicant explains at the end of the application that 'the undersigned being not pleader might have committed some mistakes in the line of approach. If so, your Lordships will excuse him'.

Almost any legal practitioner, even a most junior one, would have labelled it an application for revision, had he been asked to deal with it. Under S. 435, Criminal P.C., the High Court has power to call for and examine the proceedings of any inferior criminal Court, not only to satisfy itself as to the correctness and legality of the finding, sentence or order, but also as to 'the regularity of any proceedings of such inferior Court'. And when it does so, its power to act is governed by S. 439, the revisional section: see 47 Mad. 722 at pp. 724 and 725, 20 Bom. 543 at p. 545 and 22 Cal. 131 at p. 138. It is beyond question then that the application was one for revision, that it sought to invoke the revisional jurisdiction of this Court, that this Court had power and authority to entertain it under S. 439, and that it has no other power to deal with a matter of this kind except in revision under S.439. Now whatever the Jail Superintendent's advisers may now choose to call this application, he had no doubts in his mind about its character. We have already quoted his memorandum of 24th September 1943 to the trying Magistrate which is headed:

'Subject: revision application etc.'

And the opening sentence of which reads:

'In forwarding herewith the revision application of etc.'

We have also quoted his communication dated 24th September 1943 to the Inspector-General of Prisons where he heads the communication:

'Revision application of etc.'

Not only does this accurately describe the legal nature of the application but it shows that the Jail Superintendent appreciated this aright. The Inspector-General stated in his report of 21st July 1944 that as the application was for a stay of proceedings the Jail Superintendent's action in forwarding a petition addressed to the High Court to the trying Magistrate instead of to the High Court was 'in accordance with the usual procedure'. Being unaware of any such procedure we wanted particulars. No such procedure is to be found in the Jail Manual. The learned Advocate-General was unable to enlighten us on 6th October 1944, so we gave him time to find out exactly what this procedure is and where it is to be found. We also said in our order:

And in any event we shall require some five or six instances in which this has been done. Particularly in connection with applications addressed to the High Court.

When we heard the matter again on 27th October 1944, after an interval of three weeks, not one instance was produced. It will be seen that we afforded the widest possible scope for the production of instances. Interlocutory applications are not sometimes addressed to the District Magistrate, sometimes to the Sessions Judge, and at others to this Court. But in spite of the fact that the procedure was said to be 'usual' not a single instance could be discovered in the course of these three weeks. In the Legal Secretary's long and argumentative statement he says:

I am, however, instructed to invite attention to the fact that the usual procedure is relatable to the position of B.N. Saoji as an undertrial then unrepresented by counsel.

We have no objection to this limitation. All we wanted was clarification of the statement and chapter and verse. It turns out that there are no written instructions. If not, and if the procedure is 'usual', there must be instances of it. As we have said, in spite of ample opportunity for the production of instances, not a single one was furnished. But despite that the assertion that the procedure was 'usual' was adhered to. The Legal Secretary's statement continues 'The statement represents the experience of the Inspector-General, Prisons, in many years' jail administration'. If so, one would have thought this the production of instances would have been easy. But this statement was vague. We therefore asked the Advocate-General what the word 'many' was intended to import. At first he said something like 33 years experience. Later he said he could not give even a rough idea but was sure that 'many' could not mean just two or three and that it must be much more than that.

Next we asked about the experience of other Inspector-General and were informed that the usual procedure related to the usual practice of this particular Inspector-General. That narrows the field of inquiry considerably and places an unaccustomed gloss on the meaning of 'usual'. The Legal Secretary's statement after setting out that there are no written instructions continues:

It is therefore a matter of unwritten practice based on common sense that when an unrepresented undertrial makes a petition to a Court whether as original Court or a superior Court, it is forwarded for disposal or action to the trial Court as the first Court is entitled to know what the prisoner undertrial is seeking.

Here we have an action for contempt. A petition for revision against an interlocutory order of a lower Court and the regularity of its proceedings in a Criminal trial is addressed to this Court. It is handed over to the jail authorities. It is not forwarded to this Court. It is withheld. This Court takes cognizance of the matter, issues notice, and after hearing arguments on behalf of the Crown is told that that is the usual practice. The Court is not satisfied either as to the fact of the practice or as to its propriety. It demands an explanation. It calls for instances of the practice. When not a single instance is forthcoming, this Court is told that it is common sense that a petition for revision addressed to this Court should be sent not to this Court for disposal, or even for information, but to the trial Court whose order and proceedings are under challenge, not for information, but for disposal and action. There is not a word of apology. Not a syllable of regret. No expression of contrition. But justification. That is the answer of the Crown in this province, solemnly made in writing after three weeks of deliberation. One wonders where the High Court comes in at all according to the Crown.

We say there is not a syllable of regret, but there is a matter of fact an expression of regret at the end of the statement — we shall deal with that later. But it does not cover this. There is not a word of regret for this. We are at a loss to know how to characterize this. But for the High Court to be told in answer to its remonstrances that it is common sense that revision petitions addressed to this Court for redress against wrongful or illegal action by a trial Court should be sent to the trial Court for disposal or for action is not, in our opinion, either a courteous or a proper answer. One knows that the powers of the High Court have been considerably curtailed under certain Ordinances but things have not reached this pass.

All Judges are familiar with the normal procedure in applications for revision, and for stay and in other interlocutory matters, both in civil and in criminal proceedings. No question of presenting such applications to the trial Court for disposal or for action arises, or can arise and it makes no difference whether the applicant is represented by counsel or not, and whether he is in jail or is free. After this follows a statement to the effect that Saoji, being a security prisoner as well as an undefended undertrial prisoner occupied a dual capacity and that therefore in these circumstances it is not possible to produce corresponding instances. This is nothing but a quibble. We never asked for corresponding instances. We took it for granted that as assertion that the Jail Superintendent had acted in accordance with the 'usual procedure' meant something. If the procedure was usual it is evident that there must be instances of it. We asked for five or six instances. This is no answer to our request. Then the Legal Secretary states:

There is however the fact that many habeas corpus petitions have been forwarded to this Court, and there are also attached copies of memo on applications of this type which will show the procedure to be followed regarding all petitions from security prisoners no matter to whom addressed. The only difference in this case was the assertion of an additional line of communication namely the trying Magistrate which was related to Saoji's petition as an undertrial.

We are unable to understand what habeas corpus petitions have to do with the question. No trial Court is involved in a habeas corpus petition. That is petition which is addressed direct to this Court, and as far as we know, such petitions have always been forwarded. What possible bearing that has on the practice set up about forwarding petitions addressed to this Court, to the trial Court we are unable to fathom. Moreover, except for one habeas corpus petition in the year 1938, there have been no petitions until the last year and a half. That petition (the one in 1938) was filed in the Court direct. As regards recent habeas corpus applications the practice at first was to send them direct to this Court from the jail. This was changed for a time and in the interval the petitions were forwarded through the Chief Secretary to Government, but latterly the original practice has been restored and such petitions now come direct. As a matter of fact we have no quarrel with the channel through which petitions are to come, provided they do come and provided there is no delay. We have no quarrel with that; what we challenge is the untrue and unfounded assertion that it is the practice to send such applications or any other application for that matter addressed to this Court, to the trial Court without any effort to ensure that they reach this Court.

In the end after repeated questions from the Bench the learned Advocate-General was forced to concede that this case is the first instance in which a petition addressed to this Court, or for that matter to any appellate or revisional Court, has been sent to the trial Court, either for 'disposal' or for 'action' or 'for such remarks as you may like to make on it'. To say that this solitary instance constitutes a practice of many years based on common sense and to persist in saying it even after opportunity is afforded to acknowledge the error and set it right, is perverse. A more recklessly negligent statement would be difficult to find — and that made not by some illiterate and ignorant litigant but by the Crown after serious deliberation and consultation with its law officers. Ordinary litigants who are required to verify their statements and who, after opportunity for due deliberation make false statements of this character recklessly, not caring whether they be true or false lay themselves open to a criminal prosecution for perjury.

On 31st October 1944, four days after this case was closed for orders (arguments were concluded on 27th October 1944, and the case was closed for orders on the same day), and after almost the whole of the draft of this order was ready the learned Advocate-General came to us and informed us that he had at last been able to discover another instance of this 'usual' practice spread over the many years of the Inspector-General's wide experience. He stated that he now had two instances to show us. One the present matter, the other a bail application made by the same applicant on 17th January 1944. We find it difficult to be patient with the attitude we have met in this and other cases. It is bad enough that judicial time should be wasted in dealing with frivolous or worse, we do not know which, contentions by the Crown, but for an officer of the Crown to come to us after all is over, after three hearing spread over an interval of six weeks (12th September 1944 to 27th October 1944) and ask us to reconsider the question on the ground of discovery of important matter to which our attention should be drawn and then to discover that the new matter is as frivolous as the rest strains our endurance to the breaking point.

Even if what the learned Advocate-General said was correct two instances would not constitute a practice any more than one swallow, or even two, makes a summer, nor do two wrongs make a right. But an instance after the one complained of can hardly be quoted as an instance of practice justifying a prior act. The application we are concerned with here was made on 22nd September 1943. The instance now quoted to us is dated 17th January 1944. But that apart, this so-called instance is not an instance at all. The application with which the present proceedings are concerned arose out of petition dated 22nd September 1943 for revision of an interlocutory order. That petition was withheld and judgment was delivered. Saoji filed an appeal to the Sessions judge. The appeal was dismissed on 13th January 1944, pending the making of petition for revision. He explained that he was coming up in revision but was obliged to wait for a copy of the judgment. This bail application of 17th January 1944, is the second instance now quoted.

It is not an instance because it has no connection with a lower Court, nor was it ever sent to a lower Court. It was sent instead to the Under Secretary to Government in the jail Department and there it staved till 10th February 1944, and there it would probably have staved for ever had this Court not taken action. On 2nd February 1944, the applicant filed his application for revision and notices were issued to the District Magistrate on 3rd February 1944. On the same day as the application for revision, namely, on 2nd February 1944, the applicant filed a second application for bail through counsel. Notices were ordered to issue to the Crown on this second application on 4th February 1944, and it was not until after receipt of these notices that the Under Secretary thought fit to forward the hitherto suppressed application of 17th January 1944. It was forwarded on 10th February 1944. That is anything but an instance of the mythical practice relied on. The statement of the Legal Secretary has another surprising passage. It reads:

The Inspector-General of Prisons was misled by the prayer in the petition which was for stay of proceedings and the impossibility of giving effect to it, with the result that he overlooked the address to this Hon'ble Court.

This is not what the Inspector-General said in his report dated 21st July 1944. There he said: 'As the proceedings which the prisoner requested the High Court to stay were all over and judgment delivered on 30th September 1943. I returned the petition to the jail Superintendent.

There is not a syllable here to suggest that he was misled by the prayer and it is impossible that he could have been. Moreover, the covering letter to him is headed: 'Revision application of security prisoner Balkrishna Narayan Saoji addressed to the High Court'. We will deal next with an important issue which this statement of the Legal Secretary raises regarding the dual character of security prisoners who were also prosecuted for offences. It seems to be the underlying assumption that a man on trial for a Criminal offence is not entitled to the usual rights and privileges of an accused person if he happens to be a security prisoner. Nothing could be more ill founded. We have dealt at length with this in *Re. P.Y. Deshpande's habeas corpus petition. Misc. Criminal Case No. 70 of 1944*² Under the Defence of India Act the procedure to be followed even in the matter of security prisoners is the procedure laid down in the Criminal Procedure Code. The Crown is not bound to prosecute but if it does, then the accused is entitled to defend himself. Nothing is taken away except that in a matter touching bail certain reservations are made.

Think for a moment what this contention would mean if pushed to its logical conclusion. A police constable with a grudge against a man could arrest him under R. 129 and detain him. He could next bring an unfounded charge for murder against him and in given circumstances might succeed in inducing the authorities to prosecute. He might also succeed in persuading some Sub-Divisional Magistrate to make the accused a security prisoner under R. 26. Such unaccustomed powers have been conferred even on Sub-Divisional Magistrates in this Province: see I.L.R. (1943) Nag. 154 at p. 171. Once that was done the man would become a security prisoner, and, if this contention is well founded, he would not be entitled to the usual privileges of an accused in a murder trial. Counsel of his choice could be denied to him and he would not be permitted to instruct more than one counsel in any event. He would not be permitted to come to this Court for redress against arbitrary or illegal action by the trial Court. It would be 'common sense', according to this contention, that all such petitions should be disposed of by the trial Court and withheld from this Court. After conviction, if conviction should ensue, even if he is sentenced to death, his petition for appeal could be withheld. It would, we gather, be commonsense for the trial Court to dispose of it provided the man is security prisoner. He could then be hanged at leisure. An impossible conclusion. We fail to see what his status as a security prisoner has to do with the matter. But it is argued, that was what the jail Superintendent thought. We can only determine what he thought from what he said. There is not a word about any such confusion in his mind in his report dated 19th July 1944. The only explanation offered there is one we held to be false, namely that:

It was forwarded by me to the Court of Mr Razzaque . . . for being forwarded to the High Court through the Inspector General of Prisons, C.P. and Berar. . . The idea of sending the petition through Mr Razzaque was that the case of the prisoner may be adjourned till the orders of the High Court on the petition of the prisoner were received.

Even in his belated explanation to this Court dated 13th October 1944, he does not put this forward as his excuse for sending the application to the trying Magistrate in the first instance. That is the explanation offered for forwarding it to the Inspector-General of Prisons after it was received back from the Magistrate and it had become too late to stay proceedings because judgment had been delivered. But even if this was the reason it would make no difference to the offence of contempt. It would only be relevant regarding the measure of punishment. We quote Lord Haldane in 1914 A.C. 808:

Between 'malice in fact' and 'malice in law' there is a broad distinction which is not peculiar to any particular system of jurisprudence. A person who inflicts an injury upon another person in contravention of the law is not allowed to say that he did so with an innocent mind: he is taken to know the law, and he must act within the law. He may therefore be guilty of 'malice in law' although so far as the state of his mind is concerned, he acts ignorantly and in that sense innocently.

Now concerning the facts relating to the omission to hand over Saoji's original application of 22nd September 1943 to this Court even after this Court had called for a report, and more particularly after this Court had issued notice to show cause against the proceedings for contempt, the facts given disclose negligence, but not, we think, dishonesty. And the explanation regarding the omission to forward either the Inspector-General's order dated 7th October 1943, or a copy of it discloses equal negligence. Had the matter rested there we would not have said anything more about it. But the Legal Secretary is not content with that. He proceeds to justify the action and states: 'There was thus no question of suppressing or withholding it'. That is a strange statement when these documents have admittedly been withheld whatever the reason. It is also an impertinent answer to give this Court when its Judges raise the question and raise it very seriously. If there was no question of withholding these documents what are we enquiring into? We are accustomed to recklessly wild statements from ignorant litigants who are hopelessly cornered but we are entitled to greater care and more courtesy from the law officers of the Crown. Then the Legal Secretary continues: 'The copies produced were solely a matter of the clerical staff'. This again is surprising. In an important matter touching the honour, honesty and integrity of high Government officers the Legal Secretary states in effect that it is no business of anybody but the clerical staff to see what documents are given to this Court and what copies should be forwarded. We find it difficult to determine whether this is incompetence or impertinence. About the only complaint which cannot be made regarding the Legal Secretary's statement taken as a whole is that it lacks frankness. There is certainly no lack of candour. Indeed the learned Advocate-General claimed that as one of its virtue. He is right. Then follows another passage: 'No copies of documents were asked for or required and therefore no question of a certificate arises'.

It appears to be the impression of some officers of the Provincial Government, from the Legal Secretary down to some of its Deputy Commissioners, and perhaps even lower still, that it is the business of this Court to find out what documents are relevant and necessary on the official side when questions touching Government or its officers are in issue and that it is its duty to go round from office to office and from official to official until finally to obtain something which will justify a decision against those who have the temerity to question official acts. It does not seem to strike those gentlemen that the Courts are here to decide impartially between the parties before them and that it is the duty and business of the parties to present such documents and such evidence as they consider relevant and necessary for their respective case: that it is their duty and not the Courts' to present their own cases. Our conclusion on all the material placed before us, and we have examined it exhaustively, is that the Jail Superintendent deliberately withheld the application for revision dated 22nd September 1943, addressed to this Court and intended for this Court, from this Court. He kept the application, despite its urgent character, with him during the working hours of at least two days the 23rd and the 24th. After pondering over the situation for two days he deliberately withheld it from this Court and forwarded it instead to his superior officer, the Inspector-General of Prisons, through the trying Magistrate. In so doing he had no intention that it should reach this Court and made no effort to see that it did or should. His intention was that his superior officer, the Inspector-General should dispose of the document and relieve him of all responsibility. His explanation that he intended the document to be sent to this Court and that his reason for sending it to the trial Court was to enable it to stay proceedings pending the orders of this Court, we find to be false. He had three copies of the application with him, and had that been his intention he would have forwarded one to the High Court direct, or at the least he would have marked one of the two copies sent to the trying Magistrate for the High Court and the other for the Inspector-General of Prisons. That is the first set of facts.

He had the document in his possession and control for a second time on 30th September 1943 when it was returned to him by the trying Magistrate. He still withheld it from this Court and sent it instead to his superior officer the Inspector-General. For a second time he was instrumental in withholding this document. On the October, 1943 the document came back to him for a third time. He still withheld it. He was not told to keep it. He was not told not to forward it. All that he was told was:

Returned. 'The case has already been decided and the question of staying proceedings does not arise.

He acted on his own responsibility in keeping the document with him and was not acting under orders. The question now is whether these facts constitute contempt. Contempt of Court is an offence. That part of it, known in England as a criminal contempt is a common law misdemeanour in that country: see 7 Halsbury, Hailsham edition p. 2. The position in India is the same except that the offence is not called a misdemeanour here and that the punishment is regulated by the Contempt of Courts Act (Act 12 of 1926). We are not concerned in this case with the other branch of the law of contempt relating to procedural contempts. In so far as criminal contempts are concerned, the offence is committed if, among other things, the acts complained of either obstruct, or have a tendency to obstruct, the administration of justice see 7 Halsbury, Hailsham edition, p. 2. It is not necessary to establish an actual obstruction or interference. It is enough to show that the acts have a tendency to interfere: see (1889) 58 L.J. Q.B. 490 at p. 102, also 7 Halsbury, Hailsham edition p. 9.

What we have to determine then is whether the action of the Jail Superintendent at any one or more of the stages set out above either interfered with or had a tendency to interfere with the administration of justice. The answer depends upon the nature of the application and the powers of the tribunal to which it is addressed to act on it. As we have pointed out above, the application was one for revision. It asked primarily for a stay of proceedings but the body of the application made it plain that there was no prayer for an indefinite stay. What was sought was revision of an order deciding to proceed without affording the applicant adequate opportunity to defend himself.

The powers of this Court to deal with this application are contained in Ss. 435 and 439, Criminal P.C. They are not limited to staying the proceedings. This Court would have had power on the allegation made there to call for and examine the records of the trying Magistrate and satisfy itself about the regularity of the proceedings as well as about the correctness, legality and propriety of the finding and sentence. It had this power under S. 435 and it would unquestionably have exercised it had the application been presented. In fact it did exercise these powers when a later application for revision was presented. The fact that application failed is neither here nor there. The withholding of the application by the action taken on 21st September 1943, prevented this Court from exercising the powers it would unquestionably have exercised had the application been presented to it. The Jail Superintendent's action therefore actually interfered with the administration of justice.

As regards his acts on 30th September 1943, and on 7th October 1943, they were done after the judgment in the Criminal case was delivered. But that would not have made any difference. If the allegations made in that application had been shown to be true, this Court would unquestionably have quashed the proceedings and sentence and would either have directed a retrial or would have discharged or acquitted the accused. The power of this Court to act and to investigate into the matter and to remedy the injustice, if on investigation the allegations were discovered to be well founded was not exhausted by reason of the delivery of the judgment. The withholding of that application prevented this Court from exercising that power. It would unquestionably have exercised it by calling for the records and investigating into the matter had the application been presented. There was therefore again for a second and a third time, an actual interference with the administration of justice. The contention that there was no interference because judgment had already been delivered is ill founded. The administration of justice is not confined to the consideration of appeals and revisions and to the hearing of interlocutory matters. The High Court possesses a general power of superintendence over the actions of Courts subordinate to it. On its administrative side the power is known as the power of superintendence. On the judicial side it is known as the duty of revision. The High Court can at any stage, of its own motion if it so desires, and certainly when illegalities or irregularities resulting in injustice are brought to its notice, call for the records and examine them 'for the purpose of satisfying itself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of any finding, sentence or order recorded or passed and as to the regularity of any proceedings of such Court'

Nor do its powers end there. Under S. 435 (1) it may also 'when calling for such records, direct that the execution of any sentence be suspended . . . during the examination of the records'

The position of Saoji as a convict and as a security prisoner were very different, and this Court could, despite the delivery of judgment, have stayed execution of the sentence. The High Court's right to have these matters brought to its notice and to examine the record for itself is as much a part of the administration of justice as its duty to hear appeals and revisions and interlocutory applications. So also its right to exercise its powers of administrative superintendence. Now at this point the Jail Superintendent's case differs from that of the Inspector General of Prisons. We have already accepted in the Inspector-General's case his explanation that he acted in ignorance of the law. We have already said that in his case there was room for a layman to believe at the date on which he received the application that it had exhausted itself and that nothing further could be done because judgment had already been delivered. We have not excused him. We have found him guilty of contempt. But in respect of the action to be taken against him we decided for this and other reasons that censure would be enough. The Jail Superintendent's case is different.

In the Jail Superintendent's case he had the application in his hands before judgment was due for pronouncement and he had ample time to forward it to this Court in time for this Court to act upon it. No one could have thought that the application was infructuous at that time. Not even a layman. He deliberately declined to forward it to this Court and sent it elsewhere, not for being forwarded to us, but 'for disposal'. And as regards his action afterwards, when the application twice reached his hands thereafter, he having deliberately brought about the situation in which the application might seem infructuous in a layman's eyes, cannot be permitted to plead his own wrongful act in extenuation of his conduct.

We hold, that inasmuch as the Jail Superintendent deliberately and intentionally on three separate occasions withheld the application from this Court and declined to forward it, he interfered with the administration of justice and is guilty of a criminal contempt. We next have to consider what action we should take against him. In this we have to take into consideration any apology that may have been tendered. The proceedings commenced on 18th May 1944. It is true no action was taken at that stage but an opportunity was afforded for a full and complete apology. Had one been tendered, the matter would doubtless have ended then and there. Courts are always reluctant to proceed in contempt. They are even more reluctant to punish. Except in scandalous and outrageous cases an unconditional apology is ordinarily considered to purge the contempt. Therefore before taking cognizance of the contempt, this Court merely asked for a report. In answer a number of papers were sent to this Court among them two reports, one from the Inspector-General of Prisons and the other from the Jail Superintendent. In all those papers there was not a single syllable of contrition or regret. There was not even an attempt at an apology. On the contrary, there was a vigorous plea of justification. We need not concern ourselves with the Inspector-General's report any longer because we have already disposed of his case. In the Jail Superintendent's report it is dated 19th July 1944 — he justifies his conduct and states:

'There was no delay in this office in forwarding the application which was despatched on 24th September 1943, soon after it was received from the prisoner'.

We have found that there was delay. We have found that it was not forwarded 'soon' after its receipt from the prisoner. Then he says:

'There was no interference in the matter by this office'. We have found that there was interference, and serious interference. Not content with justifying his own conduct he goes out of his way to make a serious and unfounded attack on the applicant — an attack which, if true, would render the applicant liable to a criminal prosecution for perjury. He stated: 'From the above it will be seen that the applicant has filed a false affidavit in the High Court'. There is not a sentence, or a syllable or a word in that affidavit which is inaccurate or false or untrue. This attack on the affidavit is as reckless as the rest of the statements of which we have had cause to complain in this order. In view of this we took cognizance and issued notices on 14th August 1944. Under the Contempt of Courts Act, 1926, the maximum sentence is six months simple imprisonment. Accordingly the procedure in India is that which is followed in summons case. In the application the facts are set out and a copy of that application was served on the Jail Superintendent. No formal charge was, therefore, necessary and the Jail Superintendent had ample notice of the case he had to meet.

Arguments were heard on 12th September 1944. Again, there was no attempt at an unconditional apology. We listened in vain for that. Apart from an occasional statement from the Advocate-General to the effect that his clients were very sorry and intended no disrespect, all we heard was the same justification as we found in the reports. Nothing that was said in them was repudiated. At the end of the arguments we reminded him about the importance of an apology in contempt case. Then we dictated judgment in the Inspector-General's case and called for further information because of the statements made in the reports which were still persisted in. In dealing with the Inspector-General's case we made it clear what the issue was. The order in that case was signed on 13th September 1944. The case was next heard on 6th October 1944. Even then there was no unconditional apology — only the same formula about regret coupled with the same attempts at justification. Again, nothing in the reports was repudiated. Accordingly we drew up a formal order setting out the points which had to be met, and also in the course of the discussion drew the Advocate-General's attention to the importance of an apology and drew attention to the previous rulings of one of us in the matter.

At the commencement of his argument on 27th October 1944 the learned Advocate-General prefaced his contentions by stating that he offered an apology on behalf of everybody in this case including the Jail Superintendent, but then went on to justify the Jail Superintendent's action in the same way as the Legal Secretary had done in his written statement and the Crown on behalf of its servants. Though questioned about it closely by the Bench he did not withdraw or repudiate the statement or any part of it. On the contrary, he came several days after the case was closed for orders and put forward what he called a further instance in support of the statement.

He had also gone through the same formula of an apology at the hearing on 12th October 1944 and we reminded him that the apology had to come from the client and that the papers filed up till that date disclosed no contrition. After that the Legal Secretary's statement was put in and instead of improving the situation aggravated it. Towards the end of the argument the learned Advocate-General said that it must be remarked that the Legal Secretary's statement related to the Inspector-General's explanation and not to the Jail Superintendent's and that we should draw a distinction between the two. We are unable to do so. After disposing of the Inspector-General's case, only one case was before us for consideration and we told the Advocate-General that explicitly at the commencement of the arguments on the 27th. This statement was put forward after due deliberation as the answer to the Jail Superintendent's case. His actions were supported on these grounds and he made no attempt to repudiate these untrue pleas put forward on his behalf. We are unable to accept the Advocate-General's service to the formula of an apology as a genuine apology in the face of the strenuous attempts at justification.

Saoji's application of 12th May 1944 set out all the relevant facts. This was supported by an affidavit. A copy of the application was sent to the jail authorities and they were directed to furnish this Court with a report. Then followed our order of 6th October 1944 which focussed attention on the points at issue, and when read with our order of 13th September 1944 in the Inspector-General's case, could not have left the Jail Superintendent or his advisers in any doubt as to the case he had to meet. The case was then heard on 27th October 1944, and the statement and the papers we have referred to above were put in. We have dealt at length with the attempts at justification -- or rather we have dealt with the more prominent features of the statement in that regard. There are other portions also. But we need not examine them. We have shown enough to disclose the nature and general tenor of the statement. The statement concludes with these words:

In conclusion it is admitted that whatever was done concerning this petition of B.N. Saoji was done in good faith without any contemplation of discourtesy or disrespect. The only delay was in the Magistrate's Court and the failure to forward the petition to the High Court was partly the result of genuine misunderstanding and partly of omission in clerical procedure, which may well be related to the stress of work during these days, and the many onerous and important duties that have to be undertaken. It is greatly to be regretted that this combination of circumstances has led to a false view by the petitioner and to apparent misapprehension by this Hon'ble Court. In furtherance of this statement, individual expressions of regret are also filed.

Here again, instead of acknowledging error there is justification coupled with attacks (a) on the Magistrate, (b) on the clerical staff, or so we gather, particularly when read in conjunction with para 12 of the statement, (c) on the petitioner and (d) on this Court. It is a little difficult to know what is meant by an 'apparent misapprehension'. Either we are under a misapprehension or we are not. And if we are not, and our misapprehension is only apparent, then this is a worse attack on us than ever. Then follows the Jail Superintendent's apology. As we have said, his statement starts out with a justification, and there is not a word of regret for his initial action which was the worst and most inexcusable of all because at that time no one could have thought that the application was infructuous. The only apology is the following.

I have never at any time been of mind to deceive, or act in an improper manner. If nevertheless the Hon'ble judges have been given the impression that I have willfully been at fault or lacking in courtesy to the Hon'ble the High Court I can humbly assure them that such is not the case and I have not on this occasion nor on any other occasion even contemplated anything lacking in respect. I can only express regret for not realising I should have forwarded the petition of B.N. Saoji when it was returned to me by the Inspector-General, Prisons, and that this has led the Hon'ble Judges to think I may have treated the Hon'ble Court with disrespect.

As one of us dealt in very strong terms with this sort of apology in I.L.R. (1941) Nag. 304 and as even that decision does not seem to have carried the slightest weight despite pointed attention having been drawn to it on 6th October 1944, we will not repeat what was said there but will quote instead from an English decision. But before doing so, we will pause to observe that these apologies were not made on the spur of the moment but after two and a half months opportunity for deliberation from the issue of notice to show cause, three weeks after the matter, together with the previous Nagpur decision had been pointedly brought to the notice of the Advocate-General, and after full consultation with the legal advisers of the Crown. The decision from which we desire to quote is (1864) 33 L.J. Ch. 294 at p. 298. The Judge is Kindersley V.C. This is what he said:

There being no doubt about the contempt, the question is how is it to be visited? It is always a disagreeable office to have to commit a party to prison, but the Court must not therefore shrink from it, if justice requires that course in order to hold a man up as a warning to others, and I have no alternative but to commit him. I have the less hesitation in doing so from the course he has pursued; he has either been unfortunately advised or, having received good advice, has not thought fit to follow it. Instead of doing what any reasonable man would have done, and any legal adviser would have counselled and by an affidavit expressing regret and propitiating the justice of the Court, he has vindicated the truth of part of his statements, and instructed counsel to argue that there was no contempt and that he had a right to publish the article, but if the Court thought there was a contempt, then he would express his regret which is of course, no expression of regret at all. He must certainly be committed to prison, where no doubt he will do that which will enable the Court to discharge him at the earliest possible moment, which, I need not say, I shall be only too happy to do having no personal feeling on the subject.

The case before us is far worse than that. Whether or not the Jail Superintendent was badly advised there was no doubt about our attitude, particularly after our order in the Inspector-General's case. We have afforded ample opportunity for an apology and went out of our way to point to a previous decision of this Court. In the English case insistence in contending that there was no contempt was considered sufficient aggravation to justify committal to prison. Here there is much worse. False statements have been made. Wholly unfounded attacks imputing criminality have been made on the affidavit made by the applicant Saojee, and attacks have been made on the trying Magistrate. We have been treated with scant courtesy, and a statement offensive in tone and temper and reckless in its disregard for truth has been put in after careful deliberation and thought. It is impossible for us to overlook this persistent aggravation of the contempt. It is all the more impossible because of the tendency we have marked of late in more cases than one of attempts to ignore the authority of this Court and trifle with it. It is necessary to make an example. Leniency has been misunderstood in the past and will therefore be misplaced. Forbearance and patience only evoke worse and worse recklessness. We accordingly sentence the Jail Superintendent to a fine of Rs 250 under S.3 Contempt of Courts Act. (Act 120 of 1926) and in default to 14 days simple imprisonment. A far humbler man was sentenced to a fine of Rs 500 in I.L.R. (1941) Nag. 304 a warning which has passed unheeded and which, after due deliberation, the Jail Superintendent and his advisers have thought fit deliberately to ignore. We refrain from taking more severe action and from imposing a sentence of imprisonment because it is evident that a man in the Jail Superintendent's position would hardly have adopted this wholly wrong attitude had he not been encouraged in it tacitly or otherwise by those in higher authority. We trust this will serve as a warning and as an example.

Order accordingly

256: Government of Punjab to the Government of India — Caveeshars' Case

File No. 44/52/44 - Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

Secret

From
A.A. MacDonald Esquire, O.B.E., I.C.S.
Home Secretary to Government, Punjab.

To
The Deputy secretary to the Government of India, Home Department, New Delhi.

No. 9805-BDSB

dated Lahore the 7th November, 1944.

Sir,

In continuation of Punjab Government secret letter No. 8939-BDSB, dated the 24th October, 1944, I am directed to enclose for your information a copy of a report dated the 31st October, 1944 submitted by Ch. Mohammad Inspector of this Department, who was deputed to supervise the interview in Sub-Jail, Dharamsala, on the 29th October, 1944, between Central Government security prisoner Sardul Singh Caveeshar and S. Harbans Singh Advocate in connection with the habeas corpus petition of the prisoner.

I have the honour to be
Sir,

Your most obedient servant

A.A. MacDonald
Home Secretary to Government, Punjab.

Enclosure - A Report

Caveeshar's interview with his counsel, S. Harbans Singh, Bar-at-law, lasted from 2 p.m. to 4.20 p.m. on 29.10.44. The warning given at the outset that the talk should be confined to the habeas corpus petition was strictly adhered to throughout. Both the counsel and I took copious notes.

The counsel had with him copies of (i) an affidavit of Mr F.C. Bourne dated 6th September, 1944, filed in the High Court, Lahore, in connection with Caveeshar's petition (ii) letter No. 44/52/44 – Poll (I) Government of India, Home Department, New Delhi, dated 1st July, 1944,² over the signature of Mr Vishnu Sahay, Joint Secretary, Government of India and (iii) letter No. 44/52/44 – Poll (I) Government of India, Home Department, New Delhi dated 2nd September, 1944.³ Caveeshar had already had with him copies of the two letters. He insisted for a copy of the affidavit referred to at (1) above. The affidavit which had a bearing on the petition was allowed to be shown to him. He was told that a copy of the affidavit was no longer necessary for the purposes of the present interview and that if he was still keen to have it he could apply for it.

Caveeshar: There are certain instructions which I would like to communicate to my counsel beyond the hearing of any one else, I, however, do not mind any one supervising the interview from a distance from where he cannot hear us. The interview is in the hearing and presence of Inspector C.I.D. who is taking down verbatim notes of my instructions and who says that no interview can be allowed except within his hearing in spite of my readiness to give him an undertaking that if allowed to give instructions within his view but not within his hearing, I shall not talk anything beyond what has a direct bearing on my petition. In these circumstances I cannot give full instructions and whatever I am giving I am giving under protest.

Have you seen an order of the Division Bench of the Lahore High Court consisting of Mr Justice Blacker and Mr Justice Munn which appeared in the Tribune (Dak Edition – page 8) dated 20th June, 1943? According to this order I could appear in the court in spite of Government's objection. Here is the relevant newspaper cutting⁴ which I am keeping on my file. You please make a note of it and get it from Lahore for your future reference and guidance.

My position is that Ordinance III of 1944 makes no difference in regard to the powers of the High Court to order my production in court to conduct the hearing of my petition. So the order of Mr Justice Blacker issued on the 11th of September, 1944, ex parte without hearing me and in my absence and without my having been represented goes against the Division Bench order referred to above and is wrong. My contention is that there are facts, besides law points, in my petition regarding which I would like to give instructions and, if necessary, evidence. I cannot give instructions in the circumstances in which the interview has been allowed.

There is an instance in which the flaws in my detention have been remedied or at least an attempt has been made to remedy them. The instance is the judgment of the Division Bench of the Lahore Court referred to in para 3 which reads 'Order of detention does not expressly lay down that the detenu shall on no account be removed from the sub-jail'. Order of Mr Tottenham dated the 2nd of September, 1944,⁵ by putting the words 'until further order' is an attempt to circumvent the decision of the Division Bench of the High Court and prevent my production.

They applied in my absence that my petition should be heard in camera. Oppose this on the ground that there are facts as well as law points connected with the orders so far passed. By facts I mean facts regarding the circumstances under which these orders were passed at a time when there were no political, military or other objectionable activities on my part under discussion prior to my arrest.

Counsel: Mr Justice Ram Lal has said that interest of justice is not jeopardized by a hearing in camera.

Caveeshar: But it should be heard in camera only when on hearing it in public it is found that interests of justice are jeopardized. My previous petition which was heard in camera does not and should not be taken by them to constitute an precedent to justify the hearing of my present petition in camera because the grounds in that case were so different that their disclosure could have been considered of political importance. Can I get a copy of the proceedings in camera?

Counsel: Apply for this. I cannot give instructions.

Caveeshar: I will now read out to you my habeas corpus petition para by para with a view to enable you to see for yourself that the position taken up in Mr F.C. Bourne's affidavit is wrong and untenable.

My arrest u/r 129 could be valid only if there were in my case any grounds answering the conditions given in this rule. They used rule 129 simply to anticipate my arrest by a few hours or days because orders of Government of India for my arrest u/r 26 had been passed that very day. By 'they' I mean S.P., D.S.P., and other officers of the Punjab C.I.D. Order of my detention in the Lahore Fort is material in this case because it is different from the one passed by the Government of India. It is because of this difference in the orders that I have not been supplied with a copy of the order of my detention in the Lahore Fort in spite of the fact that I applied for it.

Counsel: They say what they are concerned with is the issue whether your detention is legal or illegal.

Caveeshar: (On my objection that he was going off the track said that)

My present detention is inextricably connected with my detention in the Lahore Fort which is one of the series of links set out in my petition.

They do not stick to any one order. Pin them down to one position and attack. My detention here in the Dharamsala jail is under orders of the Punjab Government. The orders of the Government of India filed in the court came into existence after I had filed my petition. The order dated 1st July, 1944, refers to the order dated 9th March, 1942, which, it says, will continue to remain in force. Copy of the order dated 9th March was not supplied to me originally but I later got its unauthorized copy through my lawyer who got it from the file in the High Court.

I want you to argue that the order passed by the Government of India on the 9th March was illegal. For this refer to the Full Bench judgment of the Lahore High Court in the case of Durga Das Khanna – vide 1944 Lahore 33. In this case the judgment of the Full Bench was that the signatures of Chief Secretary on behalf of the Governor were illegal and did not show that it was the Governor who was personally satisfied that the detention of the person in question was justified. In fact it was the Chief Secretary himself, and not the Governor, who was satisfied that there were reasons justifying the detention of the person in question. Similarly it is for you to make out a case that the orders passed for my detention over the signatures of Mr Tottenham, then Additional Secretary to the Government of India meant that my case had not been considered by the Governor General himself, and then Additional Secretary's order is almost in the same form as the one passed by the Chief Secretary which was held invalid by the Full Bench in Khanna's case. It was after this decision of the Full Bench that the Governor authorized the Chief Secretary that his signatures virtually represented the personal satisfaction of the Governor. Please see that the Governor General has not so far similarly authorized the Additional Secretary. Moreover in Khanna's case Government validated the order. The order in my case was not only prior to it but also has not been validated as yet. In the cases of all detenus, Government have sent new detention orders from Chief Secretary. Please see that they sent me such an order after I had filed my petition. I say that my position continues to be that of Khanna and I do not think that the authority of Government of India anyway materially differs from that of the Punjab Government.

My contention was, as it still is, that Police came to my place at Lahore at 9 a.m. and arrested me u/r 129 at 10 a.m. on the 9th March, 1942. The Government of India order arresting me u/r 26 is dated 9th March, that is the same day of my arrest at Lahore u/r 129. I can prove on the authority of an M.L.A. and other respectables who were present, that I was told I was arrested u/r 129 and that if on enquiry nothing was found against me I would be released. Since the orders of the Government of the Punjab u/r 129 I contend that the orders of the Government of India were not, as they could not be, passed by the Government of India on a report from the Government of Punjab. I was ill that day. No questions were asked of me and no replies were given by me on that day when I was taken to the Fort. Government's present reply that the Punjab Government arrested me in compliance with a telegram from the Government of India is an afterthought and is contradictory to what the officers, who arrested me, represented at the time of my arrest in the presence of responsible persons.

Get copies of the orders detaining me in the Lahore Fort and later the Campbellpur Jail. My point is that my friend in the Central Government got orders for my release issued. I saw a copy of these orders at Campbellpur. On this the Punjab Government passed two orders on 24.3.43⁶ — one releasing me from the Campbellpur Jail and the other ordering my detention in the Dharamsala Sub-jail. My contention is that the Government of India order of 9th March, for my arrest was vacated by the Government of India order for release which rendered the original order ineffective. It was given in the newspapers that I was to be released and restricted in Bargain. I have got a copy of the Punjab Government order No. 5933 B dated 24.3.1943 detaining me at Dharamsala. But I have not been given a copy of my release order passed by the Punjab Government the same day. Both these orders were sent by the Chief Secretary to the Government of Punjab to Home Secretary who passed them on to I.G. Prisons. It appears that while I.G. Prisons sent both these orders to the Campbellpur Jail, he sent only my detention order to the Dharamsala jail. I was actually transferred to Dharamsala before both these orders of my release and detention came into existence.

Counsel: Government will say that Government of India had nothing to do with your case. It was Punjab Government who released you and then detained you for reasons known to them.

Caveeshar: In response to my application asking for a copy of the Government of India order dated 9.3.43 Mr Wace, D.I.G./C.I.D., sent me a letter intimating me that my application had been rejected and that I could be referred to the Punjab Government Order dated 9.4.43. Apply for a copy of Mr Wace's letter dated 17.5.43.

Counsel: How do they call it an order dated 9.4.43 which is nothing but an endorsement by the Home Secretary.

Caveeshar: My contention is that I was not shown a copy of my release order and that, instead I was referred to the present order of my detention which is nothing but equivalent to the order in Khanna's case. Before I sent this petition there was no order in existence for my detention as the Government of India order dated the 9th of March had been vacated by the Chief Secretary's order of release and that Chief Secretary's order for my detention at Dharamsala had been invalidated by the Full Bench judgment in Khanna's case.

Punjab Government had no information about my prejudicial activities. When a question was asked in the Assembly Sir Sikandar Hyat Khan said that Punjab Government had nothing against me.

Counsel: If they arrested you u/r 129 under orders of Government of India, then?

Careeshar: See the telegram and get it on record, see the date and time of my arrest as well as of the telegram. But then they did not arrest me u/r 26 to start with. A copy of order dated 24.3.44. detaining me at Dharamsala is with me but copies of the orders for my detention at the Fort and the Campbellpur jail and my release were never supplied to me or even shown to me.

I have with me copies of the following orders:

(1) No. 44/52/44 - Poll (I) Government of India dated 27.4.44. intimating me that Government has considered my representation dated 20.3.44. and have decided not to cancel the order under which I am detained and that the order - which? they do not say -- will remain in force till . . . unless extended or revoked u/s 9 of Ordinance III 1944. My contention is that the order which has not been specified herein is invalid even if it refers to either the Chief Secretary's order or to Mr Tottenham's order. My position is that this order is bad because the previous order to which it refers was bad.

(2) No. 44/52/44 - Poll (I) Government of India dated 1.7.44.

Again, this order refers to the order dated 9th March, which had been vacated by the Punjab Government order. This is the most important point and should be fully elaborated.

(3) No. 44/52/44 - Poll (I) Government of India dated 2.9.44.

In this order no particulars, date etc., are given of the order to which reference is made in it. I say no such order was in existence. There is no reference to any Government of India order. And then any reference to the Punjab Government order would be unreasonable in view of (i) the Full Bench Judgment in Khanna's case and (ii) Sir Sikandar Hyat's reply in the Punjab Assembly that the Punjab Government had nothing against me.

Please consult Katju, Bhula Bhai Desai and/or K.M. Munshi about my case and ask Mr Jivan Lal Kapur to see the assistance, if necessary, of any of these or other prominent lawyers in or outside the Punjab. I shall ask my friends to get into touch with Kapur to fix up and arrange for his and their fees.

Provincial Press Adviser's Report

a. 'The judgment delivered by the judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the validity of special courts established under Ordinance II of 1942, was criticised in the 'Nationalist Press'. The judgment of the Privy Council has now exposed the utter unreality of the British system of justice established in India. . . . The judgment . . . is another nail-perhaps the final nail-into the coffin of the Government of India Act. Provincial Autonomy has been described as the Governor's Autonomy. Shall we be far wrong if we describe the Government of India Act as the Governor-General's Act?' (The Nationalist). 'The situation being what it is, we shudder to think of the reaction that is likely to follow the decision of the Privy Council setting aside the judgments of the High Court of Calcutta and the Federal Court regarding the validity of Ordinance II of 1942. The reasons given by their lordships are even more disturbing than the decision itself' (The Amrita Bazar Patrika). 'We do not pretend to sit in judgment over the Privy Council on a point of law, but we are in this connection, reminded of the late Lord Morley's cute' observation about the unlimited sovereignty of the British Parliament, viz., that it could do everything except make a man a woman or a woman a man' (The Advance).

1. The main report of the Press Advisor (Appendix I) Contains the following Comment.

The pronouncement of the Privy Council on the validity of the Special Court's Ordinance, 1942, had an unfavourable reception. It was complained that the letter of law had been given greater importance than its spirit; the recognition of the 'unlimited' powers of the Governor General was deplored. "The reasons given by their Lordships are even more disturbing than the decision itself" was a typical comment.

Notes in the Home Dept.¹

The 'Congress Responsibility' pamphlet¹ was drafted by M/S Olver and Saumarez-Smith, neither of whom is now here. A copy of the judgment of the Addl. Distt. Magistrate in which Krishna Nair was sentenced to 2 Yrs R.I. is put up. The fact that he had been acquitted on appeal to the High Court did come to our notice, but we have not seen the High Court judgement, nor did the point about revising the particular passage relating to him occur to us. We may perhaps, in reply to (d), say that the statement made in the pamphlet was correct at the time of its publication, and that Govt. do not feel called upon to make any amends. (It is, of course, open to Krishna Nair to take recourse to the law if he feels aggrieved, but that can be taken care if he makes a move).

A file relating to contempt of court proceedings instituted by Mr Jagat Narain Lal, ex-Parliamentary Secretary in the Congress Ministry in Bihar, in connection with a passage in the same pamphlet, is put up. It will perhaps do if only pages 11-18 of notes are read. The particular passage is at page 31 of the pamphlet, and it was revised as shown in the typewritten slip attached to the relevant sheet in the copy of the pamphlet put up.

A draft is at page 2.¹ I am not sure of the exact terms of the charge as we have no copy in office. However the passage marked A on p. 2 of the judgement in Delhi gives the general charge if we require as much detail.

2 I spoke to DS (1) about an answer to (d).

DS (1) 16.11.44

I have suggested an answer to (d) and amended answers to (a) and (b). I have asked for a copy of the High Court's judgment so that suggested answers to (c) and (d) can be verified though I think from the magistrate's judgment it is almost certain that any acquittal would necessarily be a case of 'benefit of the doubt', as the only evidence was of identification and there was apparently no positive evidence of innocence

I am not sure of the reply to part (d). The acquittal took place long after the pamphlet was published (or I think after any later editions of it were published, but this should be verified). I would be inclined to say:

The statement in this pamphlet is correct and Govt.'s position in the matter is the same as that of the newspapers which published the conviction at the time. If any future editions of the pamphlet were to be published, the passage in question would be omitted. Meanwhile this question and answer will perhaps serve this purpose that this Honourable Member has in view.

- (b) what the charge against him was;
- (c) whether he applied to the Lahore High Court and with what result and
- (d) if Mr Nair was acquitted, what amends Government propose to make for accusation which stands unproved?

Legislative Assembly
Question No. 676.
22/96/44

(To be answered on the 21st November, 1944.)

Reply to Mr Abdul Qaiyum's starred question No. 676 in 'Congress Responsibility' pamphlet of C. Krishna Nair, a Delhi Congress Worker.

The Honourable Sir Francis Mudie:

- (a) Yes.
- (b) He was charged under clause b of sub-rule (1) of rule 35 of the Defence of India Rules with taking part in an attack on Gheora railway station.
- (c) Yes: he was acquitted.
- (d) Government do not propose to take any action in the matter. It is open to Mr Nair to take any action to which he is entitled under the law.

Supplementaries to question No. 676 dated

The 21st November, 1944. Mr Abdul Qaiyum: Is it not a fact that the conviction of Mr Krishna Nair was used as one of the reasons for proving that the congressmen were taking part in sabotage and violent movements?

The Honourable Sir Francis Mudie: The statement that he was convicted was included in the official publication

'Congress Responsibility for Disturbance'.

Mr Abdul Qaiyum. May I know whether this publication was prepared before the gentleman in question was convicted by the trial court?

The Honourable Sir Francis Mudie: No.

Sarda Sant Singh: May I know from the Honourable Member if he is prepared to withdraw that statement from this official book after his acquittal from the High Court?

The Honourable Sir Francis Mudie: If there is a demand for another edition, it will be corrected.

Sardar Sant Singh: What responsibility does the Government of India feel in the matter? Having put in an inaccurate fact in a book published by the Government of India, is it not the responsibility of the Government to withdraw it ipso facto?

The Honourable Sir Francis Mudie: The statement was made before his acquittal.

Sardar Sant Singh: But if the High court found it to be incorrect, what is the responsibility of the Central Government in that respect? Are you bound by the ruling of the High Court or not?

(No answer)

Mr Abdul Qaiyum: Will the Honourable Member issue a correction slip?

(No answer)

Mr Abdul Qaiyum: Sir, I want an answer to this question. If the Income-tax Manual can be brought up-to-date, surely we are also entitled to have these corrections.

Mr President (The Honourable Sir Abdul Rahim): The Honourable Member has heard the question and the Chair cannot compel him to reply.

The Nagpur High Court set aside the order passed by the Provincial Government forfeiting the security furnished by the printer and publisher of the Nagpur Times for having published the grounds of detention served on certain Congress detenus. The Court held that the disclosure was not of 'confidential' information, as defined in Defence Rules 34 (2). In the connected case of contempt of court for forfeiting security and instituting criminal proceedings in the same court, the application was dismissed on the ground that though the action taken by the Provincial Government was 'regrettable' it was permissible under the law.

File No. 44/52/44 – Home Poll (I)

25.12.44

In the High Court of Judicature at Lahore.

In re: The Habeas Corpus Petition of S. Sardul Singh Caveeshar, now detained in Dharamsala Sub Jail as Security Prisoner Class I.

Affidavit of S. Sardar Singh Caveeshar, made on 25.12.44 before Charanjit Lal Anand, Magistrate 1st Class, at Dharamsala I, Sardul Singh, solemnly affirm and state as under:

1. That the interview allowed to me with my counsel under orders of the Honourable Justice Mr Ram Lal, was in the presence and hearing of an Inspector of C.I.D., who was taking verbatim notes of every word uttered by me or my counsel.

2. That there were certain instructions with regard to my petition which I did not like to give to my counsel within the hearing of the Inspector. The inspector, however, did not agree to this, in spite of my undertaking that if so allowed I shall not talk to my counsel except with regard to the petition.

3. That under these circumstances in the interests of justice, I should be permitted to be present in the High Court at the time of the hearing of my petition to be able to instruct my counsel.

4. That at the time of the interview I desired to be given a copy of the affidavit of Mr Bourne dated 6.9.1944 filed in the High Court in my petition, but the Inspector of C.I.D. did not allow this to be done.

5. That I was arrested on 9th March, 1942, at 10 a.m. at Lahore by the Punjab Police and was informed that I was being arrested under rule 129 of the Defence of India Rules and that after enquiry if nothing was found against me I would be let off.

6. That I was ill on the day of my arrest and no question were asked from me nor were any answers given by me.

7. That the order of the Central Government is also dated 9.3.1942 which shows that this order was passed without getting any material from the Punjab Government on which the Central Government could properly act.

8. That on 24th March 1943, Punjab Government passed an order releasing me from Campbellpur Jail, and on the same date passed another order ordering my detention in Dharamsala sub jail.²

9. The order of release passed by the Punjab Government dated 24.3.1943 meant from that order of the Central Government dated 9.3.1942 was vacated and the same become ineffective after that date.

10. That on 4.5.1943 I asked for a copy of the order of the Central Government dated 9.3.1942 under which I was alleged to be detained. Mr Wace D.I.G., vide his letter dated 17.5.1943 referred me to the Punjab Government order dated 9.4.1943 which was an endorsement by the I.G. Prisons to Dharamsala Jail about Punjab Government order dated 24.3.1943. This also showed that the order of the Punjab Government and not the order of the Central Government dated 9.3.1942 was treated as being in force.

11. That in spite of my requests the copies of the following orders have not been supplied to me by Government:

1. Order by the Central government dated 9.3.1942.
2. Orders by the Punjab Government dated 9.3.43, ordering my release from Campbellpur and detention in Dharamsala.
3. Order of the Punjab Government ordering my transfer from Lahore to Campbellpur.
4. Order of the Punjab Government ordering my detention in Lahore.

12. That for the proper presentation of my case the copies of the above in the affidavit of Mr Bourne dated 6.9.1944, in para 3 may be supplied to me.

264: Basanta Chandra Ghose – Appellant v. Emperor [Spens C.J. Varadchariar and Zafrullah Khan J.J. (19 January 1945)]

AIR, Vol. 32, 1945, Federal Court, p. 18
(From Patna: (45) 32 AIR, 1945, Pat. 44).

Criminal Appeal No. 12 of 1944.

S.C. Ghose, Advocate, Federal Court, with B.C. De, Advocate, Patan High Court, Instructed by Gurudayal Sahay, Agent – for appellant.

Sir Brojendra Mitter, Advocate-General of India (H.K. Bose, Advocate, Federal Court with him) instructed by K.Y. Bhandarkar Agent, Mahabir Prasad, Advocate-General of Bihar (R.J. Bahadur, Advocate, Federal Court, with him), instructed by S.P. Varma, Agent – for the Crown.

Spens C.J. – This is an appeal by a detenu against an order of the High Court at Patna dismissing his application under s. 491 Criminal P.C. The appellant was arrested on 27th March 1942, under an order dated 19th March 1942, purporting to be made by the Governor of Bihar in exercise of the powers conferred by R. 26, Defence of India Rules. The application under S. 491 was filed on 28th April 1943. For one reason or another the hearing of the application was delayed till February 1944, and in the meanwhile Ordinance 3 of 1944 was promulgated on 15th January 1944. The application was dismissed by the High Court, but on appeal, this Court held that the new Ordinance (ordinance 3 of 1944) did not take away the power of the High Court to deal with the matter and accordingly remitted the case to the High Court with a direction that the petition be restored to the file and disposed of in due course of law. The order of this Court was passed on 23rd May 1944. On 3rd July 1944 the Governor of Bihar passed two orders, Nos 3928C and 3929C. By the first, he cancelled the order of detention dated 19th March 1942, and by the second, he directed the detention of the appellant on the ground that it was necessary so to do 'With a view to preventing him from acting in a manner prejudicial to the maintenance of public order and the efficient prosecution of the war'. When the application again came on for hearing before the High Court, reliance was placed by the Advocate-General of Bihar on the order of 3rd July 1944, and he contended that it was unnecessary in the circumstances to enquire into the validity of the order of 19th March 1942. Objection was taken on behalf of the detenu to this course and the validity of the orders of 19th March 1942, and 3rd July 1944, was questioned on various grounds. These contentions were discussed at considerable length by the learned Judges of the High Court and they held that the objections were untenable, the petition was accordingly dismissed. Hence this appeal.

Two constitutional points were urged before us. The first was to the effect that Ordinance 3 of 1944 was ultra vires the Governor-General in so far as it purported to authorize detention on the ground that the detenu was likely to act in a manner prejudicial to the efficient prosecution of the war. It was contended that legislation relating to the prosecution of war was not within the ambit of any of the lists in sch. 7 to the constitution Act and that therefore neither the Indian Legislature nor the ordinance making authority was competent to legislate in respect of that topic. It was recognised that 'preventive detention for reasons of State connected with defence' was a subject specified in entry No. 1 in list 1 but it was urged that it could not be assumed that the prosecution of the war was necessarily a matter of defence and that the war may in certain circumstances be a war of aggression or conquest. We are of the opinion that there is no force in this contention. The reference to 'the efficient prosecution of the war' in the Ordinance as well as in the order of detention must be understood in the light of the circumstances in which the Ordinance came to be passed. The language of cl. 3 of the Ordinance is only a repetition of the language of S. 2 (1), Defence of India Act, and that Act begins by referring to the proclamation of the Governor-General under S. 102, Constitution Act, to the effect that the security of India is threatened by the war. Events of which the Court is entitled to take judicial notice were happening in 1942, 1943 and 1944 with reference to which it could clearly be postulated the efficient prosecution of the war was necessary for the defence of India.

It was next contended that if the ordinance was invalid in so far as it precluded certain matters being adduced in evidence. It was said that this was in effect an attempt to repeal pro tanto certain provisions of the Evidence Act and it was not within the power of the Governor-General to exact such a provision to be in force during the time that the Ordinance itself was in force. What was contended was that he had no power to affect the provisions of the Evidence Act permanently. Clause 11 of the Ordinance does not purport to do so. Its words are general. The utmost that could be said is that if the prohibition enacted by it were sought to be enforced after the expiry of the Ordinance, a question might arise as to whether the prohibition would then remain in force. But that is no ground for holding that the clause is invalid even in so far as it prohibits certain things being done during the currency of the Ordinance. Objection was also taken to the validity of sub cl. (2) of cl. 11. It was contended on the authority in (1920) 1. K.B. 829 that such a provision could not be said to be for the peace and good government of British India and could not theretofore be held to be authorized by S. 72, Sch. 9, Constitution Act. It is unnecessary for the decision of this case to deal with this question even if it were open to the Court to examine the correctness of the decision of the Governor-General as to the requirements of any particular situation.

With the leave of the Court a number of contentions relating to other aspects of the case were argued before us.

As we are of the opinion that there is no substance in any of these contentions they may be briefly dealt with. It was broadly maintained that neither the order of 19th March 1942 nor the order on 3rd July 1944 was a bona fide exercise of the power entrusted to the Governor and that they were passed for other ulterior ends unconnected with the maintenance of public order or the efficient prosecution of the war. It was urged that as the detenu challenged the bona fides of the order and as the reason and circumstances relating thereto were wholly within the knowledge of the officers of Government it was incumbent upon the Crown to examine these officers to establish the bona fide character of the order and as they have not been examined the court must draw the inference that the order was not made in the bona fide exercise of the power. It was even contended that after the proclamation under S. 93, Constitution Act, the Crown was no longer entitled to rely on S. 59 (2) of that Act and cl. 10 (3) of Ordinance 3 of 1944 and that the order of 3rd July 1944 should therefore be formally proved. A complaint was also made that the High Court acted improperly in dismissing the application of the detenu to summon Mr Houlton, the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bihar, who had signed the orders of 3rd July 1944. 'This line of argument is, in our opinion, untenable. It was no doubt open to the detenu to show that the order was not in fact made by the Governor of Bihar or that it was a fraudulent exercise of the power. The observations in (1942) A.C. 206 and (1942) A.C. 284 establish that the burden of substantiating these pleas lies on the detenu. In the words of Viscount Maugham, once the order is proved or admitted,

It must be taken prima facie, that is until the contrary is proved, to have been properly made and that the requisite as to the belief of the Secretary of State (here, the Governor) was complied with.

As regards proof of the orders, we find nothing in the proclamation under S. 93 to exclude the application s. 59 (2), Constitution Act or cl. 10 (30) of the Ordinance. The proclamation suspends only so much of s. 59 as requires 'consultation with the ministers'. The mere fact that the detenu challenges the factum or the bonafides of the order of the fact that the officers of Government must naturally be in possession of information on the subject cannot be said to be 'proof to the contrary' so as to make its incumbent on the Government to adduce evidence in support of the order. In 1962 A.C. 284, Goddard L.J. (as he then was) referred to the possible ignorance of the detenu as to the reasons for his internment and said that would not shift the burden of proof, because it in no way shows that the secretary of state had no reasonable cause to believe or did not believe' that it was necessary to detain the person. Reference was made to (1943) 1 K.B. 607 as to the extent of the proof required to rebut the presumption in such cases; but as no proof whatever is forthcoming in this case no question of quantum of proof arises. The detenu no doubt made some sweeping assertions in the affidavits but no materials or sources of information with reference to which these assertions were made disclosed in the affidavit. No value can therefore be attached to these assertions. Even these affidavits did not assert that the orders of 3rd July 1944 were not in fact made by the Governor. As regards the detenu's application to summon Mr Houlton, It was certainly within the discretion of the learned judges of the High Court to dismiss it, if they considered that it was only an attempt to fish for information that might be turned to some account by the detenu. To permit such a device would practically be to allow the rule as to the onus of proof to be circumvented.

It was next contended that the very fact of the cancellation of the order of 19th March 1942 by order of 3rd July 1944 and the passing of a fresh order of detention on 3rd July 1944 showed mala fides. It was said that the orders of 3rd July 1944 were passed pending the further hearing before the High Court, in order to burke an enquiry into the circumstances connected with the order of March 1942. We are unable to draw any such inference from the sequence of these orders. Reports of the decisions of this court and of the High Courts show that during 1943 and 1944 different views were held in different quarters as to the formalities necessary for a valid order of detention and as to the authority entitled to pass such an order. If in view of possible defects of this kind in connection with the order of 19th March 1942 a fresh order of detention was passed in July 1944, so as to avoid any argument based on such defects such course will not justify any influence of fraud or abuse of power.

It was next argued as a matter of law that once the order of 19th March 1942 had been cancelled, there was no power to pass a fresh order of detention except on fresh materials and it was contended that the learned judges of the High Court were not justified in presuming that fresh materials must have existed when the order of July 1944 was made. The first step in this argument seems to us unwarranted. The observations of the Court of Appeal in (1942) 1 ALL E.R. 873 show that in this broad form the proposition is untenable. It may be that in cases in which it is open to the Court to examine the validity of the grounds of detention a decision that certain alleged grounds did not warrant a detention will preclude further detention on the same grounds. But where the earlier order of detention is held defective merely on formal grounds there is nothing to preclude a proper order of detention being based on the pre-existing grounds themselves, especially in cases which the sufficiency of the grounds is not examinable by the courts. There is equally no force in the contention that no order of detention can be passed against a person who is already under detention. The decision of the Patna High Court in 28 pat. 252 cannot be understood as laying down any such proposition as a general proposition of law. The learned Judges seem to have drawn an inference of fact from the circumstances of the case that the order then in question was not one made in the bona fide exercise of the Governor's powers.

It was finally contended that as the previous order of this Court directed an enquiry into the validity of the detention under the order of 19th March 1942, the decision of the High Court must be limited to that question and that it was not open to the High Court to base its decision on the subsequent order of July 1944. This contention proceeds on a misapprehension of the nature of habeas corpus proceedings. The analogy of civil proceedings in which the rights of parties have ordinarily to be ascertained as on the date of the institution of the proceeding, cannot be invoked here. If at any time before the Court directs the release of the detenu, a valid order directing his detention is produced, the Court cannot direct his release merely on the ground that at some prior stage there was no valid cause for detention. The question is not whether the later order validates the earlier detention but whether in the face of the later valid order the court can direct the release of the petitioner. The appeal fails and is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

265: Caveeshar's case

File No. 44/52/44 – Home Poll (I)
[NAI]

In the High Court of Judicature at Lahore.

Cr. M. No. 491 of 1944.

30.1.45

Petitioner: By Messrs J.L. Kapur, Harbans Singh, etc.

Respondent: By Mr B.K. Khanna Advocate-General assisted by Mr Roy, Solicitor.

ORDER. This is an application under section 491 of the code of Criminal procedure for an order in the nature of a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner Sardar Sardul Singh Caveeshar was originally ordered to be detained by an order of the Central Government under rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules and is now being detained by reason of an order under the proviso to section 9 of the Restriction and Detention Ordinance No. III of 1944. The learned Acting Advocate-General takes a preliminary objection to this application on the ground that the previous application of the petitioner having been dismissed by a Division Bench, and an appeal against that dismissal having been rejected by the Federal Court, the present application is not competent inasmuch as it amounts to an application for review of the order of the Division Bench. In support of this contention he has cited an unreported case, Criminal Miscellaneous No. 338 of 1942 and A.I.R. 1944 Lah. 373. These decisions lay down that where an application under section 491 of the Criminal Procedure Code has been dismissed, a fresh application on the same facts does not lie. Here the ground of the application is that no order under rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules was made by the Central Government on 9th March 1942, and that the petitioner having been released from the Campbellpur Jail on the 24th March, 1942, the original order of his detention came to an end and could not, therefore, be extended under the proviso to section 9 of the Ordinance. Since these allegations are new and were not taken in the previous application, I consider that the application lies and must be decided on the merits. The relevant facts on which the decision of these two points rests are that the petitioner was arrested at Lahore by the Punjab Police under rule 129 of the Defence of India Rules on 9th March 1942. Subsequently an order dated the 9th March 1942, purporting to have been made by the central Government was received by the Punjab Government and thus the original detention which was under rule 129 was converted to one under rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules. Under the orders of the Central Government the power to define the place where the detenu was to be detained was left to the Punjab Government and in exercise of these powers that Government determined sub-jail Campbellpur to be the place of petitioner's detention. On 24th March 1942 the petitioner was transferred from the Campbellpur sub-jail to the sub-jail at Dharamsala and in order to give effect to his transfer two orders were made by the Punjab Government. These are as follows:

'No. 5934 BDSB. - Order No. 14164 BDSB issued by the Punjab Government on the 8th October, 1942, directing the detention of Sardul Singh Caveeshar, son of Kirpal Singh in the District Jail, Campbellpur, under rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules, 1939, is hereby cancelled

By order of the Governor of the Punjab

Dated Lahore, the 24th March 1943

Signed F.C. Bourne
Chief Secretary to Government, Punjab

To
The Superintendent,
Sub-Jail, Dharamsala.

No. 5933 BDSB - Whereas the Governor of the Punjab, for good and sufficient reasons, being reasons connected with the maintenance of public order has seen fit to determine that Sardul Singh Caveeshar son of Kirpal Singh shall be detained.

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred upon him by sub-rule (1) of rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules, as amended by the Government of India Notification No. 356 - O.R./40, dated the 28th of March 1940, the Governor of the Punjab is pleased to direct you to receive the aforesaid Sardul Singh Caveeshar into your custody.

And furthermore the Governor of the Punjab in exercise of the powers conferred upon him by sub-rule (5) of Rule 26 of the Defence of India Rules, is pleased to direct that so long as the aforesaid Sardul Singh Caveeshar is detained in your custody the conditions of his detention shall be those laid down in the Punjab Security Prisoners' Rules, 1942. He shall be treated as class I security prisoner.

And furthermore, the Governor of the Punjab, in exercise of the powers conferred by Rule 27 of the Defence of India Rules, is pleased to direct that the aforesaid Sardul Singh Caveeshar shall, when required to do so by you or such other officer as may have been appointed to receive him into his custody —

- (a) allow himself to be photographed;
- (b) allow his finger and thumb impressions to be taken;
- (c) furnish specimen of his handwriting and signature.

Given at Lahore, this 24th day of March 1943.

By order of the Governor of the Punjab,
F.C. Bourne,
Chief Secretary to Government, Punjab

Judgement — It is quite clear from these two orders that what the Punjab Government intended to do was to transfer the petitioner from Campbellpur to Dharamsala. They did so by cancelling the previous order of his detention at Campbellpur and by making a fresh order for his detention at the sub-jail, Dharamsala. In his affidavit the petitioner states in para No. 3, 'That on 24th March 1943, Punjab Government passed an order releasing me from Campbellpur Jail, and on the same date passed another order ordering my detention in Dharamsala sub jail'. This allegation does not in any way amount to a contradiction of the facts which are evidenced by the two orders and the question, therefore is one of interpretation of these two orders. After considering the matter I have no doubt that what was intended by the Punjab Government was merely to transfer the petitioner from one place to another. If on this part of the case any allegation had been made by the petitioner inconsistent with the two orders produced or any statement had been made from the bar that either counsel representing the petitioner had information from the petitioner that the facts were not as stated in these two orders, perhaps I would have ordered the production of the petitioner to make his statement. But in the absence of any such allegation I do not see any reason to require the petitioner to be brought here.

Even if the second order made by the Punjab Government on 24th March may be held to be a fresh and independent order directing the petitioner's detention as distinguished from an order prescribing a place for his detention, the legal position is not at all affected. The Central Government and the Provincial Government has concurrent jurisdiction and the mere fact that an order of the Central Govt. is followed by a similar order by the provincial Government does not have the effect of making the Central Government's order inoperative and thus incapable of extension under the provision to section 9 without a similar order of extension by the Provincial Government.

As regards the second point the position appears to be as is stated in the affidavit of Mr Bourne, that the petitioner was arrested on receipt of telegraphic instructions from the Government of India. As at that time the Punjab Government had not received any order under rule 26 from the Central Government and there was no offence under investigation the only course that the Punjab Government could adopt was to have the petitioner arrested under rule 129. Subsequently an order under rule 26 from the Central Government was received and here is no allegation before me in the affidavit that the order of detention dated the 9th March 1942, was not made by the Central Government on that date. I, therefore hold that no case for an order under section 491 of the Code of Criminal Procedures has been made out and dismiss this petition.

Let a copy of this order be sent free of charge to the petitioner.

266: Bajirao Yamanappa Hatgar and others Applicants v. Emperor [Chagla' and Gajendragadkar' J.J. (10 April 1945)]

AIR, Vol. 33, 1946, Bombay, p. 32

Criminal Applications Nos 426, 427 and 428 of 1944, Decided on 10th April 1945.

R.A. Jahagirdar and D.M. Ahavale for Applicants.

C.K. Daphtary (Advocate-General) and S.G. Patvardhan (Asst. Govt. Pleader).

Chagla J. — This is an application under S. 491, Criminal P.C. it seems that on 22nd May 1942, one S.V. Ghatnatti, Sub-Inspector of Police, was murdered at Kerur. In connexion with that offence the applicant was arrested on 27th August 1942 and he along with others tried by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, First Class, Southern Division Bijapur, under Ss. 147 and 186 read with S. 149 Penal Code. The applicant was released on bail by the Court on 7th October 1942. The trial of the case went on 9th 10th, 14th, 15th, and 16th October 1942, and on 11th May 1943. On all these days the applicant appeared at the trial. Thereafter he absconded. On 24th May 1943 the District Magistrate, Bijapur issued an order under R. 2b Defence of India Rules for the detention of the applicant in the Belgaum Central Prison for one year from the date of arrest. On 4th January 1944, a proclamation under S. 87 Criminal P.C., was issued for the arrest of the applicant, and he ultimately surrendered to the District Superintendent of Police, Bijapur on 8th April 1944. In the meanwhile the case against the other accused was disposed of on 14th September 1943, and all of them were acquitted. On 6th June 1944 the District Magistrate Bijapur sanctioned the withdrawal of the case against the applicant and an order for his acquittal was made by the Resident Magistrate First Class Bijapur on 24th June 1944. On 23rd May 1944, the Government of Bombay issued an order cl.(b) of sub s. (1) of S. 3 of Ordinance 3 of 1944. The Government under S. 9 of the Ordinance directed that the order of 23rd May 1944 should continue in force.

The applicant has been in detention since 8th April 1944 and his contention is that his detention is illegal and he should be set at liberty. The applicant is at present detained under an order of the Government of Bombay dated 6th November 1944 and we have to consider whether that order is valid and whether the detention of the applicant under that order is legal. Section 10 of Ordinance 3 of 1944 provides that no order made under the Ordinance shall be called in question in any Court, and no Court shall have power to make any order under s. 491, Criminal P.C., in respect of any order made under or having effect under the Ordinance or in respect of any person the subject of such an order. But it is clear that the jurisdiction of the Court is only taken away provided the order on which the Government is relying is an order 'made under the Ordinance'. It must be made by the detaining authority in the proper exercise of its powers. It would not be an order 'made under the Ordinance', if it was made merely in the colourable exercise of its power or if the detaining authority exceeded the powers given to it under the Ordinance. The detaining authority must satisfy the Court that it has complied with all the rules of procedure laid down in the Ordinance and has observed all the safeguards. The order must not be made for an ulterior purpose — a purpose which has no connexion with the security of the State or the efficient prosecution of the war. The order must not be intended to override the ordinary powers of the police for the investigation of a crime or to suspend the ordinary criminal tribunals of the land or prevent them from exercising their ordinary jurisdiction. The powers conferred on the executive under the Ordinance are for the purpose of preventive detention and they are not punitive in their nature. The executive must not detain a subject in order to punish him for what he has already done but in order to prevent him from doing something which in the opinion of the executive is likely to affect the safety of the State or the efficient prosecution of the war. It is not competent to the Court to inquire into the sufficiency of the materials and the reasonableness of the grounds on which the detaining authority was satisfied that it was necessary to make the order. But if any reasons which influenced the detaining authority in making the order appear on the record, the Court can scrutinize them in order to see what was the condition of the mind of the detaining authority when it made the order. These principles which I have stated clearly emerge from the various decisions of the Federal Court and the High Courts in India which have been cited at the Bar. In A.I.R. 1944 F.C. 86 Sir Patrick Spens, C.J. delivering the judgment of the Federal Court, observed (p. 93).

In our judgment no further curtailment of the power of the Court to investigate and interfere with orders for detention has been imposed by Ordinance 3 of 1944. The Court is and will be still at liberty to investigate whether an order purporting to have been made under R. 26 and now deemed to be made under Ordinance 3 or a new order purporting to be made under Ordinance 3 was in fact validly made, in exactly the same way as immediately before the promulgation of the Ordinance. If on consideration the Court comes to the conclusion that it was not validly made on any of the grounds indicated in any of the long line of decisions in England and this country on the subject other than the ground that R.26 was ultra vires, S.10 of Ordinance 3 will no more prevent it from so finding than S. 16 Defence of India Act did. Such an invalid order though purporting to be an order, will not in fact be an order made under this Ordinance or having effect by virtue of S. 6 as if made under this Ordinance at all for the purposes of section 10.

And Harries C.J., in A.I.R. 1944 Lah. 378 in the course of his judgment said (p. 375):

In my judgement R. 129 cannot be used legally for any purpose other than that for what it was intended namely to ensure inter alia the security of the State and the efficient prosecution of the war.

To use it for some entirely different purpose wholly unconnected with the security of the State or the efficient prosecution of the war is in my view a misuse of the powers given by that rule and an order passed for such purposes cannot be said to be an order under R. 129, Defence of India Rules.
